

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS, ANNOTATED.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

William D. LONG et al., Appts.,
v.

Thomas FORREST et al., Trading as Gird-wood & Forrest, Defendants, and

1. Citizens of a foreign state will not be aided by the courts to obtain by garnishment preference of their claims against a foreign debtor in disregard of proceedings in his own country for the sequestration of his estate and the appointment of a trustee whereof in bankruptcy.

2. It is not error to refuse to strike out evidence admitted under an agreement of the parties.

3. Evidence of fraud in the creation of a debt is immaterial in a proceeding by garnishment where the creditor and debtor are

NOTE.—The above case presents a question which so far as foreign bankruptcy is concerned has been decided in but few prior cases although kindred decisions on the effect of foreign assignments for creditors voluntarily made are more numerous and these generally agree with the present case. The decisions as to the effect of bankruptcy transfers or those made under insolvency transfers so far as they affect residents of the place where they were made, are not agreed. See the following note, divisions I, a, 6; I, b, 3, and I, c, 2.

Although the above case was decided some time since it has been held for annotation on the important question suggested by it, in connection with other phases of the question or analogous questions which are presented in the following cases. BARTH v. BACKUS, post, 47, and GILMAN v.
HUDSON RIVER BOOT & SHOE MFG. CO., post, 52, with the latter of which is a note on the extraterritorial effect of transfers of property to a receiver, which is closely akin to the note which here follows.

*Transfer of property out of the state by bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings or assignment for cred-

I. PERSONAL PROPERTY.

a. Voluntary assignments.

1. Place of assignment.
2. Extraterritorial effect generally.
3. As against attachments in general.
4. Discrimination in favor of residents.
5. As to nonresident attachment creditors generally.
6. As to attachment creditors residing in the state where the assignment was made.

7. Effect of assignee's possession.

b. Assignments under insolvency statutes.

1. In general.
2. As to resident creditors.
3. As to residents of state where insolvency transfer was made.
4. As to other nonresidents.
5. Effect of assignee's possession.
6. Right of assignee to sue in other state.

c. Bankruptcy transfers.

1. English decisions.
2. American decisions.

II. REAL PROPERTY.

III. SHIPS ON HIGH SEAS.

I. PERSONAL PROPERTY.

a. Voluntary assignments.

The distinction taken in BARTH v. BACKUS, post, 47, between a voluntary assignment and a transfer by operation or under compulsion of an insolvency or bankrupt law is one that has not always been kept clear in the decisions, but which is of much importance in an attempt to make the decisions on the subject consistent and conformable to recognized principles of law.

That the title to personal property will pass by a purely voluntary assignment for creditors made in another jurisdiction from that in which the property may be situated is the general doctrine, which is subject to some exceptions. As to these exceptions the courts are not all agreed. A discrimination is made by some courts in favor of their own citizens claiming as creditors against assignees in another state. Most of the cases hold that citizens of the state in which the assignment was made are bound by the assignment even if no other creditors are bound by it, at least where the assignment is purely voluntary. BARTH v. BACKUS, post, 47, is distinguished from this in permitting nonresidents, although of the state in which the assignment was made, to defeat it by attachment, as in that case the assignment is regarded, not as a voluntary assignment, but as one that is practically in invitum under an insolvency statute.

Citizens of a third state, or nonresident creditors who belong neither to the state in which they seek to attach property, nor to that in which the assignment for creditors was made, are in some cases allowed the same rights as against the assignment as if they were resident creditors, and in others are not.

See, as to these discriminations, cases about attachments, infra.

1. Place of assignment.

An assignment by a nonresident of property in New York signed in another state but delivered in
Bowe, 11 Daly, 259.

An assignment mailed in Missouri to an Ohio trustee, who had prepared it under Ohio laws, for the transfer of property in Ohio, is an Ohio assignment, which takes effect in that state as against a subsequent attachment from the time it was put in the postoffice. Johnson v. Sharp, 31 Ohio St. 611, 27 Am. Rep. 529.

2. Extraterritorial effect generally.

In discussing the effect of the transfer of personal property, which is lawful in the owner's domicile, it is said by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Green v. Van Buskirk, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 129, 19 L.

both foreigners and the estate of the latter has been sequestered in his country and placed in the hands of a trustee.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County refusing to hold the garnishees liable to plaintiffs for a debt owing by them to defendants, plaintiffs' debtors, whose estates had been sequestered and placed in the hands of one Thomas Jackson, as trustee, by the sheriff's court of Glasgow, Scotland. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Owen B. Jenkins and Henry C. Terry, for appellants:

There was no legal proof in the court below

ed. 100: "There is no absolute right to have such transfer respected, and it is only on a principle of comity that it is ever allowed. And this principle of comity always yields when the laws and policy of the state where the property is located have prescribed a different rule of transfer with that of the state where the owner lives."

This statement of the general rule by the chief court of the nation applies to assignments for creditors although it was not made with particular reference to them.

A New York assignment for creditors is held by the courts of that state to be ineffectual as against a subsequent attachment in New Jersey of property in the latter state, where the assignment, being with preferences, was not in accordance with New Jersey law. Gullander v. Howell, 85 N.Y. 657.

Assignees for creditors, under a voluntary assignment of choses in action in another state, were denied the right to maintain actions in their own names in Massachusetts, in the case of Orr v. Amory, 11 Mass. 25.

But this decision is really based on the old doctrine which denied the assignability of choses in action, and is by no means an authority against the right of purely voluntary assignees to maintain actions. See the numerous cases below in which such right is either expressly or impliedly recognized.

As to rights of assignees under insolvency statutes to sue, see infra.

That the validity of an assignment for creditors depends on the law of the place where it was entered into, although intended to operate upon personal property elsewhere, is declared in Fellows v. Commercial & R. Bank of Vicksburg, 6 Rob. (La.) 345, in which case it was held that the assignment was not valid, even in the place where it was made.

That a voluntary general assignment for creditors in another state will pass title to personal property is also declared in Re Paige & S. Lumber Co., 31 Minn. 120, in which the question arose in determining what property would pass by a subsequent assignment for creditors in that state.

In these cases there was no question of the priorities or conflicting rights of creditors.

Fraud in an assignment for creditors made in another state is sufficient to defeat it. Bank of United States v. Huth, 4 B. Mon. 423; Kitchen v. Reinkay, 42 Mo. 457.

An assignment for creditors may be set aside as fraudulent in the state in which it was made, although it assigns real and personal property in other states. D'Ivernois v. Leavitt, 23 Barb. 63.

A voluntary assignment by an insolvent debtor domiciled in another jurisdiction, although it operates by the will of the party and not by operation of law as in case of bankruptcy, will not be sustained when it constitutes a fraud on creditors, and compels them to release their claims for less than the whole debt or on terms different from their contracts. The Watchman, 1 Ware, 232.

An assignment for creditors, valid by the law of the state in which it is made and under which property has been converted into money and brought into that state, will not be set aside in a federal court at the instance of nonresident creditors, who had no lien on such property, in the absence of any fraud in the assignment. Livermore v. Jenock, 62 U. S. 21 How. 126, 16 L. ed. 55.

In Brashers v. West, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 608, 8 L. ed. 801, an assignment for creditors made in Pennsylvania was attacked in the circuit court of the United States in Kentucky by bill for an injunction against proceedings on judgment obtained in that court by the assignee. But, although the assignment was upheld as being valid in Pennsylvania, the extraterritorial effect of it was not at all discussed. It seems to have been assumed that if valid in Pennsylvania it was effectual for the purpose of this case.

An assignment for creditors with preferences, valid in the state in which it is made, will be upheld in another state in which such an assignment cannot be made with preferences. Dundas v. Bowler, 3 McLean, 397.

This was a suit by a foreign assignee to foreclose a mortgage, and the validity of the assignment was attacked by the defendant. Ibid.

A general assignment for creditors, which is valid in the state where it is made, will not be held invalid in another state merely because it has not the schedule or inventory attached which the laws of that state require for assignments made there. Birdseye v. Baker, 2 L. R. A. 92, 82 Ga. 142.

But an assignment for creditors made by a citizen of one state in another state, and recorded in his own state, where alone it is to receive its execution, the object of which is to give it an effect which he could not have if made in his own state, will not be upheld. Chewning v. Johnson, 5 La. Ann. 673, 52 Am. Dec. 610.

The fact that members of a partnership reside in a state where preferences in assignments are prohibited, will not prevent them from making in New York an assignment with preferences of property in that state. Smedley v. Smith, 15 Daly, 421; Eastern Nat. Bank v. Hulshizer, 2 N. Y. S. R. 92.

The nonresidence of a creditor does not relieve him from the effect of a state law prohibiting preferences, where a preference is made by a conveyance executed in the state of property there situated. Macdonald v. First Nat. Bank of Corunna, 18 L. R. A. 462, 47 Minn. 67.

But although an assignment with preferences made in New York is against the policy of Ohio laws, the assignee was allowed to recover against an Ohio debtor who vainly attempted to make a set-off, which was not good under Ohio law because not matured at the time of the assignment. Fuller v. Steiglitz, 27 Ohio St. 355, 22 Am. Rep. 312.

In this case it will be seen there was no conflicting claim of Ohio creditors involved, and no objection was made to the capacity of the assignee to sue in that state. Ibid.

An assignment in trust for creditors, with preferences, made in Virginia, was upheld in Maryland against an attack by a bill in equity to have it declared void, and to restrain the disposition of the property by trustees. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 23 Md. 287, 92 Am. Dec. 686.

An assignment for creditors made in another state is effectual as against a subsequent transfer by the debtor of his interest in a fund held in trust as against a transferee who has notice of the general assignment. Smith's App. 104 Pa. 361.

of the existence of the Scottish bankruptcy acts and in the absence of such proof, the certified copy of a certificate (act and warrant) purporting to prove the appointment of Thomas Jackson as trustee, was immaterial and ineffectual, and should have been stricken out.

It was agreed that the certified copy of act and warrant be admitted in evidence without further proof, but the appellant moved to strike out the said certified copy on the grounds (a) that it was not followed up by the complete record evidence of the alleged Scottish bankruptcy proceedings. A record cannot be offered in evidence by piecemeal, and the mere fact of a certificate stating a certain person has been appointed sequestrator in bankruptcy in a foreign country is totally immaterial, unless

An assignment to resident creditors of a debt or claim for the purpose of giving them a preference, made by a nonresident at his domicile, will not be upheld in Minnesota where preferences are not allowed as against other creditors in that state, and may be ground for the appointment of a receiver on application of such other creditors. Re Dalpay, 6 L. R. A. 108, 41 Minn. 522.

3. As against attachments in general.

It is to be understood in all cases where it is not otherwise stated, that an assignment made in another state, which is the subject of attack by attaching creditors is valid in that state.

As stated in the beginning of this note, there are many cases which discriminate in favor of resident creditors as against nonresidents, while other cases discriminate only against creditors who reside in the state while the assignment for creditors was made, and these latter cases seem to represent the more prevalent doctrine at the present time.

First as to resident creditors. A considerable number of decisions recognize, even as against resident attaching creditors, an assignment voluntarily made in another state if it does contravene the statutes or policy of the state where it is attacked.

Thus a voluntary assignment in another state will be upheld as against any subsequent attachment in New York. Kelstadt v. Reilly, 55 How. Pr. 373.

The same doctrine is declared in Thompson v. Fry, 51 Hun. 293, although in that case the attaching creditor, although having a place of business in the state, was a nonresident.

So a voluntary assignment for creditors in another state, the provisions of which do not violate the laws of Texas, will be upheld in that state as against a subsequent attachment. Welder v. Muldox, 66 Tex. 372, 50 Am. Rep. 617.

It is said in that case that the existence of Texas creditors would not change the result in the absence of any statute prohibiting a transfer by nonresident owners of property in the state. Ibid.

An assignment for creditors in Maryland, which includes a promissory note held by the insolvent against a resident of Pennsylvania, vests the note in the trustees as against Pennsylvania creditors, so as to prevent a subsequent garnishment in that state of the maker of the note. Speed v. May, 17 Pa. 91, 55 Am. Dec. 540.

But under the Pennsylvania Act of May 3, 1855, an assignment made in another state must be recorded in the county where the property is situated, or actual notice brought home to an attaching creditor in order to defeat an attachment in that state. Philson v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 280; Warner's App. 13 W. N. C. 506; Chemical Nat. Bank v. Tuttle, 17 W. N. C. 414; Steel v. Goodwin, 113 Pa. 238.

A voluntary assignment in another state in trust for creditors is valid in South Carolina as against subsequent attachment of personal property. West v. Tupper, 1 Bail. L. 198; Greene v. Mowry, 2 Bail. L. 163.

In these cases the residence of the attaching creditors is not considered, but in the subsequent case of Russell v. Tunno, 11 Rich. L. 304, it was considered on a claim that resident creditors would be preferred to such assignment, but the assignment was nevertheless upheld.

So in Gregg v. Sloan, 76 Va. 497, an assignment in trust made in North Carolina, including a debt and mortgage in Virginia, although not recorded in Virginia, was held good as against a subsequent Virginia attachment. It does not appear whether the attaching creditors were residents or not.

In Florida a voluntary assignment for creditors in South Carolina, valid by the laws of that state, will transfer assets in Florida, including an open account, so as to divest the interest of the assignors as against subsequent attaching creditors. Walters v. Whitlock, 9 Fla. 84, 76 Am. Dec. 607.

The residence of the attaching creditors is not stated.

A voluntary assignment in New York, not repugnant to Georgia laws, although containing preferences, was held valid in Georgia as against a subsequent garnishment by Georgia creditors. Princeton Mfg. Co. v. White, 68 Ga. 90.

An assignment in trust for creditors, made in Kentucky, which is not against the policy of the Maryland laws, although not recorded in Maryland as required in case of Maryland assignments, was upheld as against a subsequent attachment by a Maryland creditor. Wilson v. Carson, 12 Md. 54.

An assignment, without preferences, made in another state, will be upheld in Missouri as against subsequent attachment of a debt in that state, although the courts in the state where the assignment was made would deny validity to a similar Missouri assignment. Zuppann v. Bauer, 17 Mo. App. 678.

The residence of the attaching creditor in this case does not appear.

And in Askew v. La Cygne Exch. Bank, 83 Mo. 366, 53 Am. Rep. 590, a voluntary assignment for creditors, made in Kansas, without preferences, is held to pass personal property in Missouri as against a subsequent attachment by a Missouri creditor.

In New Jersey also a voluntary assignment for creditors, valid in the state where made, will be upheld against an attachment by a New Jersey creditor. Frazier v. Fredericks, 24 N. J. L. 162. In this case the assignment was without preferences, and did not contravene the statutes or policy of the laws of New Jersey.

In Kentucky a voluntary assignment made in another state will be upheld as to personal property as against attaching creditors in Kentucky, if the assignment is one which would be upheld by the policy of the laws of that state. Coffin v. Kelling, 88 Ky. 649.

This case practically overrules Johnson v. Parker, 4 Bush. 142, in which the extreme ground was taken that a voluntary assignment in another state although without preferences, will not defeat a subsequent attachment in Kentucky by a Kentucky creditor. The court said in respect to the claim of comity in recognizing the assignment made in another state: "Such ultra and suicidal comity could not be required or expected of any patriarchal and provident sovereign."

So in federal courts a general voluntary assignment, valid in the state in which it is made, will be upheld in another state as against an attachment by a resident of the latter state. Caskie v. Web- the whole record was offered in evidence; and (b) unless it was shown that the Scottish bankruptcy act, etc., was in full force and effect in the place of business of the appellants, to wit, the province of Ontario, Canada, and also in force in the state of Pennsylvania.

The bankruptcy laws of England are penal and limited to their own territory.

Not even the laws of a sister state within our own federal union will be judicially noticed by the courts of this state without formal proof.

ster, 2 Wall. Jr. 181; Rosenthal v. Mastin Bank, 17 Blatchf. 318.

Likewise an assignment for creditors in another state will pass such an equitable interest in the stock owned by the debtor in a foreign corporation, even before the transfer of the stock on the books of the corporation, that a subsequent attachment of such stock by resident creditors having knowledge of the assignment will be defeated. Black v. Zacharie, 44 U. S. 8 How. 483, 11 L. ed. 690.

An assignment for creditors in New York by one citizen of that state to another, which is valid in that state, transfers to the assignee the title to a note and mortgage to secure it on land in Florida so as to defeat subsequent attachment by Florida creditors. Van Wyck v. Read, 43 Fed. Rep. 718.

In this case the assignment was made with preferences, but it appeared that such preferences were allowed in Florida also. Ibid.

In Meeker v. Wilson, 1 Gall. 419, assignees for creditors by assignment made in Philadelphia were held to have no right to a cargo included in the assignment which was attached in Massachusetts soon after the assignment, but the decision seems to have been put largely upon the ground that the assignees had omitted to take possession of the property within a reasonable time. The court expressly said: "No question has been made as to the effect of such an assignment to convey the property of the debtor lying in this state, so that it may not be subject to the attachment of creditors here."

A sale made to a citizen of one state by an insolvent in another state, which is affirmed by the assignee of the latter, is to be regarded in the state where the purchaser resides, on an attack by an attaching creditor claiming that it was fraudulent, as if there had been no assignment for creditors. Harvey v. Watson, 63 N. H. 463.

In Connecticut an assignment as security in another state in which it was valid was upheld against subsequent attachment by Connecticut creditors, although notice of the assignment had not been given as required by Connecticut law. Clark v. Connecticut Peat Co. 36 Conn. 303.

And a general voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors made in another state operates to transfer a debt so as to defeat a subsequent garnishment of a resident who has been notified of the assignment. First Nat. Bank of Rockville v. Walker, 61 Conn. 154.

In Massachusetts attachment by creditors who have not assented to an assignment being recognized as a valid remedy will be also upheld in favor of Massachusetts creditors against an assignment in another state to which they have not assented. Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, 15 Pick. 11; Pierce v. O'Brien, 129 Mass. 314, 37 Am. Rep. 380; Ingraham v. Geyer, 18 Mass. 146, 7 Am. Dec. 132; Faulkner v. Hyman, 148 Mass. 53.

And an attachment by a firm, some of the members of which are residents, will prevail against an assignment in another state to the same extent that it would do if all the members were residents, although part of them are citizens of the state in which the assignment was made. Faulkner v. Hyman, supra.

But after creditors have proved claims under a voluntary assignment in another state to an amount 23 L. R. A.

greater than the value of the property assigned, the assignment, if valid in the state in which it is made, will be upheld in Massachusetts as against an attachment by a resident creditor of a debt due to the insolvent debtor. May v. Wannamacher, 111 Mass. 202; Means v. Hapgood, 19 Pick. 105.

Although such decision is based on comity, the fact that in a similar case in such other state some years previous the decision had denied effect to a Massachusetts assignment, was held insufficient to defeat the rule of comity. Means v. Hapgood, supra.

An assignment made in another state in which it is valid, is valid as against trustee process by a citizen of Massachusetts who became a creditor by purchase of an overdue note after the assignment was made. Richardson v. Forepaugh, 7 Gray, 546.

It will be seen that the Massachusetts cases recognize an assignment made in another state so far as it would be valid if made in Massachusetts.

In general if an assignment made in another state is in violation of the policy of the laws of the state in which the property is situated, as in the case of prohibited preferences, it will not be upheld in that state, at least as against resident creditors.

Thus an assignment for creditors in Tennessee, with preferences contrary to the laws of Louisiana, is invalid as against subsequent attachment by a Louisiana creditor. Beirne v. Patton, 17 La. 590.

An assignment for creditors in another state with preferences, contrary to the policy of the law of Missouri, will not be sustained there as against resident attaching creditors. Bryan v. Brisbin, 26 Mo. 423, 72 Am. Dec. 219.

So in Illinois resident attaching creditors are not defeated by a prior voluntary assignment made in another state, with preferences. Henderson v. Schass, 35 Ill. App. 155. See Heyer v. Alexander, infra.

And in New Jersey a general assignment for creditors providing for preferences, which is made in another state, will not be recognized as against the claims of persons domiciled there. Van Winkle v. Armstrong, 41 N. J. Eq. 402; Kimball v. Lee, 40 N. J. Eq. 408; Varnum v. Camp, 18 N. J. L. 323, 25 Am. Dec. 476.

As an assignment for creditors with preferences made in New York is invalid in New Jersey as against New Jersey creditors, a deed creating a trust for creditors, which is in effect a general assignment for creditors subservient to the New York assignment, will be also invalid. Fairchild v. Hunt, 14 N. J. Eq. 367.

An assignment for creditors in Massachusetts will not be enforced in the District of Columbia against a resident of the District attempting to subject the property therein situated to his just debts, when the provisions of the assignment are unmistakably against the public policy of the District. Hoover v. Kansas City Pkg. Co. 21 Wash. L. Rep. 710.

An assignment by an insolvent in Massachusetts requiring creditors to give releases in order to get the benefit thereof will not defeat a subsequent attachment in Maine by a resident creditor. Fox v. Adams, 5 Me. 245.

But the decision is based on the general ground that a general assignment in another jurisdiction will not defeat attachment by a resident. Ibid.

Bollinger v. Gallagher, 144 Pa. 205.

(c) The act and warrant was irrelevant under the decisions in—

Harrison v. Sterry, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 289, 3 L. ed. 104; Milne v. Moreton, 6 Binn. 858, 6 Am. Dec. 466; Green v. Van Buskirk, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 189, 19 L. ed. 109; Philon v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 234; Warner's App. 18 W. N. C. 505;

So in Massachusetts, as against a citizen who attaches property of a nonresident, a prior assignment for creditors, with preferences, in contravention of the policy of the laws of the state, will not be upheld. Boyd v. Rockport Steam Cotton Mills, 7 Gray, 402; Zipcoy v. Thompson, 1 Gray, 243.

But in J. M. Atherton Co. v. Ives, 20 Fed. Rep. 393, it was held that an attachment by a local creditor having notice of a general assignment for creditors in another state will not be upheld against the foreign assignee, although the assignment gives preferences, valid in the state where made, and which would not be void in the state where the attachment was made but which would be voidable there if petition was filed therefor within six months.

Under a state statute declaring that an assignment giving preferences shall be absolutely null and void, an assignment made in another state by a citizen of that state will be held altogether void as to property in the former state, although it conforms strictly to the law of the state in which it was made. Sheldon v. Blanvelt, 1 L. R. A. 685, 29 S. C. 453.

In this case the assignment was attacked by attaching creditors.

As in the Kentucky case of Johnson v. Parker, 4 Bush, 142, which was in effect overruled by Coffin v. Kelling, 38 Ky. 649, so in Illinois it was held in Heyer v. Alexander, infra, that an assignment for creditors made in another state will not defeat a subsequent attachment by resident creditors.

This decision is not based on any illegality of the assignment by preferences or otherwise, but is placed on the broad ground that resident creditors would be preferred to the assignee. It stands alone in this respect against the whole current of decisions elsewhere.

4. Discrimination in favor of residents.

It is said in Heyer v. Alexander, 106 Ill. 395, "That the states have the right to discriminate in favor of domestic creditors and against foreign creditors was fully recognized by the framers of the Federal Constitution, and the recognition of the principle was one of the grounds for providing for a general bankrupt act."

On this question also the court in Chafe v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York, 71 Me. 514, 35 Am. Rep. 345, admitted the force of the objection that such a discrimination in favor of domestic creditors is in conflict with the constitutional provision for equal privileges and immunities of citizens, but denied that it was in fact unconstitutional on the ground that such privileges and immunities did not extend to special privileges enjoyed by citizens of a state by virtue of its local laws.

So in Vanbuskirk v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 14 Conn. 683, it was held not to be unconstitutional to uphold an assignment (here of a chose in action) against a resident of the state in which it was made, although it was not valid as against a Connecticut creditor for lack of notice.

But as to statutory transfers in insolvency proceedings the nonresidents are allowed the same privilege of attachment as residents if they are not residents of the state in which the insolvency proceedings are had. Reynolds v. Adden, 186 U. S. 350, 24 L. ed. 261.

Chemical Nat. Bank v. Tuttle, 17 W. N. C. 415.

The Scottish bankruptcy acts cannot operate a legal transfer of property of bankrupts in Pennsylvania as against subsequently attaching creditors who are citizens of the United States though engaged in business in Canada, and the attachment of appellants was entitled to take the fund attached.

This seems to be decided on grounds of comity, and not as a constitutional right.

But in Sturtevant v. Armsby Co. (N. H.) July 31, 1891, the court says that while the assignment might prevail as against attachment by citizens of a foreign country, that citizens of another state in the Union have a constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws with citizens of New Hampshire, and attachments by the latter had been upheld by New Hampshire decisions as against such insolvency assignments in other states. The court does not mention any distinction between voluntary assignments and those made under the operation of insolvency statutes which are involuntary. 5. As to nonresident attachment creditors generally.

See also preceding cases as to preferences.

That a general assignment in Pennsylvania is valid in Louisiana as against a garnishment in that state is held in United States v. Bank of United States, 8 Rob. (La.) 262. In this case the attaching creditor was the United States.

As to nonresidents who are not residents of the state in which the assignment was made the decisions differ.

Some courts deny them the same remedies as against the assignment which are allowed to residents.

Thus in Indiana the rights of a nonresident creditor to attach property must be regarded by the courts, in the absence of legislation to the contrary, as in all respects the same as those of resident creditors. Catlin v. Wilcox Silver Plate Co. 8 L. R. A. 62, 123 Ind. 477.

In this case the attachment was in conflict with a general assignment to receiver in a third state under a creditor's bill.

So in Sheldon v. Blanvelt, 1 L. R. A. 685, 29 S. C. 453, it is held that a nonresident has the same right to an attachment as against an invalid foreign assignment that a resident would have.

In this case the assignment contained preferences which were prohibited by express statutory provision in South Carolina where the attachment was made.

And an assignment with preferences made in Tennessee, which is against the policy of Georgia laws, is not valid in Georgia as against subsequent attachment, although all the attaching creditors are nonresidents, some of them being residents of Tennessee. Stricker v. Tinkham, 35 Ga. 170, 39 Am. Dec. 230; Mason v. Stricker, 37 Ga. 262.

In this case the assigned property was all in Georgia. The court held also that it would not reform the assignment by eliminating the illegal provisions. Stricker v. Tinkham, supra.

But in most cases nonresident creditors are denied the right to defeat an assignment which is valid where it was made although not in accordance with the law of the forum.

Thus in Illinois as assignment for creditors with preferences by a nonresident at his domicile, which is valid by the law of that state, will be sustained in another state where such preferences are prohibited, as against creditors of a third state who seek to attach the debtor's property. May v. First Nat. Bank of Attleboro, 122 Ill. 551, reversing on rehearing 7 West. Rep. 681.

So in Kentucky an assignment for creditors, valid in the state where made, although containing pref-Philon v. Barnes, Green v. Van Buskirk, Warner's App. and Chemical Nat. Bank v. Tuttle, supra.

Messrs. John R. Read and Silas W. Pettit, for appellees:

Appellants agreed that the certified copy of ferences contrary to the laws of another state, may be upheld in the latter, where there are no resident creditors. Matthews v. Lloyd, 60 Ky. 625.

And in Massachusetts a voluntary assignment made in another state will be upheld as against attaching creditors of a third state, if valid where it was made, although it makes preferences which are not allowed by the policy of the law of the forum. Frank v. Bobbitt, 155 Mass. 112.

So in Michigan an assignment for creditors made in another state will be enforced, unless opposed to some positive enactment, or the policy of the laws of the forum. Butler v. Wendell, 57 Mich. 62, 55 Am. Rep. 329.

In this case it was attacked by citizens of a third state in a garnishment proceeding.

In Missouri also an assignment in New York, valid by the laws of that state, will be upheld as against nonresidents of that state, and some of them residents of New York who ask to have assets in that state marshaled and a pro rata share distributed to them in payment of a judgment, which does not constitute a lien on the property of the insolvent. Thurston v. Rosenfield, 42 Mo. 474, 97 Am. Dec. 851.

And a trust assignment in Rhode Island, which has been held invalid in that state on account of a prior assignment, may, nevertheless, be upheld in Missouri as against attachment by a Massachusetts creditor, after the delivery of the deed in the state in which it was made. First Nat. Bank of Attleboro v. Hughes, 10 Mo. App. 7.

Failure to record in Connecticut an assignment made in Ohio does not leave a debt in Connecticut subject to attachment by a Pennsylvania creditor. Atwood v. Protection Ins. Co. 14 Conn. 555.

The court in this case distinguishes the case of Richmondville Mfg. Co. v. Prall, 9 Conn. 439, in which an assignment made in another state, with preferences, was held invalid as to shares of stock in Connecticut as against a subsequent attachment and sale in the state where the assignment was made. There was also in that case a failure to record the assignment as required by Connecticut law. The latter case distinguishes this by reason of the difference in the nature of the property involved in the two cases, regarding the shares of stock as particularly subject to the local law.

Again in New Jersey an assignment for creditors made in another state with preferences and valid in that state will be invalid only as to resident creditors. Green v. Wallis Iron Works, 49 N. J. Eq. 48.

So in a federal court an assignment for creditors valid in another state where it was executed will be held valid save as it conflicts with the rights of resident creditors and will defeat garnishment by a resident of a third state. Schuler v. Israel, 27 Fed. Rep. 361.

An assignment for creditors in New York will not be held in Vermont to be valid against an attaching creditor who had not been notified of the assignment,—at least, where it is not shown that such creditor is a citizen of New York, and that the law of New York on the subject differs from that of Vermont. Ward v. Morrison, 25 Vt. 583.

So in Vermont a change of possession to the assignee is held necessary to defeat an attachment of personal property in that state, even as to non-residents, although such change of possession was not necessary by the laws of another state in which the assignment was made. Rice v. Courtis, 32 Vt. 460.

6. As to attachment creditors residing in the state where the assignment was made.

As to creditors of the state in which an assignment for creditors is made, it is generally held that the assignment will defeat their subsequent attachment of personal property in another state. Whipple v. Thayer, 16 Pick. 25, 26 Am. Dec. 622; Daniels v. Williard, 16 Pick. 36; Burlock v. Taylor, 16 Pick. 385; Chartres v. Cairns, reported in footnote in 5 Cow. 578; Woodward v. Brooks, 3 L. R. A. 702, 128 Ill. 222.

Thus it is said the execution of foreign assignments for creditors will be enforced by New Jersey courts as a matter of comity, except when it would injure its own citizens. Halsted v. Straus, 32 Fed. Rep. 279.

In this case New York creditors sought by attachment in the federal court in New Jersey to defeat a New York assignment.

And an attachment by a nonresident will not be upheld as against a prior assignment for creditors in the state in which he resides to an assignee who resides in the state where the suit is brought. Benedict v. Parmenter, 13 Gray, 83.

So an assignment for creditors passes to the assignee the title to personal property in another state, at least as against residents of the state in which the assignment is made, and in which the action is brought. Cramton v. Valido Marble Co. 1 L. R. A. 120, 60 Vt. 291.

An assignment for creditors in another state is valid as against a citizen of that state to defeat his subsequent trustee process after notice of the assignment. Martin v. Potter, 11 Gray, 27, 71 Am. Dec. 689; Bholen v. Cleveland, 5 Mason, 174.

An assignment for creditors made in another state where it was valid will pass the title to personal property in Pennsylvania as against residents of the state in which the assignment was made, although the assignment is not recorded as required by the Pennsylvania laws in respect to assignments made in that state. Bacon v. Horne, 3 L. R. A. 265, 128 Pa. 463.

So an assignment in Pennsylvania is held in Kentucky to be valid against subsequent attachment by Pennsylvania creditors who have knowledge of the assignment, although it is not recorded in Kentucky. Forepaugh v. Appold, 17 B. Mon. 625.

So an assignment (here of a chose in action and not a general assignment) made in New York was held valid in Connecticut as against a New York creditor, although it would be valid as against a Connecticut creditor because no notice had been given as required by Connecticut law. Van Buskirk v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 14 Conn. 582.

So an assignment for equal benefit of creditors made in South Carolina is upheld in Georgia as against an attachment of personal property by a Georgia creditor. Miller v. Kernaghan, 55 Ga. 155.

A New York assignment, valid there without notice, will be upheld in Rhode Island, at least as against New York creditors who bring garnishment in Rhode Island. Noble v. Smith, 6 R. I. 446.

the act and warrant should be admitted in evidence. The fact itself is proved; its effect on the rights of the attaching creditors is the only real question in the case. The refusal of the court to strike it out is not the subject of exception or review in this case.

United States Teleg. Co. v. Wenger, 55 Pa. 262, 93 Am. Dec. 751.

A transfer of property in invitum is inoperative per se beyond the territorial limits of the government under whose laws the transfer is made. Nevertheless, upon principles of international comity the courts will recognize such transfer and give effect thereto where no rights of creditors are concerned.

Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe, 31 Hun, 175; Holmes v. Remsen, 20 Johns. 259, 11 Am. Dec. 269; Willits v. Waite, 25 N. Y. 584;

And a New York assignment valid in that state, although not filed in Vermont, as required by Vermont law, is sufficient to defeat a subsequent garnishment in Vermont by a New York creditor. Hanford v. Paine, 32 Vt. 442, 78 Am. Dec. 586.

But the court in this case declared that it was not willing to place its decision upon the narrow ground of the residence of the attaching creditor, but that an assignment in another state would pass personal property, unless its operation is limited or restrained by local law or policy. Ibid.

And in Wisconsin a voluntary assignment in Rhode Island was held sufficient to transfer a claim against a Wisconsin debtor as against a subsequent attachment by a Rhode Island creditor, with notice. Mowry v. Crocker, 6 Wis. 323.

A Minnesota assignment for creditors was held in that state to pass personal property in Wisconsin as to sustain an action by the assignee in Minnesota for conversion against a Minnesota creditor, who has, after the assignment, sold the property upon execution in Wisconsin. Covey v. Cutler, (Minn.) Sept. 3, 1893.

A voluntary cession of property by a Louisiana debtor, including real estate in Mississippi, which is perfected by a judge's order before attachment proceedings by a citizen of Louisiana are begun in Mississippi, will be valid in Louisiana to defeat such attachment, and the attaching creditor being within the jurisdiction of the court may be compelled to deliver the proceeds obtained by him from his attachment to the Louisiana syndic. Hayden v. Yale, 45 La. Ann. —.

As against nonresident attaching creditors, who are domiciled in the state where the voluntary assignment for creditors was made, the fact that preferences were given thereby, which is contrary to the policy of the state in which the attachments are made, will not defeat the assignment. Juilliard v. May, 130 Ill. 87; Lipman v. Link, 30 Ill. App. 359; Robert v. Baker, 53 Conn. 519; Richardson v. Leavitt, 1 La. Ann. 430, 45 Am. Dec. 90; Moore v. Bonnell, 31 N. J. L. 90; Train v. Kendall, 187 Mass. 366.

And an assignment for creditors in another state with preferences, which are valid in that state, will be upheld in New Jersey against a subsequent attachment by a firm doing business in the state where the assignment was made, although one member of the firm is a resident of New Jersey. Halsted v. Straus, 32 Fed. Rep. 230.

On the other hand an assignment in Pennsylvania, with preferences, which were contrary to the policy of the laws in Delaware, was not upheld in Delaware against garnishment by a Pennsylvania creditor. Mayberry v. Shisler, 1 Harr. (Del.) 349.

Effect of assignee's possession.

There is no conflict as to the proposition that an assignment for creditors made in another state will be upheld, if it has been executed by a transfer of possession to the assignee.

Thus in Forbes v. Scannell, 13 Cal. 242, it is held that the title to personal property, of which actual possession has been taken by assignees for creditors in a foreign country, will remain vested in them on the arrival of the property in this country.

And an assignment for creditors executed in Canada, which was valid there, will be upheld in New 33 L. R. A.

York as against residents of Canada, who subsequently attach the debtor's property in New York, after the assignees have taken possession in that state, although the assignment did not conform to the law of New York. Ockerman v. Cross, 40 Barb. 465, affirmed in Ockerman v. Cross, 54 N. Y. 29.

So an assignment in another state is effectual to pass to the assignees a valid title to assets of which they take possession before an attachment. Howard Nat. Bank v. King, 10 Abb. N. C. 346; Cook v. Van Horn, 31 Wis. 291.

A voluntary assignment with preferences made in Utah where it is valid will be upheld in Idaho, when the assignee has taken possession of property in that state, as against a subsequent attachment, although in Idaho the statutes prescribe that assignments shall be made without preferences. Barnett v. Kinney, 147 U. S. 476, 37 L. ed. 247, reversing 2 Idaho, 705.

So in a New Jersey case the assignee under a foreign assignment was held to be entitled to a certain part of the property levied on which had been actually transferred to the assignee before levy although the assignment contained preferences against the policy of New Jersey law. Varnum v. Camp, 13 N. J. L. 325, 25 Am. Dec. 474.

An assignment for creditors in New York, although containing preferences, when accompanied by delivery of the property, is valid as against a subsequent attachment in Louisiana by a New York creditor. Whitenright v. Leavitt, 4 La. Ann. 361.

And a valid New York assignment for creditors containing preferences, although such preferences are not upheld by Pennsylvania law, under which such a provision will be disregarded, will be upheld in Pennsylvania against an attachment of the property while it was in the hands of an agent of the assignee. Law v. Mills, 18 Pa. 185.

So assignees in a Rhode Island assignment who have taken possession of personal property in Massachusetts can maintain trover in Rhode Island against a Massachusetts deputy sheriff who took the property from them in attachment by a Massachusetts creditor, although it was claimed that the Rhode Island assignment was not valid in Massachusetts. Hunt v. Lathrop, 7 R. I. 53.

An assignment for creditors in Ohio, if not against the public policy of Indiana, is valid as to personal property in the latter state, where possession has been taken by the assignee, and subsequent attachment is thereby defeated. Schroder v. Tompkins, 53 Fed. Rep. 672.

See also as to possession by assignee in insolvency, infra, Mead v. Dayton, 28 Conn. 33.

The garnishment of an assignee is within the same principle, presupposing his possession.

A trustee in an assignment for creditors made in another state in which it is valid, although containing preferences contrary to the policy of the laws of Massachusetts, will not be liable in Massachusetts to trustee process to reach funds in his hands arising from the sale of property under the assignment in the state where it was made. Cragin v. Lamkin, 7 Allen, 365.

A citizen of the state who is made the assignee in an assignment for creditors in another state, which is there valid, cannot be charged at his dom-

And even though there be creditors where the rights of domestic creditors are not concerned and the pursuing creditors are not citizens of the state whose process is invoked, the courts thereof will not sustain their claim in preference to that previously acquired by a receiver, trustee, or assignee obtaining title under the laws of another state, but the transfer will be given the same force and effect as in the state under whose statute it was made.

iceil with trustee process in favor of another citizen of the state, but is bound, as well in conscience as by law, to execute his trust according to the terms of the conveyance under which he took the property. The legal fiction that personal property follows the person cannot be invoked to make property which he has not brought into the state subject to such attachment. Wales v. Alden, 23 Pick. 245; Martin v. Potter, 11 Gray, 37, 71 Am. Dec. 868.

An assignee for creditors in Louisiana cannot be charged there as garnishee by a creditor who resides in a state where an assignment for creditors was made if the assignment is valid in the state where it was made. Dord v. Bonnaiffé, 6 La. Ann. 663, 54 Am. Dec. 573.

b. Assignments under insolvency statutes.

1. In general.

In some cases it does not clearly appear whether the assignment in question was properly regarded as voluntary, or whether it was made under a statute which required a transfer of property by the insolvent, or as in the case of BARTY v. BACKUS, provided for a discharge of the debts of creditors who accepted the benefits of the assignment.

But it is believed that most cases under this subdivision are fairly to be regarded as within the latter class.

In Smith v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 23 Wis. 287, an assignment in New York by an insolvent debtor of all his property to avoid a commitment to prison, made while he was under arrest, was held valid in Wisconsin to defeat a subsequent action by such debtor in that state upon a debt included within the assignment.

In this case the court declares that the assignment was made by the owner of the property himself, and does not discuss the question of the effect of the statute requiring such transfer in order to obtain his discharge from arrest; but there was no question in the case as to the rights of any Wisconsin creditor.

But an assignment to trustees in proceedings against absconding debtors, under a statute in the nature of a bankrupt law, being in invitum, will not transfer to the trustees the title to property which the debtor has taken with him into another state so as to defeat a transfer there in payment of a debt, and the fact that the property is subsequently brought back into the former state, of which the transferee as well as the debtor was a resident, will not defeat the title of the latter. Johnson v. Hunt, 23 Wend. 87.

The rule that transfers or assignments of personal property are governed by the law of the owner's domicile, unless contrary to the statute or policy of the state where the property is situated, applies only to voluntary transfers or assignments, which rest essentially on contract, and not to assignments by operation of law, or made under legal compulsion. Cutlin v. Wilcox Silver Plate Co. 8 L. R. A. 62, 123 Ind. 477.

That an assignment by operation of the law of another state does not operate as against citizens of the forum upon a debt or right of action in the latter jurisdiction was held in respect to the intervention of commissioners appointed in liquidation under the laws of Louisiana in an attachment suit in New York. Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe, 84 N. Y. 367, 38 Am. Rep. 513.

An assignment for creditors made in another state, referring to a statute which contains an invalid provision in the nature of a bankrupt law, will not be held invalid merely because of such reference to the statute, as the presumption is that the assignor knew the law and intended to make simply a voluntary assignment. Boese v. King, 78 N. Y. 471.

The fact that an assignment for creditors made in another state was made under a statute will not prevent its operation outside of the state, if the statute was merely an affirmation of the common law upon the subject. Butler v. Wendell, 37 Mich. 62, 58 Am. Rep. 829.

But an assignment pursuant to statute which, although voluntary, is made to procure a release of debts under the provisions of the statute, can have no legal operation in another state as against an attachment of property there. McClure v. Campbell, 71 Wis. 360.

In this case the court says: "We think the question is not affected by the fact that the property when seized was in the possession of the assignee, or that the attaching creditor is a resident of the state in which the insolvency or bankruptcy proceedings were had." Ibid.

2. As to resident creditors.

The decisions generally agree in holding that as to resident creditors the courts will not uphold insolvency transfers by operation of law in another state.

In Hall v. Boardman, 14 N. H. 38, a general insolvency assignment in Massachusetts was held to pass title to personal property in New Hampshire so far as to defeat a subsequent garnishment by the holder of a note which, at the time of the assignment, was owned and held in Massachusetts, and on which suit was then pending in Massachusetts, but which had been afterwards transferred, overdue, to a person in New Hampshire.

The court regarded the Massachusetts discharge in insolvency as applicable to this note, and that the New Hampshire creditor, taking it overdue, was subject thereto. Hall v. Boardman, supra.

In Dunlap v. Rogers, 47 N. H. 281, 93 Am. Dec. 433, the court recognizes the fact that its earlier decisions as to the effect of the Massachusetts insolvency laws, so far as it concerns the discharge of debts to nonresidents, are overruled by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and decides that garnishment by a resident creditor is not defeated by a prior insolvency assignment in Massachusetts.

To the same effect is Dalton v. Currier, 40 N. H. 237, holding that attachment by a New Hampshire creditor is not defeated by insolvency proceedings in Massachusetts.

So an assignee appointed in insolvency proceedings in Vermont has no right in New Hampshire to assets of the estate as against attaching creditors in that state, who have not recognized the insolvency proceedings, or become estopped to contest their validity. Perley v. Mason, 64 N. H. 6; Carbee v. Mason, Id. 10.

Bradford, 10 N. H. 365; Bagby v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co. 86 Pa. 291; Perkins v. Olver Spring Paper Co. 42 Phila. Leg. Int. 297; Bacon v. Horne, 3 L. R. A. 855, 123 Pa. 452; Chemical Nat. Bank v. Tuttle, 17 W. N. C. 415.

The appellants claim, however, that they come within the exception, and that they are American citizens and hence entitled to protection. They have both resided in Canada for twenty-five years and engaged in business there, but claim to be regarded as American citizens because they have, or claim to have, retained their citizenship.

For the purposes of this case they have no title to be so regarded. A man's status for the purposes of trade is not determined by his citizenship, but by his domicile.

Wildes v. Parker, 3 Sumn. 593; Livingston

An insolvency assignment by officers of the law will not affect the title to personal property in another state as against an attachment by a resident creditor. Felch v. Bugbee, 43 Me. 9, 77 Am. Dec. 232.

An assignee under Canadian insolvency law does not get title to promissory notes in Michigan, which had never been in Canada, and which the insolvent had not himself assigned. Wood v. Parsons, 27 Mich. 152.

But a scheme of arrangement of the affairs of an embarrassed corporation in Canada, under a Canadian statute which is valid in Canada as to non-assenting bondholders within that dominion, will be upheld in this country also in respect to citizens of the United States. Canada Southern R. Co. v. Gebhard, 109 U. S. 537, 27 L. ed. 1020.

3. As to residents of state where insolvency transfer was made.

As to creditors who reside in the state in which the insolvency proceedings were had the courts of other states are quite generally inclined to hold the proceedings effectual, contrary to McClure v. Campbell, 71 Wls. 360, and in harmony with Long v. Forrest.

So a garnishment in Pennsylvania by a Maryland creditor is held subject to pending insolvency proceedings in Maryland. Mulliken v. Aughinbaugh, 1 Pear. & W. 117.

Likewise a garnishment in Missouri by a Louisiana creditor is held to be defeated by insolvency proceedings, and the appointment of a syndic for the debtor in Louisiana. Einer v. Beste, 32 Mo. 240, 32 Am. Dec. 122.

But in Connecticut it is held that Massachusetts insolvency proceedings will not bar an attachment in Connecticut, although by a Massachusetts creditor. Upton v. Hubbard, 23 Conn. 274, 73 Am. Dec. 670.

In South Boston Iron Co. v. Boston Locomotive Works, 51 Me. 565, it is held that an insolvency assignment in Massachusetts will not defeat a pending garnishment in Maine, by a Massachusetts creditor.

On the other hand, in Hoag v. Hunt, 21 N. H. 106, it was held that, as against a citizen of Massachusetts, an insolvency assignment in that state would defeat subsequent garnishment in New Hampshire, saying: "Whatever debt the trustee owed the defendants passed by the assignment to the assignee."

See infra, I, c. 2, as to bankruptcy cases in which the same difference of decisions appears; also supra, I, a, 6, in respect to voluntary assignments as to which the cases generally agree so far as respects creditors residing where the assignments were made.

But where a Massachusetts creditor made an attachment in New Hampshire, it was held that subsequent attaching creditors in New Hampshire could not be granted their application to have the suit by the Massachusetts creditor continued in order to allow the debtor to obtain his discharge in Massachusetts, so as to remove the Massachusetts creditor out of the way of resident creditors. Kilder v. Tufts, 43 N. H. 126.

or may have an injunction against another citizen of that state to prevent him from proceeding with an attachment by process of garnishment in another state obtained before the assignment in insolvency, but with knowledge of actual insolvency and with intent to obtain a preference over other resident creditors. Cunningham v. Butler, 142 Mass. 47, 66 Am. Rep. 637.

And an injunction against a citizen of the state to prevent his obtaining a preference over other creditors, contrary to the insolvent laws of the state, by attachment in another state, does not violate constitutional provisions as to the full faith and credit of judicial proceedings in other states, or as to equal privileges and immunities of citizens. Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538.

But a sale of a claim against one who is in fact insolvent, while a suit by attachment instituted by the creditor is pending in another state, made to a nonresident, with all rights acquired by the attachment, for the purpose of acquiring an advantage over other creditors and to avoid an injunction against prosecuting the suit in case insolvency proceedings are commenced, will be upheld as against a subsequent assignee in insolvency, and an injunction against further prosecution of the suit, or loaning his name for that purpose, cannot be granted in order to recover all the proceeds of the sale allowed to the assignee. Proctor v. National Bank of the Republic, 9 L. R. A. 122, 152 Mass. 233.

For full treatment of the question of injunction against suits in foreign jurisdictions, see note to Thorndike v. Thorndike (Ill.) 21 L. R. A. 71.

4. As to other nonresidents.

Nonresidents who do not reside in the state where the insolvency proceedings were had are generally allowed the same right as residents against insolvency transfers.

An attachment in a federal court by a foreign citizen must prevail against a syndic who claims merely by the declaratory powers of a state insolvent law, the property having never been in the actual custody of the syndic or the court. Mississippi Mills Co. v. Ranlett, 19 Fed. Rep. 191.

But a general assignment in insolvency in Massachusetts was held good in Sanderson v. Bradford 10 N. H. 200, as against garnishment by English creditors, although the assignment contained preferences not recognized in New Hampshire.

Again in Smith v. Brown, 43 N. H. 44, garnishment by a Connecticut creditor in New Hampshire holding a negotiable note payable in Massachusetts was discharged where the debtor had made an insolvency assignment in Massachusetts. The court held that the note was subject to the condition as to discharge in Massachusetts. But see Dunlap v. Rogers, 47 N. H. 231, 93 Am. Dec. 423.

A later New Hampshire case holds that an assignment under the insolvent laws of Massachusetts is invalid in New Hampshire as against an attaching creditor who is a resident of Illinois. Sturtevant v. Armsby Co. (N. H.) July 31, 1891.

So insolvency proceedings in Louisiana are held in Mississippi not to defeat a subsequent attachment in Mississippi by a creditor who is not a citi-

v. Maryland Ins. Co. 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 506, 3 L. ed. 421; The Indian Chief, 3 C. Rob. 13; The Harmony, 2 C. Rob. 323; The Venus, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 258, 3 L. ed. 553.

By the law of England such a creditor, even if given such priority, would be treated as a trustee for the sequestrator to the extent that he has collected his claim out of property in a foreign jurisdiction.

sen or resident of Louisiana before the Louisiana syndic has asserted his claim in Mississippi. Beer v. Hooper, 32 Miss. 246.

And an assignment with preferences made in Pennsylvania by an insolvent corporation will not defeat a subsequent garnishment in Connecticut in favor of a Rhode Island creditor, although the garnishee had notice of the assignment. Paine v. Lester, 44 Conn. 196, 20 Am. Rep. 442.

The court says that it does not clearly appear whether the assignment is or is not voluntary, but regarded it as a "statutory and not a common-law conveyance." Ibid.

By comity also in Louisiana a citizen of another state will be allowed the same right as citizens of the state in which the court sits to deny the effect of a transfer in insolvency proceedings in a third state. Reynolds v. Adden, 126 U. S. 360, 34 L. ed. 361. See also supra, I, a. 4.

So in a federal court funds in the hands of a trustee, appointed on the application of an insolvent debtor under the Maryland insolvent laws, are not subject to attachment in that state under process from the federal court by a nonresident creditor. Torrens v. Hammond, 4 Hughes, C. C. 596.

The court in this case regards the decision as controlled by Crappo v. Kelly, 53 U. S. 16 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 430, which it says cannot be reconciled with a decision allowing a nonresident creditor to attach funds in the hands of the insolvent's assignee. Torrens v. Hammond, supra.

An attachment in a federal court is, by virtue of U. S. Rev. Stat., § 933, dissolved by an assignment for creditors made under the provisions of what is called an insolvent law of the state, by which attachments in the state court would be dissolved. Mather v. Nesbit, 13 Fed. Rep. 372. The residence of the creditor is not stated.

This so-called insolvent law did not authorize the discharge of the debtor, although it gave priority to those creditors who accepted its terms and released the debtor. Ibid.

5. Effect of assignee's possession.

The effect of the assignee's possession to give him a standing in another state which is universally recognized in the case of voluntary assignments is, although denied in McClure v. Campbell, 71 Wis. 350, as to statutory assignments, in other cases at least impliedly recognized or suggested.

Thus transfers by judicial operation under insolvent laws of a state are held by Georgia courts not binding upon citizens of other states, at least until the assignee has reduced the property in possession, or has done what is equivalent thereto. Reynolds v. Adden, 126 U. S. 349, 34 L. ed. 360.

Whether or not local creditors are bound by insolvent laws of another state, they are bound by specific transfer of the property of an insolvent corporation in pursuance of a decree of court, by the corporation itself to a receiver in the state in which it is domiciled, including promissory notes against persons in another state, and such transfer with possession of the notes by the assignee is effectual against a subsequent attachment by the local creditors. Taylor v. Life Assn. of America, 13 Fed. Rep. 498.

Hunter v. Potts, 4 T. R. 183; Still v. Worrick, 1 H. Bl. 665; Phillips v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 409.

McCullum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The debt for the collection of which the writ of foreign attachment was issued was contracted in a foreign country. Long & Bisby, particularly dwelt upon in the above case as the ground of the decision and the decision might perhaps have been the same if the notes had not been in the assignee's possession.

The delivery of property to a creditor in another state, making a valid transfer there, is not affected by subsequent insolvency proceedings at the residence of the debtor, although the transfer, if made in that state, would be rendered void by the insolvency statute. Mead v. Dayton, 28 Conn. 38. See also supra I, a. 7.

6. Right of assignee to sue in other state.

In Raymond v. Johnson, 11 Johns. 438, it is said that an assignee under the insolvent law of another state cannot sue in his own name.

So a Louisiana syndic is held in Mississippi to have no right to sue in his own name on an open account. Tully v. Herrin, 44 Miss. 626; Kirkland v. Lowe, 38 Miss. 423, 60 Am. Dec. 355.

And assignees under the Massachusetts insolvent law cannot of right maintain suit in Connecticut. Upton v. Hubbard, 28 Conn. 374, 73 Am. Dec. 670.

And in Betton v. Valentine, 1 Curt. C. C. 163, it was held that the assignee of one, who has been on his own petition adjudged insolvent under the laws of Massachusetts, cannot, in Rhode Island, attack a transfer of personal property on the ground of its invalidity as against creditors.

But in Hooper v. Tuckerman, 3 Sandf. 311, an assignment under the insolvency law of Massachusetts, whether regarded as a voluntary assignment or not, being valid by Massachusetts law, is held sufficient to sustain a suit in New York by the assignees to set aside an earlier assignment of property in New York, which was made in Massachusetts, as void on its face to hinder and defraud creditors, and in fraud of the Massachusetts law.

So far as such transfers are held valid, as in case of citizens of the state in which they are made, it would seem necessary to hold that the assignee had capacity to sue and maintain his title.

The title of such an assignee is substantially the same as that of a receiver; and as to the right of a foreign receiver to sue, see note to GILMAN v. HUDSON RIVER BOAT & SHOE MFG. CO., post, 52.

The effect of a discharge of an insolvent under a state insolvent law, although somewhat akin to the question of the transfer of title to property by assignments or proceedings in another state, is, nevertheless, a distinct subject which is not here considered.

a. Bankruptcy transfers.

1. English decisions.

In Selkirk v. Davies, 2 Dow. 237, 2 Ross. 97, Lord Eldon said: "It was at any rate clear that the English commission passed the personal property in Scotland and all other parts of the world," and it was held that the English bankruptcy proceeding defeated a subsequent arrestment of stock in Scotland.

This represents the English doctrine as to the effect of bankruptcy proceedings to transfer title to personal property of the debtor wherever it may be.

In Jollet v. Deponthieu, reported in a note to 1 H. Bl. 123, it was held that bankruptcy proceedings in who are the plaintiffs in the attachment and the appellants here, are, and since 1863 have been, domiciled at Hamilton, in Canada, and engaged in business there. The defendants in the attachment are citizens of Scotland, and members of the firm of Girdwood & Forrest, wool brokers at Glasgow, which is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,798.85. McCullum, Crease & Sloan, who are the garnisees in the attachment and the appellees in this issue, are citizens of Pennsylvania, doing business in Philadelphia, and indebted to the firm of Girdwood & Forrest in the sum of $3,332.44. On the 11th of October, 1884, proceedings were instituted under the bankrupt laws of Scotland for the sequestration of the estates of the firm of Girdwood & Forrest, and of the several members thereof, for the benefit

Holland with the appointment of curators will defeat a subsequent attachment in London by an English creditor for moneys due the bankrupt, and that such attachment may be restrained by injunction.

In Solomons v. Ross, reported in the same note, the court goes still further and holds that the appointment of curators in Holland for a bankrupt gives them the right to the proceeds of an attachment which had been made before their appointment in a suit then pending.

In Re Davidson, L. R. 15 Eq. 388, 43 L. J. Ch. 347, 21 Week. Rep. 422, it is held that insolvency proceedings in Australia, on the petition of the insolvent, under which debts have been proved and are unpaid, will require the application to such debts all money paid into the court of chancery in England to the credit of the insolvent, whether domiciled there or not, as against a claim of the representatives of his estate in England.

But a fund due to an insolvent under a law in England, if he was domiciled in England, will be paid to his executrix who has proved his will in England as against a claim by his assignees in insolvency appointed in Australia; but otherwise if he was domiciled in Australia. Re Blithman, L. R. 2 Eq. 23, 35 L. J. Ch. 255, 12 Jur. N. S. 84, 14 L. T. N. S. & 35 Beav. 219. But this case does not decide as to the right of such assignees in the fund which is paid to his executrix.

In Ex parte Blakes, 1 Cox, Ch. 308, the court refuses to compel a bankrupt to make an assignment of debts in America, saying, in contemplation of our law the very instrument he is required to execute is of no effect. The court also says: "I had no idea of any country refusing to take notice of the rights of the assignees under our laws, and I believe every country on earth would do it besides."

It is said in 3 Burge, 907, that in Waring v. Knight, in a neé prius case, Lord Mansfield said that an attachment brought by an English creditor after the debtor's bankruptcy in England would not give the assignees the right to recover from the attachment creditor. Also that the same in substance was held by Lord Mansfield in Cleve v. Mills, 3 Burge, 908, note, at the cockpit.

But the English decisions have established the doctrine in England otherwise, and held that in such a case an English creditor who has made an attachment after knowledge of the English bankruptcy on property of the debtor in another country, may be sued for the proceeds by the assignees in assumpsit. Sill v. Worwick, 1 H. Bl. 691; Hunter v. Potts, 4 T. R. 182; Phillips v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 406; Re Robinson, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 385.

But assignees of an English bankrupt, who was a partner in two West India firms, were not allowed to recover from a partnership creditor, who had attached property in the West Indies, unless they could show that there was a surplus after paying the firm debts. Brickwood v. Miller, 3 Merriv. 579.

And an assignee of an English bankrupt cannot recover from a debtor to the bankrupt, who, after the bankruptcy, has been garnished in another jurisdiction. Le Chevalier v. Lynch, 1 Dougl. 170.

that personal property wherever situated passes to a bankrupt's assignees is shown also in the decision that assignees of an Irish bankrupt can maintain a suit in England for assets. Fergusson v. Spencer, 2 Mann. & G. 987, 2 Scott. N. R. 229.

Also in the decision that two of three French syndics can by comity bring suit in England. In this case it does not appear that there was any objection made to the right of the syndics to sue as such, but only to the right of less than all to sue. Alwon v. Furnival, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 296.

2. American decisions.

The American decisions materially limit the rule laid down by the English courts, and refuse generally to allow a foreign bankruptcy to operate as a transfer of personal property which will defeat remedies of resident creditors.

Thus English bankruptcy proceedings are held inoperative to defeat a subsequent attachment by resident creditors. Harrison v. Sterry, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 289, 3 L. ed. 104; Wallace v. Patterson, 2 Harr. & McH. 463; Saunders v. Williams, 5 N. H. 213; Robinson v. Crowder, 4 McCord, L. 519, 17 Am. Dec. 782; Topham v. Chapman, 1 Mill, Const. 283, 12 Am. Dec. 637; Milne v. Moreton, 6 Binn. 353, 6 Am. Dec. 466; Blake v. Williams, 6 Pick. 285, 17 Am. Dec. 372.

A Scotch bankruptcy was held in McNeill v. Colquhoun, 3 N. C. 24, not to defeat the garnishment of an agent of the Scotch sequestrators, at least as to debts not yet collected by him; as to claims collected by him the court did not decide.

In Taylor v. Geary, Kirby, 312, it is held that a bankruptcy commission in England will not prevent subsequent attachment in this country by either American or British creditors.

And in Harrison v. Sterry, supra, assignees under an English bankruptcy were held to have no title to property in the United States and as against them the claims of attaching creditors, some of whom were British, were allowed, but without any discussion of the question whether or not British creditors should be denied the same right of attachment that was allowed to American creditors.

The court held generally that the bankrupt law of a foreign country is incapable of operating a legal transfer of property in the United States.

In Topham v. Chapman, supra, the court said that while the attaching creditors must be presumed to be American citizens, as it did not appear whether they were or not, it would make no difference if they were subjects of Great Britain, where the bankruptcy assignment was made.

But British creditors were denied the right, in Devisme v. Martin, Wythe (Va. Ch. Dec.) 138, to reach assets in this country of a British bankrupt; although it was said that it might be otherwise as to British subjects not domiciled in England.

And British creditors were not allowed in an early Maryland case (1766) to attach the property of a British bankrupt in Maryland. Burk v. McClain, 1 Harr. & McH. 288.

See, to the same effect, the main case of Long v. Forrest, also analogous cases, supra, I, a, 6, and I, b, 8.

The appointment of an assignee in bankruptcy in England will not prevent the bankrupt from of their creditors, and on the 27th of that month Thomas Jackson was confirmed as trustee of said estates, with full right and power to sue for and recover the same wherever situated for the purposes of the trust. Subsequent to these proceedings, and with notice of them, Long & Biaby came to Pennsylvania, issued a writ of foreign attachment against Girdwood & Forrest, and summoned McCallum, Cresse & Sloan as garnishees.

The question presented by the facts above stated is whether the Canadian creditors of the firm of Girdwood & Forrest can, by process of attachment in Pennsylvania, acquire a preference over other creditors of that firm who reside in Scotland or elsewhere within the maintaining an action at law in his own name against his debtor in this country. Blane v. Drummond, 1 Brook. 63.

This decision by the circuit court of the United States was rendered by Chief Justice Marshall in 1808. Ibid.

In Mosselman v. Caen, 34 Barb. 66, 4 Thomp. & C. 171, it was held that our courts will not recognize or enforce a right or title acquired under a foreign bankrupt law, or foreign bankrupt proceedings, so far as affects property within their jurisdiction, or demands against residents of the state; but it is said in Re Waite, 99 N. Y. 433, that these two cases are "unsupported by authority, and are, we think, opposed to sound principles, and are in conflict with the current of authority in this country."

In Re Waite, supra, it is held that a resident of this state, who is a member of a firm which has been adjudged bankrupt in England, in proceedings to which he was a party, is bound thereby to recognize the rights of the assignee in bankruptcy and cannot thereafter, in an accounting in New York, as assignee in insolvency for other parties, be credited with payments made by himself as such assignee to himself as a member of the firm, but that the English assignee in bankruptcy is entitled to such payment.

The doctrine which is declared in Re Waite, supra, to be thoroughly recognized and established in New York is that while the statutory title of foreign assignees in bankruptcy can have no recognition solely by virtue of the foreign statute, yet, under the comity of nations, their title will be recognized and enforced when it can be done without injustice to citizens of the state, or to the rights of creditors pursuing remedies under the state statutes, and when it will not conflict with the laws or public policy of the state.

The case of Abraham v. Plestoro, 8 Wend. 540, 20 Am. Dec. 734, reversing the decision of the chancellor in 1 Paige, 236, 3 L. ed. 690, has been the subject of much comment and contention, and it has been declared to be impossible to determine its effect. Since five opinions were rendered by members of the majority, expressing somewhat different views, it is not strange. But in Re Waite, supra, in which that case is carefully analyzed, it is said that the question of the effect of an English bankrupt assignment, as against the bankrupt, is left undecided, and that "the most obvious ground, in which all who voted for reversal seem to concur, was that an injunction was not a proper remedy."

In Bird v. Caritat, 3 Johns. 342, 3 Am. Dec. 453, it was decided that a suit is properly brought in the name of English bankrupts, but Chief Justice Kent said: "This is more a question concerning form than substance, for there can be no doubt of the right of the assignees to collect the debts due to the bankrupt, either by a suit directly in their own name or as trustees, using the name of the bankrupt." He added: "It is a principle of general practice among nations to admit and give effect to the title of foreign assignees."

In Bird v. Pierpont, 1 Johns. 113, the question was raised, but not decided, whether English assignees in bankruptcy of members of a firm should be made parties to a suit by the firm in this country.

In Menck's Estate, 5 Watts & S. 9, it is held that 23 L. R. A.

an English bankruptcy proceeding gives to the assignee an equitable interest in assets in this country subject to the right of American creditors, so that, in the absence of such creditors, the assignee may bring suit to collect assets.

So it is held in Hunt v. Jackson, 5 Blatchf. 349, that an assignee appointed in foreign bankrupt proceedings may be recognized and allowed to maintain suits to collect assets.

In Dawes v. Boylston, 3 Mass. 337, 6 Am. Dec. 72, the question of the effect of an assignment from assignees of an English bankrupt was involved as affecting the title of an administrator of the bankrupt to whom they had assigned certain assets, but the court does not seem to decide anything about the effect of the English assignment further than that it is not more effectual than it would be if obtained from the bankrupt directly.

A court of the United States has jurisdiction to decide the ownership as between an assignee in bankruptcy of a British subject in this country and the bankrupt himself, who, after his discharge, has become the alleged owner of a claim against the United States which has been sold in the bankruptcy proceedings, where the validity of such sale is attacked, although the fund for the payment of the claim is in the hands of British commissioners, to whom it has been paid by the United States in trust. Phelps v. McDonald, 99 U. S. 298, 25 L. ed. 473, reversing 2 McARTH. 273.

A compulsory payment under foreign attachment in London of a debt due to an English citizen from an American debtor is a valid defense against an attachment in New York, under the act giving relief against absent and absconding debtors, although this was prior in time to the English attachment. Holmes v. Remsen, 20 Johns. 222, 11 Am. Dec. 239, 4 Johns. Ch. 400, 1 L. ed. 902, 8 Am. Dec. 531.

This manifestly involves more than the effect of bankruptcy proceedings and touches the question of foreign judgments.

For effect of foreign bankruptcy on titles to real property, see division following.

II. REAL PROPERTY.

Substantial uniformity exists in respect to the doctrine that involuntary or compulsory transfers under bankruptcy or insolvency laws do not affect real property in another state. Therefore an exemption of a homestead by the federal bankruptcy court sitting in Virginia is held inoperative as to land in West Virginia in favor of a nonresident who is not entitled, under the laws of West Virginia, to claim a homestead in that state. Gibbs v. Logan, 22 W. Va. 206.

So bankruptcy proceedings in the southern district of Louisiana do not transfer title to land in Texas, and a purchaser at the bankruptcy sale in Louisiana does not get even an equitable title to such land. Barnett v. Pool, 23 Tex. 517.

And a decree in bankruptcy by the district court of the United States sitting in the western district of Louisiana did not pass to the assignee title to real estate in Texas, which was then a foreign state. Oakey v. Bennett, 52 U. S. 11 How. 33, 13 L. ed. 563.

The English decisions which, in respect to personal property, go further than the decisions in British dominions, when the effects of the firm have been duly transferred under the laws of Scotland to a trustee for the benefit of all its creditors. Harrison v. Sterry, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 289, 3 L. ed. 104; Green v. Van Buskirk, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 189, 19 L. ed. 109, and Warner's App. 18 W. N. C. 505,—are cited by the appellants to sustain their contention for a preference. But these cases are not in point. In Harrison v. Sterry the attachments were prior to the assignment. In Green v. Van Buskirk the main question was whether the judgment of an Illinois court in an attachment proceeding should have the same effect in New York on the title to the property attached as in the state in which it was rendered, and it was held this country in holding bankruptcy proceedings sufficient to pass title to personal property wherever situated, hold the contrary doctrine in respect to real property, therefore it is held that any bankruptcy proceedings in England do not transfer the title to slaves in the island of Antigua, where they are regarded as real property. Ex parte Rucker, 3 Deacon & Ch. 704, 1 Mont. & A. 481.

An insolvency proceeding in Australia will not pass title to land in England, although it is said that possibly the insolvent might have been called upon to make over and transfer the title to his assignee; but not having done this, the title did not pass. Waite v. Bingley, L. R. 21 Ch. Div. 474, 51 L. J. Ch. 651, 30 Week. Rep. 698.

An insolvency proceeding in India does not pass title to real estate in Java, unless the law of that island makes the conveyance operative. Cookrell v. Dickens, 1 Mont. D. & De G. 54, 3 Moore, P. C. C. 98.

And the court in England has no authority to compel a bankrupt to convey his real estate in Scotland. Selkirk v. Davies, 2 Dow, 227, 2 Rose, 97.

In respect to voluntary assignments for creditors the decisions are not so uniform, and somewhat different questions arise.

The general doctrine seems to be fairly established that a voluntary assignment for creditors, if it is so executed as to constitute a sufficient conveyance, or accompanied by such conveyance, although it is made in trust for creditors, will be upheld in other states as to land there situated, unless the provisions of the assignment are against the policy of the local laws. In other words, that the same general rule which applies to all other voluntary transfers of real property applies to such assignment.

That a court has no jurisdiction to declare a mortgage to be a general assignment so far as it applies to lands in another state is decided in Danner v. Brewer, 69 Ala. 191, thus clearly recognizing the doctrine that the transfer of land must depend on the laws of the state in which it is situated.

But an assignment is not void because it undertakes to include real property in another state. Watkins v. Wallace, 19 Mich. 57.

In Osborn v. Adams, 18 Pick. 245, it is held that a statutory assignment for creditors in another state is void as to real property.

A general assignment for creditors in Pennsylvania was held in McCullough v. Bodrick, 2 Ohio, 284, to be ineffectual to pass title to Ohio lands, and that it would create at most only an equity, which would not change the descent of the legal title. The assignment in this case was of all the debtor's estate in trust, with the authority to any attorney to appear for the assignor in an amicable ejectment in the name of the assignee and confess judgment for the land. This clearly was not such a conveyance as is required to pass title in most places.

A conveyance by the insolvent debtor to effectuate a general assignment, being a mere voluntary conveyance in trust for creditors, was held in Osborn v. Adams, supra, to be without consideration and ineffectual as against subsequent attachments in the state where the land lies.

But the other decisions all recognize a different doctrine.

Thus in Rodgers v. Allen, 3 Ohio, 489, it is held that the assignor for creditors in another state should make a formal deed of conveyance to his trustees, else the title would not pass to land in Ohio, and no equity enforceable by a court of chancery would be created as to such lands.

Where an assignment for creditors in New York is accompanied by a regular deed to the assignee, it is valid to pass title to Ohio lands as against a subsequent attachment in Ohio by resident creditors. Sortwell v. Jewett, 9 Ohio, 150.

A New Jersey assignment for creditors containing apt words and rightly executed as a conveyance is sufficient to pass title to land in Pennsylvania. Lamb v. Fries, 2 Pa. 63.

And a trust deed for a portion of the grantor's creditors made in another state may be upheld in Michigan as a common-law transfer against subsequent attachments in that state made before the registry of the instrument. Palmer v. Mason, 43 Mich. 152.

An auction sale by an assignee for creditors of lands situated in another state may be valid in the latter state, at least as against a nonresident who claims no part of the assets at the hands of the assignee. Pemberton v. Klein, 43 N. J. Eq. 98.

An assignment by an insolvent debtor to secure his discharge from arrest, under the insolvent laws of another state, cannot pass title to real estate in New Jersey. Hutcheson v. Peshine, 16 N. J. Eq. 187.

This is especially true where the assignment was for the benefit of the execution creditors only, while in New Jersey preferences are not allowed. Ibid.

In Bentley v. Whittemore, 18 N. J. Eq. 306, it was held that an assignment in another state with preferences, which is valid where it was made, is invalid as to lands in New Jersey, and that a conveyance by such assignee is therefore invalid.

But this decision was reversed in 19 N. J. Eq. 403, 97 Am. Dec. 671, by the court of errors and appeals, which held that a conveyance by an insolvent debtor, as auxiliary to an assignment for creditors made in another state, under which the assignees had acted and sold the land, was effectual as against a subsequent levy by creditors who were all non-residents, though only a part of them were residents of the state in which the assignment was made.

An assignment for creditors made in another state which gives preferences contrary to the policy of the laws of Iowa will be void as to real property in Iowa. Moore v. Church, 70 Iowa, 208, 59 Am. Rep. 439.

The law is the same notwithstanding the parties to the action are all residents of the state in which the assignment was made. Ibid.

An assignment for creditors containing preferences made in the District of Columbia, which is against the policy of Iowa laws, is held invalid as to Iowa lands, and will not be upheld, even for the equal benefit of creditors, against an attaching creditor, although he is a nonresident, and having obtained judgment, he may have such conveyance set aside as a cloud on title. Loving v. Pairo, 10 Iowa, 282, 77 Am. Dec. 108.

But a voluntary conveyance for creditors, though made with express reference and subject to the that the judgment of a New York court, which denied to the Illinois judgment this effect, was erroneous. The contest was between the holders of a chattel mortgage and an attaching creditor of the mortgagor. Bates, who resided in Troy, N. Y., was the owner of certain iron safes in Chicago, Ill., and to secure his indebtedness to Van Buskirk and others executed and delivered to them a chattel mortgage on the safes. Two days after the execution and delivery of this mortgage, Green, who was also a creditor of Bates and a citizen of New York, instituted attachment proceedings in Illinois, by virtue of which the safes restrictions of a statute in another state, is effectual to convey land in Iowa, where the execution of the deed of assignment and the provisions of the statute are substantially in accord with the law of Iowa. King v. Glass, 73 Iowa, 205.

In this case two judges dissented on the ground that the statute governing the assignment was not substantially like that of the state in which the land was situated. Ibid.

Failure of acknowledgment in another state so as to prevent recording in Iowa will not defeat an assignment as against an attachment as the statute as to recording does not allow an attachment to defeat an unrecorded deed. Munson v. Fraser, 73 Iowa, 177.

An assignment for creditors with preferences made in Pennsylvania was upheld as to real property in Louisiana, of which the assignee was in possession, as against a levy by a creditor. Merchants Bank of Baltimore v. Bank of United States, 2 La. Ann. 660.

So although insolvency proceedings in another state cannot operate to convey title to real property, an attachment by a nonresident, whose domicile is in the state where the insolvency proceedings are had, may be denied a preference under his attachment, as against the insolvent's assignee on the ground of comity. Eddy v. Winchester, 60 N. H. 62.

An assignment for creditors, with a deed to the assignee made in Illinois, was held in Nebraska to be valid as against a citizen of Illinois in respect to Nebraska land,—especially where such citizen had claimed the benefit of the Illinois assignment, although no copy of the assignment had been filed in Nebraska. Green v. Gross, 12 Neb. 117.

So an assignment for creditors made in another state will be upheld as to real property in Maine as against nonresident creditors,—especially where they have assented to the assignment and accepted its benefits. Chafee v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York, 71 Me. 514, 36 Am. Rep. 345.

The fact that a resident of the state in which an assignment was made accepts its benefits in that state does not estop him from denying the validity of the assignment as to real property in another state,—especially where he expressly reserves his right to do so and makes his claim only with respect to the property in the jurisdiction. Moore v. Church, supra.

A trust assignment in Delaware, which is valid there but which was not recorded in Maryland as the statute requires, although it was held not to transfer real property in Maryland; was held to convey at least an equitable right to unpaid purchase money for the lands which had been sold. Houston v. Nowland, 7 Gill & J. 480.

The validity of an assignment for creditors made in Rhode Island must be determined in Illinois as to real property in that state by the law of Illinois. Gardner v. Commercial Nat. Bank of Providence, 36 Ill. 293.

Title to a leasehold estate will pass by an assignment for creditors made in another state, but not to defeat attachments by resident creditors. Eyer v. Alexander, 106 Ill. 385.

A sale in Illinois by an assignee for creditors of real estate in Kansas will not be sufficient to convey title, if the sale is made without an order of court as required in such cases by the Kansas law, although the assignment for creditors in Illinois conformed to the law of Kansas. Thompkins v. Adams, 41 Kan. 33.

III. SHIPS ON HIGH SEAS.

An assignment by the judge in an insolvency proceeding, under the Massachusetts statute is sufficient to transfer title to undivided shares in a ship on the high seas as against a subsequent attachment levied on the ship in a New York court. Crapo v. Kelly, 38 U. S. 18 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 430.

The majority of the court in this case considered that the title to the ship passed by the assignment, as if the ship had been at the time within the jurisdiction of the court, as, being on the high seas, it remains a portion of the territory of the state for that purpose, and that the subsequent return of the ship to an American port could not divest a title which had already vested in the assignee. Ibid.

The decision in Crapo v. Kelly, supra, reverses that of the court of appeals of New York in Kelly v. Crapo, 45 N. Y. 86, 6 Am. Rep. 35, by which the judgment of the general term had been reversed.

The above case was that of a transfer by operation of an insolvency statute and is therefore a stronger exercise of comity than that of the following cases in respect to voluntary assignments.

The New York court of appeals which denied effect to the transfer in the above case had held that a voluntary assignment by an insolvent debtor in North Carolina, including a vessel on the high seas, will be upheld in New York in a suit by the assignee to recover the vessel which has returned to a port of that state. Moore v. Willett, 35 Barb. 663.

An assignment for creditors in Virginia of an undivided half of a ship at sea was considered in a Louisiana case in which the ship had been attached, and the court, reciting the fact that the parties to the assignment were domiciled in Virginia and that the ship was at sea when it was made, said that this inquiry was "necessarily confined to the validity of the instrument according to the laws of Virginia." Graves v. Hoy, 13 La. 454, 33 Am. Dec. 563.

And in a later Louisiana case it is held that a ship on the high seas will pass by an assignment in trust for creditors, so as to protect it from attachment on arriving at port in another state, even before it has been taken into possession by the assignees. Southern Bank v. Wood, 14 La. Ann. 561, 74 Am. Dec. 443.

In this case the attaching creditor was a citizen of the state in which the assignment was made, but this must be considered immaterial under the doctrine of Kelly v. Crapo, supra.

The same was held in Thuret v. Jenkins, 7 Mart. (La.) 318, 12 Am. Dec. 503, as to a bill of sale of a ship at sea.

The subject of bankruptcy and insolvency transfers of property beyond the jurisdiction is much the same as that of the transfer to a receiver of property beyond the jurisdiction. In fact there is no difference in the principle involved in these different modes of transferring the property of an insolvent to a representative of creditors, whether called assignee, syndic, curator, or receiver. But the cases which specifically relate to receivers of property outside the jurisdiction are considered in a separate note to the case of GILMAN v. HUDSON RIVER BOAT & SHOE MFG. CO., post, 52.

were levied upon and subsequently sold in satisfaction of his debt. At the time this attachment was issued the mortgage had not been recorded in Illinois, possession of the safes had not been delivered under it, and Green did not know of its existence. By the laws of Illinois the mortgage was of no validity against the rights and interests of third persons, and the attaching creditor was on the footing of a purchaser. The proceedings were regular, and under these laws a justification of the creditor in the seizure and sale of the property. In a suit brought by the mortgagees against the attaching creditor in a New York court, for taking and converting the safes, it was adjudged, on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, that the attachment proceedings in Illinois constituted a valid defense. The points covered by the judgment were that a state has a right to regulate the transfer of personal property situate within its limits, and to subject the same to process and execution in its own way, by its own laws, and that the decrees of its courts, in conformity with these laws, are conclusive in other jurisdictions. In Warner's Appeal, the attaching creditors, at the time of issuing their attachment, had no actual knowledge of the assignment, and were therefore held to be within the protection of the proviso to the first section of the Act of May 3, 1855 (Pub. Laws, 415). It does not appear in the reports of the case that they were citizens of the state in which the assignment was made, and the question of comity between the states was not raised or considered. But in Bacon v. Horne, 123 Pa. 452, 3 L. R. A. 355, it was distinctly held by this court that a resident of a foreign state in which an assignment was made by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors could not come into Pennsylvania, and seize property of the assignor in a suit in foreign attachment. It was stated in the case last cited that the manifest object of the Act of 1855 was to protect our own citizens, and it was plainly intimated that none but Pennsylvania creditors can invoke its protection. It matters not whether the attaching creditor is a resident of the state in which the assignment is made, or of another state foreign to this jurisdiction. If he is a citizen of a foreign state, he can receive no aid here in an effort to obtain a preference in disregard of the assignment. Louvy v. Hall, 2 Watts & S. 181, 88 Am. Dec. 495; Merrick's Estate, 5 Watts & S. 9; and Bacon v. Horne, supra. This rule rests on comity between the states, and the only exception to it is in favor of our own citizens. The proceedings in Scotland or the sequestration of the estates of Girdwood & Forrest were founded on the petition of the members of the firm, and are operative against all its creditors residing there. We are now asked by creditors having their domicile in another part of the British dominions to disregard these proceedings, and allow them a preference upon the firm effects in Pennsylvania. This we cannot do without an abandonment of our well-settled policy in such cases,—a policy founded in comity and promotive of justice.

We have considered this case on the undisputed testimony, which shows the facts as we have stated them, and we have allowed to the certified copy of the act and warrant appointing Thomas Jackson sequestrator, which was admitted in evidence under the agreement of the parties, the effect which on its face belongs to it. It was not error to refuse to strike out evidence so admitted.

The appellants have reduced their claim against Girdwood & Forrest to judgment, and are seeking to obtain satisfaction of it out of property which they allege belongs to the defendants therein. The appellees admit that prior to October 11, 1884, they were indebted to Girdwood & Forrest, and that they have not paid the debt, but they aver that, by virtue of the proceedings in bankruptcy under the laws of Scotland, Thomas Jackson, the trustee, has a right to receive it which is superior to the claim of the appellants under their attachment. In the issue thus made the question is whether the debt attached belongs to Girdwood & Forrest, or to the trustee for the benefit of their creditors. The evidence relating to an alleged fraud upon the appellants can have no influence in the determination of it. The specifications of error are overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

1. The rule that a voluntary assignment for creditors is valid in other states when upheld by the law of the domicile of the owner does not apply to an assignment which, though voluntarily made, is made under a statute which provides for a discharge of the debts of all creditors who accept any dividends under the assignment or otherwise participate therein, but such an assignment is to be treated as a transfer in invitum under insolvency or bankruptcy laws.

2. An attachment will be upheld as against a prior assignment for the benefit of creditors in another state, which is in fact a transfer in invitum under insolvent laws.

3. Attaching creditors, although non-

NOTE.—The above case with LONG v. FORREST, ante, 33, and GILMAN v. HUDSON RIVER BOOT & SHOE MFG. CO. post, 52, present in different phases the question, which is constantly growing more important, of the effect of transfers of various kinds to representatives of an insolvent so far as re-residents, who seek to question a preference in a prior assignment under an insolvent law of their own state are entitled to the same protection and preference under attachment laws as if they were residents.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of a special term for St. Lawrence County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to secure possession of certain of the assets of the Wilkin Manufacturing Company, which had been attached by defendants to secure their claims. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Nelson L. Robinson, for appellant:

The statutes of Wisconsin under which the assignment of the Wilkin Manufacturing Company was made, constitute an insolvent law and the assignee obtained no title to the property in question as against the attaching creditors of the assignor.

Assignments made under insolvency or bankruptcy proceedings have no extraterritorial effect.

This statute is clearly recognized to be an insolvent law by the supreme court of Wisconsin in Hempsted v. Wisconsin Marine & N. Ins. Co. Bank, 78 Wis. 375.

It is also expressly decided to be an insolvent law in Holton v. Burton, 78 Wis. 321.

An assignment, whether made on the motion of the insolvent or by decree of the court, is one in an insolvency or bankruptcy proceeding, provided that the debts due from the insolvent to his creditors may be compulsorily discharged in that proceeding.

Upton v. Hubbard and McClure v. Campbell, supra, and cases cited; Mayer v. Hellman, 91 U. S. 496, 23 L. ed. 377.

The court below erred in its conclusion that a corporation cannot be discharged from its debts under the statute, but that after making an assignment it should not "be enabled to begin anew and run again its course."

The word "person" is a general term and prima facie in a public statute, includes artificial as well as natural persons, unless it appears from the context that the word was used in a more limited sense.

8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 625; 18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 404; N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 677, § 5.

It has been expressly held in Minnesota that 23 L. R. A.

the compulsory discharge of a corporation under a similar statute should be upheld.

Mohr v. Minnesota Elev. Co. 40 Minn. 843; Willis v. Mabon, 16 L. R. A. 281, 43 Minn. 140.

A corporation generally has, like an individual, power to go into insolvency when unable to pay its debts, unless such right is restricted by charter or some statutory enactment.

2 Kent, Com. p. 898; De Huyter v. St. Peter's Church, 3 N. Y. 288; 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 204, 205, and cases cited; Burrill, Assignm. 3d ed. 85, 401; Angell & A. Priv. Corp. § 191; Tripp v. Northwestern Nat. Bank, 45 Minn. 883.

The court below fell into error in assuming, as it seems, that the sole reason why assignments under an insolvency law have no extraterritorial effect, is because it is supposed that some preference might be given to home creditors were the laws otherwise, and that an assignment without preferences obviates such objection.

The compulsory discharge of a debt without full payment is the true reason on which all the decisions are based, and the question of preferences and an equal division of the assets of the corporation has nothing to do with the matter.

Thompson v. Fry, 51 Hun, 296; Mayer v. Hellman, 91 U. S. 496, 23 L. ed. 377.

The assignment made in Wisconsin by the Wilkin Manufacturing Company was repugnant to the laws and policy of the state of New York. Therefore the assignee obtained no right as against the attaching creditors to property situated in this state, and cannot contest in our courts claims lawfully levied here upon the property of his assignor by citizens of this state or by any other persons lawfully suing in its courts.

The New York court will, in the exercise of judicial comity, treat the assignment the same as the Wisconsin court would a New York assignment.

Mowry v. Crocker, 6 Wis. 326; Smith v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 23 Wis. 267; Cook v. Van Horn, 81 Wis. 291.

The Wisconsin statute regulating assignments (Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat. chap. 60, p. 1005,) does not alter their voluntary character; but, like the New York act, regulates the exercise of the right to assign and prescribes the duties of the assignee. The assignment in Wisconsin remains, as here, a voluntary general assignment for the benefit of creditors.

The defendants, New York banks, took these past due claims with the evident purpose of aiding a few of the Wisconsin creditors in circumventing the law which was binding upon them. They do not, therefore, occupy the position of New York creditors in good faith, for whose benefit the court will feel constrained to condemn the assignment. The court will apply the rule that it would if the Wisconsin creditors interested here were before it.

Bacon v. Horne, 2 L. R. A. 855, 123 Pa. 452; Bagby v. Atlantic M. & O. R. Co. 86 Pa. 291; Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 248, 48 Am. Rep. 616; Chafes v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York, 71 Me. 514, 86 Am. Rep. 845.

The right of a corporation to make an assignment in Wisconsin is not repugnant to our law, as it relates to matter of form and not of substance; it is a matter of domestic regulation and does not permit any different disposition of the assets of the corporation than there would be had under a receiver in New York. The New York court will look to the intent and effect of the transfer.

Ockerman v. Cross, 54 N. Y. 29; Warner v. Jaffray, supra.

The right of a corporation to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors is clear, unless prohibited by statute.

DeRuyter v. St. Paul's Church, 3 N. Y. 238.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general rule that the validity of a transfer of personal property is governed by the law of the domicile of the owner is in most jurisdictions held to apply to a transfer by voluntary assignment by a debtor of all his property for the benefit of creditors, as well as to a specific transfer by way of ordinary sale or contract; and the title of such assignee, valid by the law of the domicile, will prevail against the lien of an attachment issued and levied in another state or country subsequent to the assignment, in favor of a creditor there, whether a citizen or nonresident, upon a debt or chattel belonging to the assignor, embraced in the assignment, provided the recognition of the title under the assignment would not contravene the statutory law of the state or be repugnant to its public policy. The decisions are not uniform, but this is the general rule, supported by the preponderating weight of authority, and is the settled law of this state. Ockerman v. Cross, 54 N. Y. 29; Bishop, Insolvent Debtors, §§ 241, 265, and cases cited. But this general rule is subject to a qualification established in the jurisprudence of the American states,—that a title to personal property acquired in invitum under foreign insolvent or bankrupt laws, good according to the law of the jurisdiction where the proceedings were taken, will not be recognized in another jurisdiction where it comes in conflict with the rights of creditors pursuing their remedy there against the property of the debtor, although the proceedings were instituted subsequent to and with notice of the transfer in insolvency or bankruptcy. Holmes v. Remsen, 20 Johns. 229, 11 Am. Dec. 269; Kelly v. Orapo, 45 N. Y. 87, 6 Am. Rep. 35; Re Waite, 99 N. Y. 433; 2 Kent, Com. 406, 407.

This exception proceeds upon the view that to give effect to such a transfer arising by operation of law, and not based upon the voluntary exercise by the owner of the ius disponendi, would be to give the foreign law an extraterritorial operation, which the rule of comity ought not to permit to the prejudice of suitors in another jurisdiction. The cases in this state since the case of Holmes v. Remsen, supra, in which the chancellor sought to maintain the English doctrine on the subject, have uniformly sustained the rights of domestic attaching creditors against a title under a prior statutory assignment in another state or country, the several states of the Union being treated for this purpose as foreign to each other. Willits v. Waite, 25 N. Y. 577; Johnson v. Hunt, 23 Wend. 87; Kelly v. Orapo, supra.

The general question in this case involves the point whether the assignment made by the Wilkin Manufacturing Company, under the statutes of Wisconsin, is to be treated as a voluntary assignment, not in conflict with our laws or policy, or whether, in view of the compulsory clauses of the Wisconsin statute, that statute is to be regarded as in the nature of a bankrupt law, and ineffectual to transfer title to the property of the insolvent in our jurisdiction as against attaching creditors. In considering whether the title of the assignee in Wisconsin is paramount to the claims of creditors here, who, subsequent to the assignment, procured attachments against the debt owing to the Wilkin Manufacturing Company by the Canton Lumber Company, a reference to the Wisconsin statute under which the assignment was made becomes important. The original Wisconsin statute upon the subject of voluntary assignments by failing debtors was similar to the statute in this state upon the same subject. It was a statute prescribing the conditions of such assignments, and regulating the administration of the trust for the protection of creditors. In 1869 radical changes were made in the statutory system of Wisconsin, and the prior statute was amended. The amendments, among other things, provided that the assignor in a voluntary assignment for the benefit of his creditors, made under or in pursuance of the laws of the state, "may be discharged from his debts, as a part of the proceedings under such assignment, upon compliance with the provisions of this act." It further declared that every creditor of the insolvent debtor residing within or without the state who should accept a dividend out of the assigned estate, or in any way, by proving his claim or otherwise, participate in the proceedings under the assignment, shall be "deemed to have appeared in the matter of such assignment and the application for a discharge, and should be bound by any order or discharge granted by the court," subject to the right of appeal. Under the statute, a creditor, by accepting a dividend, thereby consented to a discharge of the debtor from the portion of the debt remaining over and above his share of the assets; and, unless a creditor comes in under the assignment, he is debarred from receiving anything out of the assigned property, unless, indeed, a surplus should remain after payment of the participating creditors in full.

although it seems the debt would remain as a claim against the insolvent. The power to discharge a contract without payment or satisfaction, and without the consent of the parties, is a power which pertains to the sovereign alone. The statute of Wisconsin does not assume to discharge the debts owing by the insolvent assignor absolutely. But, as has been said, it deprives creditors who do not come in under the assignment of all share in the assigned estate, unless in the improbable contingency of a surplus. This coercive feature of the scheme, if contained in a voluntary general assignment for the benefit of creditors, would render the assignment void. Grover v. Wakeman, 11 Wend. 189, 25 Am. Dec. 624. The statute of Wisconsin, however, incorporates this feature, and the law is recognized by the courts of Wisconsin as an insolvent law. Holton v. Burton, 78 Wis. 321; Hempstead v. Wisconsin Marine & P. Ins. Co. Bank, 78 Wis. 375. This court had occasion in the case of Boese v. King, 78 N. Y. 471, to consider a similar provision in a statute of New Jersey, regulating voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors in that state, and it was assumed that the provision in that act was in the nature of a bankrupt law. Effect cannot be given here to this coercive feature in the Wisconsin law, except by giving extraterritorial effect to the law of that state. The assignor had no power to make such a condition, and, if it is legal, it is by force of the Wisconsin statute alone. This feature is one of the distinguishing tests of an insolvent or bankrupt law. The assignment was voluntary in the sense that the Wilkin Manufacturing Company were not coerced into executing it, and the title to the property was vested in the assignee by its own act. But whether it is to be treated as voluntary in another jurisdiction when the claims of creditors there are in question is the point. The assignment purports to have been made under and in pursuance of the law of Wisconsin. The assignor, by proceeding under that law, presumably designed to avail itself of the provision for a discharge. This could only be accomplished by force of the law. The right of an insolvent or bankrupt to initiate voluntary proceedings in bankruptcy is a common feature in bankrupt laws, but that fact does not make the assignment voluntary, so as to give extraterritorial operation to the proceedings. This point was adverted to in the case of Upton v. Hubbard, 28 Conn. 274, 78 Am. Dec. 670, where the court said: "In our view there is essentially no difference whether in consequence of an act of bankruptcy, as in England, the bankrupt's estate is forced from him, or he himself sets the law in motion by a conveyance in bankruptcy in the first instance." Under the Wisconsin statute the transfer is voluntary, but the law then steps in and regulates the distribution of the assigned estate in accordance with conditions which the sovereign alone can impose. It would, we think, be disregarding the substance to hold that the voluntary feature of the law distinguishes it from the class of bankrupt or insolvent statutes which, by general consent in this country, are held to be ineffectual to transfer the title of the insolvent to property in another state, as against attaching creditors there.

It is claimed, however, in behalf of the plaintiff, that, assuming that the title of the assignee would be subordinate to the lien of attachments issued here at the suit of resident creditors, this priority cannot be availed of in behalf of Wisconsin creditors who, knowing of the assignment, seek to gain a preference under our attachment laws, and that the banks to whom the claims were assigned after maturity, and who took with notice of the assignment stand in no better position than the original creditors. In some of the states, which refuse to recognize the validity of the title of a foreign assignee, even in case of voluntary assignment, where it comes in conflict with the claims of domestic creditors, a distinction is made; and it is held that, where the domicile of the foreign assignee and the creditor is the same, the latter will be bound by the title of the former, good by the law of the common domicile. May v. Wannemacher, 111 Mass. 202; Sanderson v. Bradford, 10 N. H. 260; Moore v. Bonnell, 51 N. J. L. 90. The principle of comity in these states is held to apply so as to subject nonresidents to the operation of the foreign law, but not so as to prevent domestic creditors from pursuing their remedy in defiance of the foreign assignment. Faulkner v. Hyman, 142 Mass. 53. The question is not an open one in this state. We have refused to adopt the distinction made in some of the states, and have placed the right of a creditor coming here from the state of the common domicile upon the same footing as that of a citizen or resident creditor, and have sustained the lien of an attachment issued here at the instance of a foreign creditor after proceedings in insolvency had been instituted in the state of the common domicile of the insolvent and creditor. Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe, 84 N. Y. 367, 38 Am. Rep. 518. There the debtor and attaching creditor were Louisiana corporations. The attachment was issued after the debtor bank had been placed in liquidation under the laws of that state, and commissioners had been appointed to take possession of and administer its assets. Danforth, J., after stating the general rule that the law of Louisiana could have no operation here, referring to the point now under consideration, said: "The plaintiff, as we have seen, although a foreign creditor, is rightfully in our courts pursuing a remedy given by our statutes. It may enforce that remedy to the same extent, and in the same manner, and with the same priority, as a citizen. . . . Once properly in court, and accepted as a suitor, neither the law, nor court administering the law, will admit any distinction between the citizen of its own state and that of another." How far our courts will enforce the title of a foreign assignee in bankruptcy as between the assignee and the bankrupt or his creditors, where all the parties have a common domicile abroad, was much discussed in the case of Abraham v. Plestoro, 3 Wend. 548, 20 Am. Dec. 738, and that case, with others, were reviewed in the case of Re Waite, supra. The authority of Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe upon the point now in question was expressly recognized and approved in Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 248, 48 Am. Rep. 616, and it must be regarded as establishing the law of the state on the subject. In Warner v. Jaffray the court refused to interfere with liens acquired by citizens of this state upon personal property in another state under the laws of that state, belonging to an insolvent resident here, under proceedings commenced after a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, valid by the laws of this state, had been made and delivered. It was in substance held that creditors of the assignor, citizens of this state, were not, because of such citizenship, precluded from taking proceedings in another state, hostile to the assignment, for the purpose of acquiring priority in respect of personal property situated there, embraced in the assignment. See also Johnson v. Hunt, supra. The courts of this state accord to our citizens the same liberty to proceed in another jurisdiction in hostility to assignments executed here which they accord to citizens of other states coming here, and instituting proceedings in hostility to transfers in insolvency, valid by the laws of their domicile. The rule in New York on the question is also the rule in other states. McClure v. Campbell, 71 Wis. 350; Rhawn v. Pearce, 110 Ill. 350, 51 Am. Rep. 691; South Boston Iron Co. v. Boston Locomotive Works, 51 Me. 585; Upton v. Hubbard, supra.

It follows, therefore, that the attachments in question created valid liens on the debt attached in priority to the title under the assignment, assuming the claim of the plaintiff that the banks stood in no better position than the Wisconsin creditors.

The point that the provisions in the Wisconsin statute providing for a discharge of insolvent debtors apply to natural persons only, and not to corporations, is opposed to the statutory construction of the word "person," defined in the Revised Statutes of that state; and there is nothing in the charter of the corporation, so far as appears, or in the statutes of Wisconsin, which takes from this corporation the general powers which, in the absence of any statutory or charter restriction, belong to corporations to make an assignment in insolvency. De Ruyter v. St. Peter's Church, 8 N. Y. 288. This judgment is not, we think, in accord with the law of this state, and must therefore be reversed. The case was argued at our bar with great ability, and the researches of the several counsel have materially lightened the labors of the court.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

All concur.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Alfred GILMAN, Admr., etc., of Winthrop W. Gilman, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

(84 Wis. 60.)

A receiver of a foreign corporation appointed in another state in proceedings to dissolve the corporation has a right to a debt due the corporation as against an attempt at garnishment of the debt by a non-resident creditor of the corporation who is a citizen of the state in which the corporation existed and in which the receiver was appointed.

(January 10, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of the intervenor as receiver of the Hudson River Boot & Shoe Manufacturing Company in a garnishment proceeding to reach a debt due from Hubbard & Baker to such corporation. Affirmed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

The case was that the plaintiff, in his representative capacity as administrator of the estate of Winthrop W. Gilman, deceased, on the 24th day of September, 1891, was a creditor of the Hudson River Boot & Shoe Manufacturing Company, a corporation created and existing under the general laws of the state of New York, in which state the plaintiff also resided, in the sum of $947.87, and commenced an action in the circuit court of Milwaukee county, in which Hubbard & Baker, of West Superior, Wis., were garnished, as being indebted to the said corporation, September 26, 1891; and on the 14th of the following month they filed their answer, admitting an indebtedness to the defendant of $545.41, and paid that sum into court. On the 8th of February, 1892, by stipulation between the plaintiff's attorneys and the attorneys for William M. Ketcham, the interpleading claimant, he was allowed to interplead in respect to his claim to said money, and serve his answer within twenty days thereafter. In his answer he alleged that he was a resident and citizen of New York, and that on and prior to the 29th of July, 1891, the defendant, the Hudson River Boot & Shoe Manufacturing Company, was a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of that state, and the garnishees were indebted to it in the sum stated in their answer and so paid into court. That on the 28th of July, 1891, proceedings were commenced in the supreme court of the state of New York in and for Dutchess county, in a case entitled "In the matter of the applica-

NOTE.—Rights of receiver as to property outside of the jurisdiction in which he is appointed.

It is well established that the appointment of a receiver in another jurisdiction will be given effect by a court only as an exercise of comity in respect to property outside of the jurisdiction of the court in which the receiver was appointed; but the extent to which this comity will be carried is not entirely settled.

An assignment made by a receiver in another state under order of the court of a debt against a local corporation was considered in Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 338, but was not decided, although an opinion was expressed on each side of the question by different judges.

But on subsequent hearing, Hoyt v. Thompson, 19 N. Y. 307, it was decided that no extraterritorial effect could be given to such a transfer by operation of statute, and that comity did not regard its recognition to the extent of divesting the title of the citizens of the state in which the action was brought.

Receivers appointed by a circuit court of the United States sitting in one state for a railroad company whose line extends into other states do not acquire control of that portion of the property situated in another state so as to deprive a circuit court in that state of the right to appoint other receivers of such property. Atkins v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 161.

But receivers of a foreign insurance company appointed in the state of its creation are entitled to the assets of the company for distribution among all the creditors as against a local receiver appointed for the benefit of policy holders in that state only, and an ancillary receiver may be appointed to convert the assets into money and remit the proceeds to the foreign receiver. Parsons v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 305.

In foreclosure suits brought in several states on railroad mortgages in which the same person was appointed receiver in each state, it was held that the proceedings in each state were independent; but the question of the power of a receiver under an appointment in another state was not raised. Re United States Rolling Stock Co. 55 How. Pr. 238.

After the decision in 55 How. Pr. 238, a petition to amend the complaint and order appointing the receiver so as to render the action collateral or ancillary to that pending in another state, in which the greater part of the railroad was situated, was made, but the court refused to transfer to the tribunal of another state its own administration of the receivership. Taylor v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 57 How. Pr. 9.

An insolvency assignee of a foreign corporation, which has been adjudged insolvent on a petition, under Vermont Rev. Laws, § 1820, has a right of action in that state on an insurance policy for a loss occurring in that state as against a receiver of the corporation appointed in the state of its domicile. Platt v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 62 Vt. 166.

As to attachment.

In the main case of GILMAN v. HUDSON RIVER BOOT & SHOE MFG. CO. the court recognized the right of the receiver as against garnishment by a citizen of the same state in which the receiver was appointed.

In harmony with this is the decision in Bagby v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co., 36 Pa. 291, that a Virginia receiver is entitled to the assets in Pennsylvania as against subsequent garnishment by Virginia creditors.

Likewise the decision in Merchants Nat. Bank v. McLeod, 38 Ohio St. 174, that an attachment in Ohio of the rolling stock of a Kentucky railroad by a Kentucky creditor pending an application in tion of a majority of the trustees of the Hudson River Boot & Shoe Manufacturing Company for a final order dissolving said corporation," for the purpose of effecting a voluntary dissolution of the corporation and the distribution of its effects, which proceedings were carried on under and in pursuance of title 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, chap. 17, §§ 2419-2490, entitled "Proceedings for the voluntary dissolution of a corporation" (8 Bliss' N. Y. Code, § 2418). That a petition had been presented to the supreme court, in substance as required by the statute, by a majority of the trustees, stating, among other things, that the stock, effects, and other property of the corporation were not sufficient to pay the just demands for which it was liable, or to afford a reasonable security to those who might deal with it, and that the petitioners deemed it beneficial for the interests of the stockholders that it should be dissolved; a schedule being annexed thereto containing a true account of all the creditors of the corporation and unsatisfied engagements, a statement of the name and place of each creditor, etc., a statement of the sum owing to each creditor or other person, etc., a statement of the true cause and consideration of the indebtedness to each creditor, a full, just, and true inventory of all the property, etc., of the corporation, a statement of each incumbrance upon its property, and a full, just, and true account of the capital stock of the corporation, specifying the name of each stockholder, which was duly verified. The court made an order July 29, 1891, requiring all persons interested to show cause before the court, at special term to be held October 31, 1891, why the said corporation should not be dissolved. That on the same day, upon notice and verified petition of the president of the corporation, served upon the attorney-general of the state of New York, he consented that the motion be granted, and the court appointed the claimant, William M. Ketcham, temporary receiver of the property of said corporation, with the powers and duties specified in section 1788 of the Code of Civil Procedure of that state, and he qualified as such. That on the same day, upon motion and consent of the attorney-general thereto, the said supreme court ordered that the creditors of the said corporation, and each and every one of them, be, and they were thereby, restrained from bringing any action against the corporation for the recovery of any sum of money, and they were thereby enjoined from taking any further proceeding on any such actions theretofore commenced. That this order was served personally upon the plaintiff on the 5th of August, 1891, in New York. That on the 31st of October, 1891, pursuant to the order to show cause and due notice thereof given to each of the creditors, stockholders, and persons interested in said corporation or its affairs, the court ordered and adjudged that the said corporation be, and it was thereby, dissolved, and that William M. Ketcham, the interpleading claimant, was appointed permanent receiver, and qualified as such; and by virtue of such proceedings

Kentucky for a receiver in foreclosure is subject to the rights of the receiver subsequently appointed, as the attachment reaches only the mortgagor's interest, which is out off by the foreclosure proceedings.

But the superintendent of the insurance department in Missouri, who was vested by decree under statutory authority with the assets of an insolvent insurance company, was held in Virginia entitled to debts due to the company in that state, as against a subsequent attachment by a policy holder whose residence was presumably in Virginia. Bockover v. Life Asso. of America, 77 Va. 85. See also Parsons v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 305.

The court in the Virginia case quotes from the language of Chief Justice Waite in Reife v. Rundie, 103 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 337, saying that, "such superintendent was the statutory successor of the corporation for the purpose of winding up its affairs, . . . he is the trustee of an express trust, . . . he is an officer of the state, and as such represents the state sovereignty while performing its public duties connected with winding up of the affairs of one of its insolvent and dissolved corporations."

But the fact that such superintendent is considered a successor of the corporation in one sense, and as a representative of the state in another sense, would not seem to create any greater right to remove the assets from the state and from the reach of Virginia creditors than if he were merely a receiver appointed by the court.

But as against resident creditors the appointment of a receiver in another state is held insufficient to prevent attachment. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Crawford (11. C. C.) 9 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 171; Webster v. Judah, 27 Ill. App. 294.

So trustees appointed in an attachment suit having title by operation of law cannot defeat a garnishment in another state by citizens of their own 23 L. R. A.

state. Rhawn v. Pearce, 110 Ill. 350, 51 Am. Rep. 691.

So in Louisiana a receiver appointed by a foreign court under a creditor's bill will not be allowed to claim property against creditors who subsequently attach it before the receiver has obtained possession. Lichtenstein v. Gillett, 37 La. Ann. 522.

This case holds that nonresidents will be allowed the same rights that belong to residents as attaching creditors as against a receiver appointed in another state than that of plaintiff's domicile. Id.

To the same effect it is held in Indiana that a general deed of assignment made in another state to a receiver there appointed will not be recognized as against the claims of attaching creditors, although they are nonresidents, belonging in a third state, and the attachment was made after the receiver's appointment but before he obtained actual possession of or lien on the property. Catlin v. Wilcox Silver Plate Co. 8 L. R. A. 63, 123 Ind. 477.

A Tennessee receiver of an insolvent corporation was denied the right to assets in Pennsylvania as against a subsequent garnishment by a Kentucky creditor. Warren v. Union Nat. Bank, 7 Phila. 156.

In an early New York case also it was held that trustees of a foreign corporation appointed by the legislative power in the state where it was created will take property in another state subject to the specific liens of attachments levied before the trustees had obtained possession. Fenton v. Lumberrans Bank, Clarke, 286, 7 L. ed. 116. The residence of the attaching creditors is not considered.

Again in another case in which it appeared that the attaching creditors were residents it was held that receivers appointed in another state for a foreign corporation, by the charter of which all its property was to vest forthwith in receivers on committing an act of insolvency, must take assets in New York subject to the claims of creditors who he became vested with the right and title to all the property, effects, and credits of every description belonging to said corporation, and became entitled to receive the said sum of $589.45, so admitted by said garnishees to be due, and theretofore paid into court; and that the plaintiff, at the time of the service upon him of said injunctive order, was and still is a resident of the state of New York, and prior to the time when said garnishees made and filed their answer they had notice of the appointment of the claimant as such receiver. The claimant demanded judgment that the clerk pay over said sum to him, and for his costs. The plaintiff demurred to the petition, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or claim to the fund disclosed and paid into court, and for that the claimant had no legal capacity to maintain the petition. Motion was made to strike out the demurrer as frivolous, and the court so ordered, with $10 costs, and that the claimant have judgment, with leave to the plaintiff to take issue upon said claimant's intervening petition, or such other proceedings as he might be advised, within twenty days. Plaintiff appealed from the order.

Messrs. Rietbrock & Halsey for appellant.

Messrs. Williams & Robinson, for respondent:

As a matter of comity, though not of right, a foreign receiver is permitted to take property as against attaching creditors who reside within the jurisdiction of the court appointing the receiver.

Where the attaching creditor is a resident neither of the state where the suit is brought nor of the state where the receiver is appointed, he is perhaps to be treated the same as a resident of the state where the suit is brought, not being himself found by the decree appointing the receiver.

Paine v. Lenter, 44 Conn. 196, 26 Am. Rep. 442.

An injunctive order of interlocutory decree of a court of New York is not binding upon this court. Each state can give as much force to an injunction of another state as it sees fit. It must, however, be taken into consideration in determining whether or not comity will be extended in this case.

have attached the property before it came into possession of the receivers, although after the insolvency. Willits v. Waite, 25 N. Y. 577.

For this distinction between attaching creditors on account of residence, see similar cases in note to LONG v. FOREST, ante, 33, relating to foreign assignments by insolvent.

It is still more clear that a pending garnishment will not be defeated by the appointment of a receiver in another state. Hunt v. Columbian Ins. Co. 55 Me. 297, 93 Am. Dec. 592; Bartlett v. Wilbur, 53 Md. 486; Taylor v. Columbian Ins. Co. 14 Allen, 353.

So the appointment of a receiver is sufficient to give him title to notes of the debtor within the jurisdiction, and in that state the receiver's title will be unaffected by a subsequent garnishment in another state. Osgood v. Maguire, 61 N. Y. 524.

After receiver gets possession.

A receiver appointed in another state, who has had actual possession of personal property and sent it for sale to a state in which it is attached as the property of the debtor, can maintain replevin therefor as against the attaching creditor. Cagill v. Wooldridge, 8 Baxt. 580, 35 Am. Rep. 718.

Although his rights as receiver cannot be recognized in another jurisdiction, he can maintain the action in his individual capacity for such property, of which he had taken possession. Ibid.

But in conflict with this a California case holds that property in the possession of a receiver of an insolvent corporation appointed in one jurisdiction is not exempt when taken into another jurisdiction from attachment by resident creditors of the insolvent corporation. Humphreys v. Hopkins, 6 L. R. A. 702, 61 Cal. 537.

This California case seems to stand against all others that expressly decide the question.

state cannot be sued and property in their hands attached in a state in which they have the property in the exercise of their duty. Killmer v. Hobart, 58 How. Pr. 452.

So in Illinois it is held that a receiver who has once obtained possession of property within the jurisdiction of the court which appointed him, and has given bond as receiver, cannot be deprived of its possession when he takes it in the performance of his duty into a foreign jurisdiction by creditors who reside there. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Keokuk N. L. Packet Co. 108 Ill. 317, 48 Am. Rep. 557.

And in Connecticut property sent into the state by a receiver of a corporation appointed by another state for the purpose of completing certain work in the former state is not there subject to attachment by a resident creditor. Pond v. Cooke, 45 Conn. 123, 29 Am. Rep. 668.

This decision is put on the ground that the property had once vested in the receiver by the law of the state where it was situated, and that the law of another state will not divest him of his right to it on taking it into such state in the performance of his duty. Ibid.

And a receiver of an insolvent corporation who brings materials from another state and performs a contract can maintain suit for the proceeds of the contract as against garnishment by the creditors of the corporation, although the contract was made and performed in the name of the corporation. Cooke v. Orange, 48 Conn. 401; Blake Crusher Co. v. New Haven, 46 Conn. 473.

Right of foreign receiver to sue.

The general doctrine was laid down in some of the earlier American cases that a receiver appointed in another state would not be allowed to bring a suit in his own name as receiver on the ground that his appointment had no extraterritorial effect. But Williams v. Hintermeister, 26 Fed. Rep. 889.

A voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, valid by the laws of the state where made, is, "by the principles of judicial comity and public policy" good in Wisconsin, if not in effect an assignment in bankruptcy.

Mowry v. Crocker, 6 Wis. 826; Smith v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 28 Wis. 268; Willits v. Waite, 25 N. Y. 577.

Full faith and credit are given to the judgment of a state court, when, in courts of another state, it receives the same faith and credit to which it was entitled in the state where it was pronounced.

The only inquiry can be whether the supreme court of New York had jurisdiction to render such a decree, and whether the appellant was subject to that jurisdiction, and was brought into that proceeding. Neither of these facts is disputed.

Dobson v. Pearce, 12 N. Y. 156, 62 Am. Dec. 152; Folger v. Columbian Ins. Co. 99 Mass. 267, 96 Am. Dec. 747; Re Waite, 99 N. Y. 433; Williams v. Hintermeister, supra.

The general rule in regard to foreign receivers does not necessarily apply to receivers of a corporation.

All persons dealing with this corporation, the Hudson River Boot & Shoe Manufacturing Company, have assented to that method of winding up its affairs, and have agreed that the assets thereof shall vest in a receiver upon the dissolution of the corporation, and become a trust fund for the benefit of all of the creditors. Especially is this true of the creditors who are residents of the state of New York.

Reife v. Rundle, 108 U. S. 232, 26 L. ed. 337; Parsons v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 81 Fed. Rep. 305; Taylor v. Life Assn. of America, 13 Fed. Rep. 493; Davis v. Life Assn. of America, 11 Fed. Rep. 783.

The principle that the assets of an insolvent corporation shall be regarded as a trust fund for the benefit of all the creditors is certainly in harmony with the doctrine of this court.

Ballin v. Loeb, 78 Wis. 404.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not disputed but that the proceedings in the supreme court of New York were properly instituted and conducted, and the dissolution of the corporation regularly adjudged, upon the voluntary application of its trustees, and the respondent appointed receiver of all its property, assets, and estate according to the statute of that state, with a view of applying the proceeds equally to the payment of all its creditors, and the distribution of any residue equally to and among its stockholders. The plaintiff in this action was at the time, and still is, a resident and citizen of the state of New York, of which state the corporation was a citizen, and he was served with an injunction in that proceeding restraining him, as a creditor of the corporation, from commencing any suit against it to enforce the collection of his debt, in order that the property and assets of the corporation might be properly and judiciously administered and applied by the receiver under the authority of the court ap-while the later cases do not recognize the foreign appointment as creating an absolute right to sue, they largely extend to him by the exercise of comity the privilege of maintaining a suit, where this will not defeat or impair the remedies of resident creditors.

The earlier doctrine is followed in Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 3 Robt. 273, holding that an action is properly brought in the name of a foreign corporation, although a receiver has been appointed for it at its domicile, since he cannot sue in his own name.

Where the jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in another state was denied and not proved, his right to sue was denied in Kronberg v. Elder, 18 Kan. 150.

And the receiver of a foreign corporation was denied the right to sue on a note payable to the corporation, where it did not appear that the payee had ever assigned it to him. Farmers & M. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 62 Mo. 17.

A denial of the right of a receiver appointed by the circuit court of the United States in Wisconsin to bring an action as such in the federal court in New York was made in Brigham v. Luddington, 12 Blatchf. 297.

So in Hazard v. Durant, 19 Fed. Rep. 471, it was held that a receiver cannot sue in another state in his own name merely by force of his appointment as receiver, and where he has no title by assignment or conveyance.

And a receiver appointed in proceedings supplementary by a state court cannot sue in a federal court to set aside as fraudulent against creditors a general assignment by the debtor, when there is an assignee in bankruptcy, as the title to property does not pass to him by virtue of his appointment, and the assignment in bankruptcy covers such property. Olney v. Tanner, 21 Blatchf. 540, affirming 10 Fed. Rep. 101.

Also in Maryland it was held that a receiver appointed in one state has no extraterritorial power to institute proceedings in regard to property not subject to the jurisdiction of the court from which he received his appointment. Day v. Postal Teleg. Co. 66 Md. 354. Especially as against the jurisdiction of another court previously invoked.

And seemingly not in harmony with the main case, it was held in an earlier Wisconsin case that a receiver appointed in another state cannot sue in Wisconsin to set aside a transfer of property on the ground that it is fraudulent as to creditors. The court says that judicial comity goes to no such length. Filkins v. Nunnemacher, 81 Wis. 91. To the contrary are New York and New Jersey cases, infra.

These decisions which deny a foreign receiver's right to sue are largely based on Booth v. Clark, 58 U. S. 17 How. 322, 15 L. ed. 164, in which a receiver appointed in a creditors' suit in New York was not allowed to recover assets in the District of Columbia, such as a Mexican claim; but in that case although the general doctrine denying extraterritorial effect to a receiver's appointment was declared the receiver had in fact no right to the assets anywhere as they had passed to an assignee in bankruptcy.

But the more liberal doctrine is followed in most modern cases which in effect restrict the right of a foreign receiver to sue only so far as necessary to protect conflicting rights of particular creditors and not when the denial of his right to sue will benefit no one but the defendants whose liability to the receiver's estate is the matter for adjudication.

pointing him, and in the regular and orderly administration of its estate. The proceeding did not contemplate a discharge of the debtor as upon the surrender and application of his property under insolvent laws, but the property of the corporation was passed and vested, pursuant to the statute, in the respondent as its receiver, and the corporation was dissolved, so that no other than the receiver had a right to assert or maintain any title to it thereafter, and he could do so only for the purpose of its equal and just application to the payment of its creditors, and the just division of any residue to and among its stockholders. The effect of such voluntary dissolution was to place all its property and assets in custodia legis, to be collected and applied by the receiver. There is nothing in the statute of New York, or in this proceeding under it, in conflict with or in contravention of the laws or public policy of this state, as declared by its statutes and the decisions of its courts, nor does the present proceeding interfere, or tend to interfere, with or prejudice the rights of any citizen of this state. The case concerns citizens of New York alone, the garnishees having paid the fund into court and been discharged. The case is therefore free from all objections which, by the general current of authority, might prevent or induce the courts of Wisconsin to refrain from giving, in a spirit of just interstate comity, the same force and effect here to the proceedings in the supreme court of the state of New York in question as would be accorded to them there. There are many cogent reasons, in our judgment, why we should accord to them such effect upon principles of comity. The situation, in brief, is that after the plaintiff had been enjoined, by a competent court of the jurisdiction in which he resided, from bringing any action against the corporation, his debtor, for the recovery of any sum of money, so that he should not obtain any undue preference over its other creditors, in violation of the purpose and policy of the law of New York and the proceeding thus instituted, and after an adjudication absolutely dissolving the corporation had been made, and after the title to its property, effects, and credits had been vested in the claimant as such receiver, the plaintiff came into the circuit court of this state, and commenced an action to recover his demand against a dissolved corporation. The question is one wholly between parties residing in New York, and bound by the proceedings in question, neither of whom is in any position to invoke the assistance of the courts of this state to defeat or deny full effect to the proceeding in New York, or the title resulting from it. It is clear that the adjudication of dissolution, and the appointment of the receiver vesting in him the title to the chose in action in question, were binding on these parties, and the courts of New York would have enforced the receiver's title had this controversy originated there. The plaintiff asks us to aid him in violating the law of his own state, and evading the process of its courts. Our own citizens, in a proper case, would no doubt be protected against the effect of such extraterritorial act and adjudication, if injurious to their interests, or in conflict with the laws and public policy of Wisconsin, and effect would not be given to it at the expense of injustice to our own citizens. The transfer of this debt, valid in New York, must, we think, be held valid on principles of comity here. When, therefore, the garnishee process was served, there was no debt due to the corporation upon which it

So a foreign receiver who has obtained a judgment may sue upon that in another state as an individual. Wilkinson v. Culver, 28 Blatchf. 416, 25 Fed. Rep. 639.

The addition of the words receiver, etc., in the title of the case may be rejected as surplusage. Ibid.

The same doctrine was recognized in Merchants Nat. Bank v. McLeod, 38 Ohio St. 174, allowing a receiver of a Kentucky corporation in a foreclosure suit to bring suit in Ohio for rolling stock included in the mortgage.

So in Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 55 Vt. 526, the receiver appointed at the domicile of the foreign corporation is held entitled to sue in Vermont, where there are no intervening rights of creditors.

And the receiver appointed in another jurisdiction is allowed in Louisiana to bring suit for property which was stolen from him. McAlpin v. Jones, 10 La. Ann. 552.

An assignment to a receiver under order of court was held in Michigan to give him power to sue as assignee of a legal interest in the property assigned, and a description of him as receiver was regarded as mere descriptio personae, there being no domestic creditors affected by the suit. Graydon v. Church, 7 Mich. 86.

And receivers appointed in another state were allowed to sue on a bond and mortgage transferred by the court to them as successors of other receivers, to whom the obligations were executed. Iglehart v. Bierce, 36 Ill. 123.

And a receiver appointed in another state, who brings into the state materials and performs there a contract in the exercise of his duty can recover the proceeds of the contract. Cooke v. Orange, 48 Conn. 401.

The legal effect of the appointment of a receiver in a foreign jurisdiction in transferring to him the right to collect property will be so far recognized in New Jersey as to sustain a suit by him for the recovery of such property. Hurd v. Elizabeth, 41 N. J. L. 1.

The rule that the receiver of a foreign corporation may, simply as a matter of comity, be allowed to recover property, is recited in National Trust Co. of N. Y. v. Miller, 33 N. J. Eq. 165, in which case, however, an ancillary receiver had been appointed.

The same rule is declared in Bidlack v. Mason, 26 N. J. Eq. 230, which was the case of a motion for a receiver where the complainant was a receiver appointed in another state.

So in New York a foreign receiver may maintain an action when there are no local interests adverse to his suit. Dyer v. Power, 39 N. Y. S. R. 136; Peters v. Foster, 55 Hun. 607.

In Indiana also as a matter of comity, receivers duly appointed and qualified in other states are allowed to maintain suits to the extent of their authority. Metzner v. Bauer, 38 Ind. 427.

In this case there was no question as to any conflict of interest between resident creditors and the receiver. Ibid.

A receiver appointed in another state may be allowed by comity to bring suit against a resident to enforce his liability as stockholder in an insolvent corporation. Pugh v. Hurr, 52 How. Pr. 22.

Receivers appointed in another state may, by could act, and the money that has been paid into court belongs to the receiver claimant; and, no principle of public policy or rights of citizens of Wisconsin intervening, by a fair and liberal spirit of comity our courts ought to give the same force and effect to the proceedings in question as they would have in the courts of New York.

The tendency of modern adjudications is in favor of a liberal extension of interstate comity, and against a narrow and provincial policy, which would deny proper effect to judicial proceedings of sister states under their statutes and rights claimed under them, simply because, technically, they are foreign, and not domestic. In the recent case of Cole v. Cunningham, 188 U. S. 107, 88 L. ed. 538, the subject was very fully considered, and the various cases were cited; and it was there held that a creditor who is a citizen and resident of the same state with his debtor, against whom insolvent proceedings have been instituted in said state, is bound by the assignment of the debtor's property in such proceedings, and if he attempts to attach or seize the personal property of the debtor, situated in another state and embraced in the assignment, he may be restrained by injunction by the courts of the state in which he and his debtor reside; that every state exercises, to a greater or less extent, as it deems expedient, the comity of giving effect to the insolvent proceedings of other states, and where the transfer of the debtor's property is the result of a judicial proceeding, as a general rule, no state will carry it into effect, to the prejudice of its own citizens. Reynolds v. Adden, 186 U. S. 353, 354, 34 L. ed. 362. In Bagby v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co., 86 Pa. 291, it was held that, where a receiver of a corporation has been appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction in another state, a creditor who resides in that state, and is bound by the decree of its court appointing the receiver, cannot, in an attachment or execution, recover the assets of the corporation in another state, which the receiver claims. In Bacon v. Horne, 123 Pa. 452, 453, 2 L. R. A. 355, speaking to this point, the court said: "As before observed, both of these parties, plaintiffs and defendant, are residents of New York. They come into this state to obtain an advantage by our law which they could not obtain by their own. They are seeking to nullify the law of their own state, and ask the aid of our court to do so. This they cannot have. If for no other reason, it is forbidden by public policy, and the comity which exists between the states. This comity will always be enforced when it does not conflict with the rights of our own citizens." To the same effect is the case of Re Waite, 99 N. Y. 433, 439, 448, and also Phelps v. McCann, 123 N. Y. 641. In Toronto General Trust Co. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 123 N. Y. 37, 47, it was said that "foreign receivers and assignees, taking their title to property by virtue of foreign laws or legal proceedings in foreign courts, may come here and maintain suits in our courts when they do not come in conflict with the rights or interests of domestic creditors;" and the general rule laid down in Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe, 84 N. Y. 367, 38 Am. Rep. 518, must be considered as qualified by these cases. The same doctrine is laid down in Woodward v. Brooks, 128 Ill. 222, 3 L. R. A. 702, where it is held that, if an assignment is valid in the state where made, it will be enforced in another state as a matter of comity, but not to the prejudice of the citizens of the latter, who may have demands against the assignor; erites, bring suit to recover property, where there is no conflict of interest between foreign and domestic creditors, as in a suit to set aside a void conveyance by judicial sale of land situated in another state. Runk v. St. John, 29 Barb. 585.

So a sequestrator appointed in another state, who is substantially an assignee of a corporation of that state, may bring suit to recover property which is alleged to have been transferred for the purpose of defrauding creditors in the other state. Barclay v. Quicksilver Min. Co. 6 Lana. 25.

And a receiver of partnership assets, appointed by a competent court of another state, may maintain an action in New Jersey to set aside a sale of the assets situated in New Jersey by one partner in fraud of another, when there are no creditors of the firm and the only one to be benefited is the partner defrauded. Sobernheimer v. Wheeler, 45 N. J. Eq. 614.

In a bankruptcy case in the northern district of Illinois, it was held that a receiver of a corporation in another state might prove a debt against the bankrupt. Ex parte Norwood, 3 Biss. 504.

Trustees appointed to wind up a foreign corporation may be substituted in another jurisdiction for the corporation in a pending suit, on the ground that they are a quasi corporation. New Jersey Protection & L. Bank v. Thorp, 6 Cow. 43.

The superintendent of the insurance department of a state in which a corporation was created, who is made by operation of law the successor of the corporation, is entitled to appear in a suit in another state against the corporation and claim a removal of the case on the ground of citizenship. Relfe v. Rundle, 103 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 337.

An officer of a corporation, for which a receiver is appointed, who is served with an injunction against interfering with the receiver's right to the assets, cannot avoid the effect thereof by going into another state; and this rule is not changed by the fact that he is himself a creditor of the company. A receiver in the latter jurisdiction may be appointed to take charge of the assets in that state. Williams v. Hintermeister, 36 Fed. Rep. 889.

For the right of the assignees in insolvency or bankruptcy and syndics to bring suit in other jurisdictions, see note to LONG v. FORREST, ante, 33 on the subject of insolvency transfers as affecting title to property outside the jurisdiction.

Title to land.

The appointment of a receiver does not give him title to real property in another state, or authorize him to maintain an action in the state of his appointment to contest the title of purchasers under execution in the state where the property is situated. Simpkins v. Smith & P. Gold Co. 50 How. Pr. 55.

The title to land in Texas held by a trustee is held not to pass to his receiver appointed in Tennessee so as to defeat an attachment of the land in Texas by creditors of the real owner. Moseby v. Burrow, 52 Tex. 366.

For effect of assignments for creditors, insolvency and bankruptcy transfers on land as well as personal property outside the jurisdiction, see note to LONG v. FORREST, ante, 33. B. A. R.

that while it is contrary to public policy to allow the property of a nonresident debtor to be withdrawn from the state, and thus compel creditors to seek redress in a foreign jurisdiction, yet for all other purposes between the citizens of the state where the assignment is made, if valid by the lex loci, it will be carried into effect by the courts of Illinois; and this rule is held not to be in conflict with Rhawn v. Pearce, 110 Ill. 350. The assignment in this case was voluntary, it is true, and not by proceedings in invitum.

We are unable to see upon what substantial ground it can be maintained that the title of the receiver in this case, founded upon the voluntary dissolution of the corporation, does not stand on equally as favorable ground as that of an assignee for the benefit of creditors. Parsons v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 305; Relje v. Rundle, 108 U. S. 222, 225, 26 L. ed. 337, 339; Williams v. Hintermeister, 26 Fed. Rep. 889. In Merchants Nat. Bank v. McLeod, 38 Ohio St. 174, it was held that a receiver appointed under the authority of the court of one state, and vested with the title to property temporarily in another, might, under the comity between states, by an action brought in the latter state in his own name, assert his right to the possession of it, where such right was not in conflict with the rights of the citizens of the latter state, nor against the policy of its laws; nor is there anything in the case of McClure v. Campbell, 71 Wis. 350, in conflict with this conclusion. Mr. Justice Lyon had in view in that case the question of giving effect to foreign insolvency proceedings resulting in a discharge of the debtor prejudicially to the interests of citizens of the state wherein the assignee attempted to enforce the assignment. In Filkins v. Nunnenmacher, 81 Wis. 91, the question was whether judicial comity would allow a receiver, appointed in a creditors' suit in another state, to maintain a suit in Wisconsin to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance, from the debtor to the defendant, of property within the latter state, and presented an entirely different question from the one in this case, which is whether a foreign receiver can be heard to assert in the courts of this state a title to property which he claims by an assignment, valid and binding against all the parties to the litigation, and is more nearly analogous to the question involved and decided in Cook v. Van Horn, 81 Wis. 291. The question is not materially different from that involved in Smith v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 23 Wis. 267, where it was determined that effect would be given to the courts of this state, subject to the qualifications here stated, to an assignment made in another state by a party in order to avoid imprisonment in proceedings supplemental to execution for refusal to apply rights in action—corporate stocks—to the payment of a judgment; and it is evident that, if the title depended wholly upon the coercive power of the court, the result would have been the same. The principle is universal that the assets of insolvent corporations are to be regarded as a trust fund for the benefit of all the creditors, and "that kind of diligence by which one creditor of an insolvent corporation secures to himself a prior right to its property, and an unequal advantage over the other creditors, is without merit, and more selfish than just." Ballin v. Loeb, 78 Wis. 404. The public policy of Wisconsin and New York in this respect are in accord. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the claim of the receiver, as stated in his intervening petition, to the fund in court, must be sustained, and that the Circuit Court properly overruled the plaintiff's demurrer thereto.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

John W. JASPER, Resp't.,

v.

Arthur E. HAZEN, Appt.

(.....N. Dak.)

*1. Under section 25, chap. 120, Laws 1891, this court is required, upon appeal, to review questions of fact in cases tried by the court or referee, when exceptions to the findings are duly taken and returned. But this court will not try the case de novo. The findings below are presumed to be correct. Appellant must show error, and a finding based upon parol evidence will not be disturbed unless the error be made clearly to appear.

*2. To support a finding that a deed absolute on its face was intended as a mortgage only, the evidence must be clear, convincing, and satisfactory, and of such a character as will leave in the mind of the chancellor no hesitation or substantial doubt. In reviewing questions of fact upon appeal, in this class of cases, the same strict rule must be applied by the appellate court.

*3. Evidence in this case examined, and held sufficient to warrant the trial court in holding that a deed absolute in form was in fact given as security only.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain real estate which defendant

NOTE.—The decision in the above case touches a question which, although very practical, seems to have been developed but little, and which is treated more fully in the present case than anywhere else. It is interesting in connection with the fact that the statutory provision above discussed was taken from Wisconsin, to notice the recent Wisconsin case of Klein v. Valerius, 22 L. R. A. 608, holding unconstitutional a new statute of that state attempting to give a review of facts in the supreme court unaffected by the decision of the lower court.

was alleged to have obtained under an absolute deed intended for a mortgage and to have subsequently sold to third persons. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Sumner Ladd, with Messrs. Benton & Amidon, for appellant:

Parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written instrument and a court of equity ought to be extremely cautious in its consideration of such testimony.

Andrews v. Essex F. & M. Ins. Co. 3 Mason, 8.

The evidence upon which a deed absolute on its face will be adjudged a mortgage, must be clear, convincing, and equal in force to that upon which a deed will be reformed under the grounds of mistake.

Kent v. Lasley, 24 Wis. 654.

The fact must be made out by clear and strong evidence; a mere preponderance of proof is not sufficient, and whenever the degree of proof required in cases like this is mentioned, the rule is stated the same as in suits to reform instruments.

Sloan v. Becker, 34 Minn. 491; McClelland v. Sanford, 26 Wis. 595.

The burden rests upon the moving party of overcoming the strongest presumption arising from the terms of a written instrument. If the proofs are doubtful or unsatisfactory, if there is a failure to overcome this presumption by testimony entirely plain and convincing beyond reasonable controversy, the writing will be made to express correctly the intention of the parties. A judgment of the court, a deliberate deed or writing, are of too much solemnity to be brushed by loose and inconclusive evidence.

Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. ed. 1027; United States v. Maxwell Land-Grant Co. 121 U. S. 825, 381, 30 L. ed. 949, 959; United States v. Budd, 144 U. S. 154-161, 36 L. ed. 884-886; Mead v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 453; Ford v. Joyce, 78 N. Y. 618; Tufts v. Larned, 27 Iowa, 330; Flinn v. Barkley, 7 Ind. 69; Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 103 Mass. 45; Story, Eq. Jur. 11th ed. § 157; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 859; Henkle v. Royal Exchange Co. 1 Ves. Sr. 817.

To convert a deed absolute on its face into a mortgage by parol testimony, such testimony must be clear and specific, of a character such as will leave on the mind of the court no hesitation or doubt; and failing in this, the effort to impeach the legal character of the deed must be regarded as abortive.

Lance's App. 112 Pa. 456; Henley v. Hoteling, 41 Cal. 22; Tilden v. Streeter, 45 Mich. 533; Johnson v. Van Velsor, 43 Mich. 208; Kercheval v. Doty, 31 Wis. 476; Townsend v. Peterson, 12 Colo. 491; Sattersfield v. Malone, 1 L. R. A. 85, 85 Fed. Rep. 445; Munger v. Casey (Pa.) March 11, 1889; Pierce v. Traver, 13 Nev. 526; Phillips v. Croft, 42 Ala. 477; Bingham v. Thompson, 4 Nev. 224.

Sometimes a great disproportion between the actual value of the land and alleged purchase price lends aid in controversies of this kind in determining what the real transaction was. Here, however, there was no great disproportion.

The case may be decided upon a principle governing a class of cases of the same nature. Among them are:

Where a written instrument is sought to be reformed upon the ground that by a mistake it does not correctly set forth the intention of the parties; or where the declaration of the mortgagor at the time he executed the mortgage, that the equity of the redemption should pass to the mortgagee; or where it is insisted that a mortgagor by a subsequent parol agreement surrendered his rights (Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. ed. 1027. See also Kent v. Lasley, 24 Wis. 654).—It is the duty of the court to examine the testimony and determine whether it satisfies the rule of evidence applicable to the case.

1. Courts of review, in affirming the decision of trial courts in cases to which this rule of evidence is applicable, have not applied the general rule that where there is a conflict in the evidence the weight of evidence will not be examined, but on the contrary courts of review in affirming decisions in such cases have invariably examined the evidence and expressly determined its sufficiency or insufficiency to satisfy the rule for which we contend.

2. Courts of review have frequently reversed the decision of trial courts in this class of cases upon the sole ground that the evidence in support of the decision was not sufficient to satisfy the rule, although it would have been amply sufficient to support a decision, upon an ordinary issue.

Upon an ordinary issue of fact, appellate courts do not review or examine the testimony in case of conflicting evidence, but dispose of the question in the briefest possible manner by simply citing the general rule.

Compare Cadman v. Peter, 118 U. S. 78, 30 L. ed. 78, with Hathaway v. First Nat. Bank of Cambridge, 184 U. S. 494, 33 L. ed. 1004; Etheridge v. Wisner, 86 Mich. 166, with Thompson v. Homan, 77 Mich. 134.

If it had been considered by courts of review that the general rule was also applicable to cases requiring the strict proof, it is incredible that they would have been at such pains in every case to examine the testimony.

Courts of review have frequently reversed the decision of trial courts in this class of cases upon the sole ground that the evidence in support of the decision was not sufficient to satisfy the rule.

Nevius v. Dunlap, 38 N. Y. 676.

Ensign v. Ensign, 120 N. Y. 655, however, is based upon the provisions of the 1876 Code of Civil Procedure.

The ground of this decision is more fully explained in Re Ross, 87 N. Y. 514; Case v. Peters, 20 Mich. 298; Vary v. Shea, 36 Mich. 388; Tilden v. Streeter, 45 Mich. 533; Reynolds v. Campbell, Id. 529.

That the supreme court of Michigan applies the general rule relative to conflicting testimony, upon an ordinary issue, see Etheridge v. Wisner, supra; Newton v. Holley, 6 Wis. 592; Lake v. Meacham, 13 Wis. 356; Kercheval v. Doty, 31 Wis. 477; Harter v. Christoph, 32 Wis. 246; Sable v. Maloney, 48 Wis. 331; Meiswinkel v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 6 L. R. A. 300, 75 Wis. 147.

That the supreme court of Wisconsin applies the general rule without examining the evidence, upon ordinary issues, where the testimony is conflicting.—

See Robbins v. Fond Du Lac, 82 Wis. 340; Smith v. Ewing, 151 Pa. 256; Pancake v. Crauffman, 114 Pa. 118; McCall v. Bushnell, 41 Minn. 87; Randall v. Burk Twp. of Minnehaha County (S. Dak.) Nov. 24, 1898.

Such had been the unvarying practice of courts of review in the states in which this strict rule of evidence has been established and defined, as late as 1891. Since that date three decisions have been rendered by the supreme court of California declaring a different rule.

These cases are Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 828; Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53; Penney v. Simmons, 99 Cal. 860.

In the first of these cases the statement that the finding of the trial court was conclusive was a mere dictum.

The next case, Mahoney v. Bostwick, supra, is based entirely upon the former case.

In Penney v. Simmons, supra, the trial court decided in favor of the deed.

Mr. Charles A. Pollock, with Mr. M. A. Hildreth, for respondent:

The rule which excludes parol testimony to contradict or vary a written instrument has reference to the language used by the parties. It does not forbid an inquiry into the object of the parties in executing and receiving the instrument.

Brick v. Brick, 98 U. S. 51 625 L. ed. 256; Hughes v. Edwards, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 489, 6 L. ed. 142; Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 116.

The Supreme Court of the United States, and the circuit and district courts, and most of the state courts are uniform in admitting parol evidence to show that an absolute conveyance is in fact a mortgage.

Jones, Mortg. 3d ed. §§ 285 et seq.; Russell v. Southard, 58 U. S. 12 How. 189, 13 L. ed. 937; Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332, 24 L. ed. 775; Morris v. Nixon, 42 U. S. 1 How. 118, 11 L. ed. 69; Babcock v. Wyman, 60 U. S. 19 How. 289, 15 L. ed. 644.

The intention of the parties is the only true and infallible test, and this intention is to be gathered from the circumstances surrounding the transaction and the conduct of the parties, as well as from the face of the written contract.

Peugh v. Davis, supra; Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352.

Whether a conveyance absolute on its face will take effect as a mortgage, depends primarily if not exclusively on the nature of the consideration.

Pierce v. Robinson and Morris v. Nixon, supra.

The supreme court of Nevada, in the case of Pierce v. Traver, 13 Nev. 526, has gone so far as to say that inadequacy of price alone authorizes a court to declare a deed absolute on its face to be a mortgage.

The findings were fully justified by the evidence.

Courts of equity watch with extreme jealousy all contracts made by a party while under imprisonment; and if there is the slightest ground to suspect oppression or imposition, in such cases, they will set the contracts aside.

Findings by the trial judge will not be disturbed on appeal where there is evidence to sustain them.

Horn v. Keteltas, 46 N. Y. 605.

The statute provides that the findings of fact and the conclusions of law must be separately stated.

Comp. Laws, § 5067.

In all cases tried either by court, referee, or jury, questions of fact may be reviewed in the supreme court, and in either case the review is the same, only that in cases tried by a court or referee the findings stand as a special verdict, and like a special verdict, the findings must pass on every material issue.

Schwartz v. Skinner, 47 Cal. 6; Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 626.

Under the old chancery practice an appeal took up the whole case and the chancellor examined the pleadings and evidence without reference to the findings of the lower court and decided such a decree as seemed proper.

Hayne, New Trial, 860.

In Wisconsin a statute restoring the old chancery practice was passed some years ago. Before the statute the supreme court of Wisconsin held the findings of fact as a special verdict. After the statute the findings of a trial court were not binding upon it, because where an appellate court tries the case anew findings become immaterial.

In California it was contended that in an equity case, as under the old chancery practice, an appeal took up the whole case and that an appellate court would re-examine the evidence as if it were a court of original jurisdiction, but this theory was soon exploded.

Tewksbury v. Magrath, 33 Cal. 247; Hayne, New Trial, § 288; Lick v. Madden, 36 Cal. 213, 95 Am. Dec. 175.

This case, therefore, cannot be measured by the rules of old chancery practice. It must be determined by the rules as laid down by our code.

The general proposition may be stated that appellate courts will not disturb the findings of a trial court where the evidence reasonably tends to support the findings.

Leary v. Leary, 68 Wis. 664; Sipple v. Isham, 46 Hun, 866; Berberet v. Edina, 19 Mo. App. 550; Henderson v. Henderson, 110 Ind. 816; Melinger v. Parsons, 51 Iowa, 58; Fender v. Powers, 67 Mich. 488; Mathias v. O'Neill, 94 Mo. 520; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 107 Ind. 464; Egbert v. Rush, 7 Ind. 706; Miller v. Evansville Nat. Bank, 99 Ind. 272; State v. Bonebrake, 108 U. S. 66, 27 L. ed. 654; Ellis v. Ward, 137 Ill. 509; Coari v. Olsen, 91 Ill. 278.

It has been held even in those jurisdictions where equity cases are retried in the appellate court the judgment of the trial court is prima facie right, and will not be disturbed unless clearly and satisfactorily wrong.

Ely v. Daly, 40 Wis. 52; McAteer v. McAteer, 81 S. C. 819; Frederick v. Frederick, 31 W. Va. 566; Ritter v. Stock, 12 Cal. 402; Johnson v. Johnson, 125 Ill. 510; Waterman v. Buck, 58 Vt. 519; Cosby v. Buchanan, 81 Ala. 574; Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 642.

And this rule operates with peculiar force in an appellate court, where the findings of the commissioner have been approved and sustained by the chancellor.

In Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 58, the court unanimously held that the question as to whether the evidence is of such a character as to come up to the rule that it is plain and convincing is after all a question of fact for the trial court to determine.

Brisson v. Brisson, 90 Cal. 823.

The rule is universal that appellate courts will not disturb the findings of a trial court in 23 L. R. A.

an equity action, and this principle applies to all classes of actions.

Newcomb v. White (N. M.) Jan. 28, 1890; Blauvelt v. Woodworth, 81 N. Y. 285; La Fitte v. Rups, 18 Colo. 207; Castner v. Richardson, 18 Colo. 496; Hamlin v. Philips (Cal.) It is contended that this is an exceptional case. The exception exists more in name than anything else.

The court cannot disturb the finding as there is evidence in the record reasonably tending to support that finding. The quality of that evidence was for the trial court. It is only when that quality stands uncorroborated in the record, that the appellate court will overturn the findings of fact. Surely this court will not disturb the findings of a fact, in a civil action, any quicker than it would disturb the verdict of a jury in a criminal action, if there was any evidence to support such a verdict. It has been held in People v. Stone, 117 N. Y. 480; State v. Howell, 100 Mo. 628; Clarke v. People, 16 Colo. 511; State v. Rainsbarger, 74 Iowa, 196; Jameson v. Young, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 388; Warwick v. State, 47 Ark. 568; Wakeman v. Jones, 1 Ind. 517; People v. Moore, 52 Mich. 563; People v. Smallman, 55 Cal. 185; State v. Hopkins, 38 La. Ann. 84; Trimmier v. Bomar, 20 S. C. 358; Smith v. Phillips, 77 Va. 543, and Crumpton v. United States, 138 U. S. 861, 34 L. ed. 958,—that a judgment in a criminal case will not be disturbed on the ground that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, unless there is a total failure of evidence, or it is so weak that the necessary inference is that the verdict is the result of passion, prejudice, or partiality.

Why have courts so tenaciously held to this rule? It is because they cannot judge of the credibility of witnesses upon paper.

Bartholomew, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us for the third time. Upon the first appeal a verdict of a jury in respondent's favor was set aside upon the ground that the case should have been tried in equity, and not at law. The case is reported in 1 N. Dak. 75, where a full statement of the issues is given, which need not be here repeated. The case was again reversed, on a question of pleading, in 2 N. Dak. 401. It comes before us again upon the merits, judgment for respondent having been entered below upon findings of fact and conclusions of law. These findings are somewhat extended, and every issue made by the pleadings is found in respondent's favor. It is claimed that many of these findings are not supported by the evidence. A reference to the pleadings, as set forth in the former opinion, discloses that the plaintiff, who is respondent here, sought to compel the appellant to account for the value of certain property, real and personal, which it was claimed appellant held as trustee, ex male-facto, for respondent, and which he had wrongfully converted to his own use. It will also appear that appellant held the real estate, for the value of which it was sought to compel him to account, by a deed absolute on its face, but which respondent insisted was in fact given to secure the performance of an act which had long since been performed. It is thus apparent that, in considering the evidence necessary to establish appellant's liability in this case, two somewhat different rules of law must be applied. Liability for the value of the personal property may be established under what we may term the "general rule," while liability for the value of the real estate can only be fixed under the strict rule to be hereafter considered.

Speaking now only of the personal property, the rule that the findings of fact of a trial court, like the verdict of a jury, will not be disturbed by an appellate court when they have substantial support in the evidence, has been so often announced, and is so familiar to the profession, that no authorities need now be cited in its support. But section 5287, Comp. Laws, re-enacted as section 25, chap. 120, Laws 1891, in speaking of the powers of the supreme court on appeal, says: "Any question of fact or of law decided upon trials by the court or by referee may be reviewed when exceptions to the findings of fact have been duly taken by either party and returned." To what extent this provision modifies or controls the general rule above announced is an interesting question that has never been directly passed upon by this court. Nor, so far as we can ascertain, was this provision ever construed by the supreme court of the late territory prior to its re-enactment by our state legislature. The provision was incorporated in the Laws of the Territory of Dakota in 1887; and Waldron v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 1 Dak. 336, and Caledonia Gold Min. Co. v. Noonan, 3 Dak. 189, both of which announce the general rule, were decided prior to that time. This same provision was enacted in Wisconsin in 1860. The first case arising thereunder was Snyder v. Wright, 13 Wis. 689. From that case, and from Fisher v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 21 Wis. 73, and Garbutt v. Prairie du Chien Bank, 22 Wis. 384, it is quite clear that the supreme court of Wisconsin felt itself compelled to pass, to some extent at least, upon questions of fact, in cases of this character. The construction placed upon the statute by that court ought to be binding upon us, as we adopted the law after such construction. The difficulty lies in determining just how far that learned court intended to go. That the statute ingrafted a change upon the former practice is certain. To review is to re-examine judicially. Yet we are constrained to believe that the legislature did not intend a "trial de novo," in the usual acceptation of that term. It did not intend that this court should take up the parol evidence as preserved in the bill of exceptions, and pass upon it without any reference to the decision below. Rather, it intended—and such, we think, is the effect of the Wisconsin decisions—that, when a finding of fact made by the trial court was brought into this court for review upon proper exceptions, it should come like a legal conclusion, with all the presumptions in favor of its correctness, and with the burden resting upon the party alleging error of demonstrating the existence of such error. He must be able to show this court that such finding is against the preponderance of the testimony, and, where the finding is based upon parol evidence, it will not be disturbed, unless clearly and unquestionably opposed to the preponderance of the testimony. Randall v. Burk Top. of Minnehaha County (S. Dak.) 57 N. W. Rep. 4.

Of the probative force and value of depositions and documentary evidence, this court may be in as good situation to determine as the trial court; and when the finding is based upon this character of evidence, and it reasonably appears to this court, upon a full examination thereof, that the finding is against the weight of the evidence, we think it would be our duty, under the statute, to disturb the finding. But every practitioner of extended experience knows how absolutely essential it is, in order to ascertain the truth from parol evidence, that the tribunal who is to pass upon the evidence should see the witness upon the stand. The printed page containing the evidence gives, oftentimes, a radically different impression from that made at the hearing. The opportunity of observing the witnesses, and their interest or lack of interest in the case, their prejudices and passions, their mental capacities and powers of observation and memory, and the use they have made of these powers, their entire deportment on the stand, and conduct under cross-examination,—these and many other circumstances that attend personal observation,—are undoubted auxiliaries in ascertaining truth. Of all these helps this court is deprived, while the trial court possesses them fully. It is obvious that, if these things be disregarded, mistakes will be made, and injustice be done. As the finding of fact based upon parol evidence comes to us with all presumptions in favor of its correctness, we must, in reaching our conclusions, throw into the balance in support of the finding, not only the full effect of the printed evidence in the bill of exceptions, but also the full effect of the inferences and impressions that might reasonably and legitimately be drawn from personal observation of the witnesses; and it is only when the scales unmistakably incline the other way, when the finding is thus weighed, that we are warranted in disturbing it. Applying these principles to the evidence in this case bearing upon appellant's liability for the value of the personal property, and it becomes so clear that the findings cannot be disturbed that it would be a waste of time to analyze the testimony.

More difficult questions confront us when we turn to the other branch of the case, and apply a different rule of law to the evidence. As already stated, appellant's liability for the value of the realty depends upon whether or not a deed absolute on its face was intended to operate as such, or as security only. The rule which admits parol testimony to show that a deed absolute in terms was in fact intended only as security for the performance of some act is too well established to require authorities in its support. Nor do learned counsel in this case greatly differ as to the character and quantity of proof required in such cases. The presumption that an instrument executed with the formality of a deed, or a contract deliberately entered into, expresses on its face its true intent and purpose, is so persuasive that he who would establish the contrary must go far beyond the ordinary rule of preponderance. To demand less would be to lose sight of this presumption, which is one of the strongest disputable presumptions known to the law. Hence, courts have, with great uniformity, in this class of cases, required the proof that should destroy the recitals in a solemn instrument to be clear, specific, satisfactory, and of such a character as to leave in the mind of the chancellor no hesitation or substantial doubt. Eames v. Hardin, 111 Ill. 634; Gassert v. Bogk, 7 Mont. 586, 1 L. R. A. 240; affirmed in Bogk v. Gassert, 149 U. S. 17, 37 L. ed. 681; Locke v. Moulton, 96 Cal. 21; Ensminger v. Ensminger, 75 Iowa, 89; Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. ed. 1027; Kent v. Lasley, 24 Wis. 654.

But while counsel agree, practically, that the strict rule thus announced must be applied by the trial court, they disagree entirely as to the rule that should be applied in this court. Counsel, at the request of the court, have filed supplemental briefs upon this question, the great value of which, and the aid that we have received therefrom, we desire here to acknowledge. The statute we have already considered has no direct bearing upon this question, except so far as it requires us to pass, to any extent, upon the weight of testimony. Having once decided that it is our duty to review the evidence, as already indicated, then, whether we apply the rule that requires a mere preponderance, or the rule that requires that clear and convincing testimony that leaves no substantial doubt, is left untouched by the statute.

Respondent contends—and his first proposition is correct—that the case comes to this court with the presumption that the chancellor applied the proper rule at the trial. He then argues that this court ought not to attempt to control the conscience of the chancellor, and ought not to say that he was not convinced, or ought not to have been convinced, beyond any substantial doubt, by a certain amount of admittedly competent evidence, when he himself says he was so convinced, and that if he was so convinced the rule was met, and the findings should stand, unless reversible under the general rule that they are against the clear weight of the testimony. The position is not without plausibility. It has the support of the eminent supreme court of California. Brisson v. Brisson, 90 Cal. 323-324; Mahoney v. Bostwick, 23 L. R. A.

96 Cal. 53-58, and Penney v. Simmons, 99 Cal. 380. Possibly, such is the rule in Texas. See Ulmann v. Jasper, 70 Tex. 446.

The case of Ensign v. Ensign, 120 N. Y. 655, is cited by respondent, but does not support his contention, as an examination of the case and of the New York statute will disclose. Section 1337, N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. 1876, in defining the power of the court of appeals in cases taken to that court on appeal, among other provisions, contains the following: "Except that a question of fact arising upon conflicting evidence cannot be determined upon such appeal unless when special provision for the determination thereof is made by law." And the next section provides for a review upon the facts in the court of appeals, when the general term of the supreme court has reversed, upon questions of fact, a judgment entered upon the report of a referee, or upon the decision of a court without a jury. And in Re Rose, 87 N. Y. 514, where these statutes are fully explained, Judge Earle says that this latter provision is the only one giving the court of appeals power to review questions of fact depending upon conflicting evidence. This statement renders the language in Ensign v. Ensign readily understood, where the court says: "The referee's determination of the issue having been affirmed by the general term, this court cannot reverse, if there is any evidence tending to sustain the finding of fact on which the judgment rests." Van Tuyl v. Westchester F. Ins. Co., 87 Barb. 72, cited by respondent, fairly supports his position. That was a case of reformation of contract. The statement is bald, and there is no discussion of the question. In the much later case of Erwin v. Curtis, 43 Hun, 292, the general term of the court discusses the point briefly. That was a case brought to declare a quitclaim deed to be a mortgage. The court cites the authorities which hold that the parol evidence, in such case, must be "clear, satisfactory, and convincing," and also the authorities which require the "triers of fact in civil cases to give a verdict to the party in whose favor the evidence preponderates." The court then says: "It is necessary for us, in reviewing the question of fact, as to whether this deed was proven to be a mortgage, to determine the rule governing us, and we hold it to be as stated in," etc., (naming the cases that announce the strict rule). And the court adds: "With this conclusion in mind, we have carefully examined the evidence bearing on the question, and all the circumstances surrounding the parties and the transaction, and we cannot say that there was error committed in the finding below." It is clear, in this case, that the appellate court adopted for its own guidance, and enforced, the strict rule. In the California cases there is no discussion of the point we are considering. The court simply announces, in general terms, that it will apply the same rule of law to these exceptional cases that is applied to cases generally, and that, sitting as a court for the correction of errors of law, it will not disturb a finding which declares a deed absolute to be a mortgage, if such finding has any substantial support in the testimony.

Nor do we find the question discussed anywhere, except the brief discussion in 48 Hun. But we do find in the courts of last resort in many of the states, and in the Federal Supreme Court, the strict rule has been unquestioningly adopted and enforced. We find courts saying, in this class of cases, that, if they could be governed by the preponderance of the testimony, their ruling would be in one direction, but as the law requires the evidence to be clear, convincing, and satisfactory, beyond substantial doubt, they are compelled to rule in the other direction. We find other cases where the trial court has held that a deed absolute on its face was not intended as a mortgage, and the appellate court says that the clear, convincing, and satisfactory evidence shows that it was so intended, and reverses the finding. Some of the cases cited below, as will be seen by inspection, come from states where the appellate court sits as a court for the correction of errors of law, only, in all appeal cases, and where the holding would seem to lead directly to the conclusion that, where the law requires a specific character of evidence to warrant a particular finding, to make such finding in the absence of such character of evidence was as much an error of law as to make a finding in an ordinary case supported by no substantial evidence. We cite the following cases, in all of which the strict rule has, in effect, been applied in the appellate court: Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. ed. 1027; Coyle v. Davis, 116 U. S. 108, 29 L. ed. 583; Cadman v. Peter, 118 U. S. 78, 30 L. ed. 78; Nevius v. Dunlap, 88 N. Y. 676; Decereuz v. Sun Fire Office of London, 51 Hun, 147; Case v. Peters, 20 Mich. 298; Vary v. Shea, 38 Mich. 388; Tilden v. Streeter, 45 Mich. 533; Reynolds v. Campbell, 45 Mich. 529; McMillan v. Bisell, 63 Mich. 66; Low v. Graff, 80 Ill. 360; Barling v. Brasuhn, 102 Ill. 441; Newton v. Holley, 6 Wis. 592; Lake v. Meacham, 18 Wis. 356; Kercheval v. Doty, 31 Wis. 477; Harter v. Christoph, 32 Wis. 246; Lavassar v. Washburne, 50 Wis. 200; Meiswinkel v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 75 Wis. 147, 6 L. R. A. 200; Pancake v. Cauffman, 114 Pa. 118; McCall v. Bushnell, 41 Minn. 37; Bingham v. Thompson, 4 Nev. 224.

We think these cases have gone upon the correct theory. It will not do to say that the strict rule is for the guidance of the trial court only. It is safe to say that there will always, in this class of cases, be some evidence to support the plaintiff's claim. If, then, when the case reaches this court, we are conclusively bound to say that the chancellor correctly applied the strict rule of law, that fact requires us to say that the evidence conforms to the findings, and not the findings to the evidence. Moreover, it is this strict rule of law upon which the titles to real estate rest for protection. Remove it, and few titles would be secure. He whose title is assailed in this manner invokes the rule in his defense; and, if that rule is to be applied only in the trial court, then, in case of defeat, he can never bring his case to this court, because at the threshold, he must abandon the very essence of his defense. We think such a holding would, in effect, abrogate the rule.

Trial courts, however learned and conscientious, are just as liable to make mistakes upon this point as upon others. We must be governed, in considering this branch of the case, by the rule that requires the evidence to be clear, convincing, and satisfactory. But, in applying this rule, we must be controlled by the same principles that control in applying the general rule. The case comes to us with the presumption in favor of the legality and correctness of the findings. Appellant must establish error, and, where a finding is based upon parol evidence, its error must clearly and unquestionably appear, or it will not be disturbed. This disposes of all preliminary questions and leaves only the consideration of the evidence bearing upon appellant's liability for the value of the realty.

What is the character of the proof in this case? At the time of the transaction, the respondent was a farmer, and a man of limited attainments; a German by birth; unable to read writing with accuracy, and unable to write, in English, more than his name. Appellant was an energetic, experienced business man. He was an officer in a money-lending corporation, and, as such, had loaned respondent money, and taken a mortgage to secure the same on the land in controversy. It does not appear that the parties had been otherwise connected in business. On or prior to said March 20, 1885, respondent was arrested, charged with a felony. His preliminary hearing before the magistrate had been fixed for the subsequent day, and respondent had been required to give a bail bond in the sum of $500 for his appearance. Under these circumstances, respondent applied to appellant to sign the bail bond as surety. The bond was signed by appellant, and the deed in question was executed. Respondent says the deed was executed to secure appellant against the liability on the bond. Appellant says it was a sale absolute, the consideration therefor ($500) to be retained by him until relieved from liability on the bond. It will be convenient to recite here that respondent appeared before the magistrate as required by the bond, and upon his preliminary hearing he was bound over to appear at the next term of the district court, and his bail fixed at $1,500, which he was unable to procure; and he remained in the county jail until in June following, when he was indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced to a term in the state penitentiary, from which he was released in the spring of 1888. The evidence is presented in the abstract at great length, and, as was our duty, we have studied it carefully; and it is necessary to refer at some length to the portion thereof which bears directly upon the question of the character of this instrument. When Jasper first went to Hazen's office, on March 20, 1885, he was accompanied by one Ames, a deputy sheriff, who had him in charge. There was also present one Clement, who was also an officer in the same corporation with Hazen. It is undisputed that at this first interview nothing was said about an absolute conveyance or a purchase. Jasper offered security, and was asked what security he could give.

After Jasper stated the security, Mr. Hazen declined to accept it or to sign the bond, whereupon Jasper and the officer started for the jail. When they had gone about one block, Hazen called them back. Here we meet the first really material conflict in the testimony. Jasper says that upon their return they went into the office, and Hazen stated that he had concluded to go on the bond provided he (Jasper) would give him a deed of his farm as security, and that he would cancel the deed if Jasper appeared for preliminary examination, and that after a short conversation this was agreed to, and the deed executed. He positively denies that there was any conversation had or contract made on the sidewalk before they entered the office. Hazen swears that when they returned, after starting for the jail, he told the officer that he wanted to see Mr. Jasper, and thereupon the officer withdrew to the distance of 25 or 30 feet, and that he then held a conversation with Jasper upon the sidewalk, and which no one else heard, wherein he offered to sign the bail bond provided Jasper would sell him the farm for $500 over and above the incumbrance thereon; that Jasper agreed thereto, and thereupon they went into the office, and the deed was drawn. The officer, Mr. Ames, testified by deposition in this case for both parties. In the deposition taken on behalf of respondent, he says: "I am a messenger of the Northern Pacific Express Company. In the spring of 1885 I was deputy sheriff, and plaintiff was in my custody upon the charge of grand larceny. I accompanied him to the office of defendant, and was present, and heard the conversation between them. Mr. Jasper asked Mr. Hazen to go on his bond for his appearance at the preliminary examination to be had before the justice of the peace. Hazen asked him what security he could give, and Jasper replied he could give him his farm as security, and his personal property. Hazen at first said he could not do it; it was not security enough. I think we then started out for the jail, and had gone nearly a block, when Hazen called us back. He then told Jasper he had concluded to help him, if he would give him a deed of his farm, and a bill of sale of his personal property. We then went into Hazen's office, and Hazen drew up a deed. My understanding was that Jasper gave the deed to secure Hazen for going on his bail bond. To the best of my recollection, Hazen was to deed back the property to Jasper on his appearance for his examination. I could not state the conversation which took place at the time the deed was made out and signed by Jasper without reading it. I understood that the deed was given simply as security for Jasper's appearance." In the deposition taken in behalf of appellant, he says: "My impression was that Hazen was to hold the land as security for the bail but, of course, I cannot say positively. The conversation in the office was very short. I don't think it lasted over ten minutes. . . . I paid no particular attention. I was simply a disinterested listener." This evidence, taken together, shows the witness to be entirely disinterested, and speaks about as positively as to the purpose for which the instrument was executed as any honest man testifying six years after the occurrence, to a matter resting entirely in parol, would care to speak. One Davidson, a witness for respondent, who had charge of respondent's personal property that was subsequently turned over to appellant, testified that, when appellant presented the order for said property, he stated that he had leased the Jasper farm. This appellant denies. Mr. Clement, for appellant, testified that he was present, in one room or the other, in the office, while Mr. Jasper was there, and that he did not hear any such contract made as that to which Jasper testified. He testified that, personally, he did not know what the deal between the parties was. This is all the direct testimony bearing upon the point, and it tends strongly to establish the fact that the instrument was given as security.

There are, however, certain circumstances that greatly strengthen respondent's case: First, we notice the great discrepancy between the value of the property and the alleged consideration. This circumstance, while not sufficient in itself to convert a deed absolute into a mortgage, is nevertheless entitled to much consideration. The trial court found this land to be worth $1,880 above the incumbrances thereon, and the finding has fair support in the evidence. It is true there is a conflict upon this point, but it is perfectly clear that Jasper considered the land worth at least $2,000 above the incumbrances. If we wish to properly understand Jasper's intention, we must view the transaction from his standpoint. This bond was for his appearance at the preliminary examination. It was given on March 20. The examination was set for the 21st, and was actually held on the 22d. Now, it is scarcely conceivable that a man in Jasper's financial condition, having little else on earth, should sell property of the value of $2,000 for the sum of $500 simply to avoid one day's confinement in the county jail. Again, Hazen testifies that, for a portion of this consideration, he subsequently gave Jasper his promissory note for $225, maturing the 1st of November, 1885. Jasper denies any such transaction. Hazen admits that he has never paid the note, that it has never been presented for payment, and that he has never heard from it, in any form whatever. This circumstance has its significance. Very soon after Jasper reached the penitentiary, he caused a letter to be written to Mr. Hazen, asking about his business generally; how the crops were looking upon the farm, etc. In the fall following he caused another letter to be written to Mr. Hazen, in which he asked what kind of a crop had been raised, and whether it was sufficient to meet the incumbrance, and requesting that, if necessary, personal property be sold to save the farm, as he wanted a home when he came back, etc. Mr. Hazen admits that he received these letters, and says: "The letters showed, distinctly, that he treated the matter as if I was running the farm for him, in substance as he claims now." No answer whatever was ever made to either letter. It would be most unusual, most unprecedented presumption, for a man in Jasper's condition, and of his business experience, to thus boldly, and without a word of explanation, excuse, or extenuation, assume the existence of certain conditions and circumstances which he knew did not exist, and which he knew that the party to whom he was writing also knew did not exist. It was also unusual for the man who received those letters to permit those statements, so important and vital, to stand unchallenged. It is not to be presumed that Mr. Hazen, during all those years, would have suffered Mr. Jasper to rest in the belief that he (Hazen) was running the farm for his (Jasper's) benefit, and that Jasper would have a home to which to return upon his release, if such were not the fact. Upon appellant's theory of the case his silence becomes as inexplicable as respondent's presumption. Another circumstance of weight is the fact that, soon after his preliminary examination, Jasper executed and delivered to his neighbor, Davidson, who had charge of his personal property, a lease of the farm for that year. The lease was drawn by Jasper's attorney, and its execution is undisputed. It is true that Jasper subsequently made an arrangement with Hazen, by which Hazen was to have charge of the farm during Jasper's incarceration, and Jasper gave Hazen a written order on Davidson for the personal property, which Davidson delivered on demand, and it does not appear that he insisted upon the lease. But there is nothing whatever to indicate that the lease was not executed in perfect good faith. This was an overt act, committed a few days after the transaction which Hazen claims was a sale, by which Jasper notified Hazen, in no uncertain terms, that he still claimed to be the owner of the land. Nothing could be more inconsistent with the idea of a sale. It must be noticed, too, that if this transaction was a sale, as appellant claims, the whole contract was consummated within five minutes from the time an absolute sale was first mentioned, and appellant purchased a farm at the beginning of seeding time, with the building thereon filled with the personal effects, grain, and feed belonging to respondent, and no arrangement whatever was made for removing respondent's property, and no time mentioned for delivering possession of the farm. This would be a very unusual course of business.

But there is one circumstance in the case that we were at first strongly inclined to think lent support to appellant's position. It is this: On the 23d day of March, 1885,—the day after the preliminary examination, and while in jail,—respondent signed an order on appellant, in favor of his attorneys, in the following form: "Fargo, D. T., March 23rd, 1885. A. H. Hazen: Pay to the order of Barnett & McEldowney one hundred dollars from the purchase price of the north-east quarter sec. 32, tp. 143, range 50." The trial court finds that, when respondent signed the order, he did not know that the words, "from the purchase price," etc., were contained in it. But we did not readily understand why respondent signed an order upon appellant on any account, unless he supposed he had funds in appellant's hands, and there is no suggestion of any source from which such funds could come, except as the purchase-price of the land. On consideration, we doubt there being any force in the point. The order was not drawn at the suggestion, request, or with the knowledge of respondent. It was drawn by appellant himself, and given to the attorneys, with the statement, in effect, that he would pay the money on it. The attorneys presented it to respondent, with a similar statement. Respondent was in jail, awaiting indictment for a felony. He could not procure bail, and was without money. To a certain extent, he was bound down. Naturally, he was very anxious to receive the best services of his attorneys, and, to that end, anxious to meet their requirements for fees. The opportunity was presented to him, and, if he stopped to think of the motives that influenced appellant (which is doubtful), he might not unreasonably conclude that since appellant had the deed in his possession, which he could refuse to return until his advances were repaid, therefore he had concluded to lend aid to that extent, appellant having already refused to go upon the enlarged bail bond. The trial court finds that this order was used by the appellant fraudulently, and with intent to cheat and defraud respondent out of his land. There is a basis for this finding. The form of the order is unique. It suggests a studied design to accomplish some object. If appellant's intention was, from the first, to defraud respondent, it can readily be seen that this order was a most adroit instrument, and, of all others, most likely to prove effective. As a probative document, the order is two-edged, and the least that can be said is that appellant is not in position to claim anything from it. It will thus be seen that there was much in the testimony and in the surrounding facts and circumstances to corroborate Mr. Jasper. There was little or nothing in the testimony or the surrounding facts and circumstances to corroborate Mr. Hazen. The principals to the transaction, with equal means of knowledge, testified in direct opposition, and with a fullness of detail that precludes all idea of mistake or defective memory. Ingenuity cannot reconcile their testimony, and the broad mantle of charity cannot conceal the fact that one or the other was willfully falsifying. It became the delicate but imperative duty of the chancellor to say which. His decision in favor of either party necessarily threw the opprobrium upon the other. By his finding he has said appellant's testimony was not entitled to credence. In view of his superior advantages in personal observation of the witnesses, and in view of the probability or improbability of their respective stories, can we say the chancellor erred in so holding? Clearly not. When appellant's testimony is disregarded, the defense is without support, and falls to the ground. Upon full consideration of all the testimony bearing upon this branch of the case, we are agreed that the evidence was sufficiently clear, convincing, and satisfactory to fully warrant the findings of the chancellor.

Judgment affirmed.

All concur.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Nebraska, ex rel. FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CRETE,

v.

Joseph S. BARTLEY, State Treasurer.

1. In construing a statute, effect must be given, if possible, to every word, clause, and sentence therein. In other words, a statute should be so construed as to make all its parts harmonize with each other, and render them consistent with its general scope and object.

2. The term "several current funds," as employed in section 1 of the Act of the Legislature of 1891, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Depositing of State and County Funds in Banks," construed to mean all the moneys belonging to the state, in the possession or under the control of the state treasurer.

3. The subject-matter of said act, and the obvious scope and purpose of its many provisions, leave no room for doubt that the legislature intended the statute should apply alike to each of the different funds of the state treasury.

4. Where money is deposited in a bank on an open account, subject to check of depositor, and not received as a special deposit,—the bank agreeing to pay interest on the money,—the transaction, although called a "deposit," is in substance and legal effect a loan.

5. Under section 9, article 8, of the State Constitution; moneys belonging to the several permanent educational funds of the state cannot be "invested or loaned except on United States or state securities, or registered county bonds."

6. The depositing in banks of public funds under the provisions of the depository law constitutes a loan and investment of the moneys so deposited.

7. Held, that the said law, in so far as it requires the depositing of the moneys belonging to the permanent educational funds of the state in banks, contravenes section 9, article 8, of the Constitution, and said law is inoperative as to said funds.

(February 20, 1894.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the state treasurer to deposit with relator a portion of the moneys in the state treasury according to the requirements of the state law. Writ allowed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James W. Dawes, for relator:

The law is the best expositor of itself; every part of it is to be taken into view for the purpose of discovering the mind of the law-giver; the details of one part may contain regulations and subject-matter restricting the intent of general expressions or words in another part of the same law, and hence,

It will not, we think, be seriously argued that the framers of our constitution intended, by the use of the language comprising section 9 of article 8, entitled "Education," to present an instrument so inflexible and rigid in its terms that compliance with those terms would defeat the very purpose for which the trust funds said section is meant to protect and secure, were formed or created, viz., that of producing an income for the furtherance of the cause of education.

The object and purpose of this provision of the constitution is not alone to keep these funds secure from loss, but as well to provide income from their use for the purpose specified in the trust.

Messrs. George H. Hastings, Atty. Gen., John H. Ames and W. S. Summers for defendant.

Norval, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application by the relator, the First National Bank of Crete, for a peremptory writ of mandamus to Joseph S. Bartley, state treasurer, to compel respondent to deposit with relator a portion of the money in the state treasury, according to the requirements of the Act passed by the State Legislature of 1891, entitled, "An Act to Provide for the Depositing of State and County Funds in Banks." The petition charges, in substance, that on the 9th day of January, 1894, the governor, attorney-general, and secretary of state, in pursuance of the provisions of said act, designated the First National Bank of Crete as a state depository, and on said day said bank executed and delivered a bond conditioned as required by said law, which bond, and the sureties thereon, were duly accepted and approved by the proper officers; that only three other banks have complied with the provisions of said act of the legislature, so as to entitle them to the deposit of state funds, and that the amount of the bonds furnished by each of said other banks was and is $100,000, so that the aggregate amount which the respondent is authorized at any time to have on deposit in all of said banks, pursuant to said act, is $150,000; that respondent has refused to deposit any of the moneys now in the state treasury with the relator, although requested so to do; that respondent, at the time of such demand and refusal, stated that all the moneys belonging to the state, which he is empowered by said act to deposit, were already deposited in the said several banks, except moneys belonging to the following funds: Sinking, relief, permanent school, temporary school, permanent university, library, agricultural college endowment, normal school endowment, temporary university, normal school interest, and saluue. The petition further charges that respondent refuses to deposit in relator's bank any of the money belonging to either of the above-enumerated funds, although the amount in his possession, and belonging to any one of said funds, added to the amount on deposit by said treasurer with the said other banks, exceeds in the aggregate the sum of $150,000, and that the sole reason given by the respondent for his refusal to deposit in the bank of the relator any of the moneys in the above-mentioned funds was and is that none of said moneys are "current funds," within the meaning of the said depository law. The cause was submitted on a general demurrer to the petition.

The first question in this case is one of construction to be given to the act above mentioned, relating to the deposit of public moneys in banks. Was it the intention of the legislature to require all moneys coming into the state treasury to be deposited, or only a certain portion thereof?

Sections 1 and 2 of said Act (Laws 1891, chap. 50), are in these words: "Section 1. The state treasurer shall deposit, and at all times keep in deposit for safe keeping, in the state or national banks, or some of them doing business in the state, and of approved standing and responsibility, the amounts of money in his hands belonging to the several current funds in the state treasury, and any such bank may apply for the privilege of keeping on deposit such funds or some part thereof; all such deposits shall be subject to payment when demanded by the state treasurer on his check and all banks receiving and holding such deposits as aforesaid, shall be required to pay, and shall pay to the state for the privilege of holding any such deposit not less than 8 per cent per annum upon the amounts so deposited, as hereinbefore provided, and subject also to such regulations as are imposed by law and the rule adopted by the state treasurer for receiving and holding such deposits. Sec. 2. The amount to be paid by any and all banks under the provisions of this act for the privilege of keeping public funds on deposit shall be computed on the average daily balances of the public moneys kept on deposit therewith, and shall be paid and credited to the state quarterly on the first days of January, April, July and October of each and every year, and the treasurer shall require every such depository to keep separate accounts of such several funds of the state as may be deposited, showing the name of each fund to which the same belongs and the amounts and sums paid to the state for the privilege of keeping the same on deposit as aforesaid, and to each of said funds respectively shall be credited directly to the account of the fund or funds so held on deposit, in proportion to the amount of such funds so held." By section 3, each bank designated as a depository under the act is required to give a bond for the safe-keeping and payment of all deposits, and the accretions thereof, conditioned that it will render each month to the state treasurer a statement, in duplicate, showing the several daily balances, and the amount of state moneys held by it during the month, the amount of the accretions thereof, how credited separately, and for the payment of the deposit, and the accretions accruing thereon, upon the presentation of the check of the state treasurer, and also that such depository will faithfully discharge the trust and comply with the provisions of the act. The section further provides the form of the bond, names the officer with which the same shall be deposited, and forbids the treasurer having on deposit in any bank, at one time, moneys exceeding one half of the penalty of the bond. Section 4 provides that "the making of profit, directly or indirectly, by the state treasurer, out of any money in the state treasury belonging to the state, the custody of which the state treasurer is charged with by loaning, depositing, or otherwise using it, or depositing the same in any manner, or the removal by the state treasurer, or by his consent, of such moneys, or a part thereof, out of the vault of the treasurer's department, or any legal depository of the same, except for the payment of warrants legally drawn or for the purpose of depositing the same in the banks selected as depositories under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof shall be subjected to punishment in the state penitentiary for the term of not more than two years, or a fine not exceeding five thousand ($5,000) dollars, and shall also be liable under and upon his official bond for all profits realized from such unlawful using of such funds. And it is hereby made the duty of the state treasurer to use all reasonable and proper means to secure to the state the best terms for the depositing of the money belonging to the state, consistent with the safe keeping and prompt payment of the funds of the state when demanded." The next section prescribed the penalty for the willful failure or refusal of the state treasurer to comply with the provisions of the act.

Counsel for the relator insists that it is the duty of the state treasurer to keep on deposit in the several banks designated as depositories all money received by him belonging to the state, while the respondent contends that the moneys belonging to what is commonly known as the "general fund"—a fund created for the purpose of paying the salaries of the state officers, and defraying the general expenses of the state government—are the only moneys to which the depository act applies. The principal controversy in the case is as to the meaning of the term "several current funds," as used in the section first above quoted. The decisions of the courts of other states do not aid us in our investigation. In fact, we have been unable to find a law upon the statute book of any state, relating to the deposit of public moneys in banks, precisely like our own. In most of the states having a depository law, the treasurer is either required by express enactment to deposit all moneys that shall come into his hands, or else the statute specifically enumerates what funds shall be deposited in banks. Of course, the phrase "current funds," as employed in commercial transactions, has a fixed, known signification. Thus, these words, as used in notes or bank checks, have been frequently defined by various courts as meaning current money, lawful money, par funds, or money circulating without any discount. See Galena Ins. Co. v. Kupfer, 28 Ill. 332, 81 Am. Dec. 284; Wharton v. Morris, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 125, 1 L. ed. 65; Hubert v. Carver, 40 Barb. 245; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Allen, 11 Mich. 501, 83 Am. Dec. 756; American Emigrant Co. v. Clark, 47 Iowa, 671. All will agree, we think, that the phrase "current funds" was not employed by the legislature, in enacting the statute under consideration, in the same sense in which that term is used in commercial dealings. The term "current funds," like many other words in our language, is susceptible of more than one meaning. Where a word is employed in a contract or statute which has different meanings, the sense in which it is used is to be gathered from the context. It is an elementary rule of construction that effect must be given, if possible, to every word, clause, and sentence of a statute. In other words, a statute must receive such construction as will make all its parts harmonize with each other, and render them consistent with its general scope and object. Follmer v. Nuckolls County Comrs. 6 Neb. 204; State v. Babcock, 21 Neb. 599. If we apply the foregoing rule in the interpretation of the law under consideration, it is not a difficult task to ascertain the legislature's intent. It should be remembered that the moneys which come into the state treasury from time to time are, either by constitutional provision or by legislative enactments, applicable to a variety of objects, and are divided into several separate and distinct funds, according to the sources from which they are derived, and the uses to which the same may be devoted. We know at the time this law was enacted that there were several of these funds, each having a well-understood and appropriate name, as the general fund, sinking fund, permanent school fund, and others which it is unnecessary to stop now to enumerate. It is obvious, therefore, that the words "several current funds" were employed by the legislature with reference to the various designations or divisions of the public moneys of the state. Manifestly, the construction placed upon the provisions of the statute by respondent's counsel is entirely too narrow and strained, and should not obtain. To adopt it would violate the rule above stated for the construction of statutes, which requires that some meaning, if possible, must be given to every word in the act, since the construction insisted upon cannot prevail, unless we attach no meaning to the word "several," in the above phrase of the first section of the law. The statute declares that "the amounts of money in his hands belonging to the several current funds in the state treasury" shall be deposited. This language was, without doubt, intended to apply to more than one fund. This is manifest by the use of the plural of the word "fund," and the employment of the adjective "several." It certainly could not have been the intention of the lawmakers that the moneys belonging to one fund, alone, should be kept on deposit with some designated depository. If they did, they were very unfortunate in the use of language. Had it been the intention of the legislature that the act should apply to a single fund, it is fair to assume that language which could not be misunderstood would have been employed to express such purpose. But it is said that the word "current," in the connection in which it is used with the word "funds," indicates that the moneys which the lawmakers intended are those raised by taxation, and which are devoted to defraying the current expenses of the state government by disbursements from what is known as the "general fund," and in the same connection reference is made to the definition of the word "current." In the Century Dictionary it is defined thus: "Running; moving; flowing; passing; present in its course; as the current month or year." Other standard authorities give the word about the same definition. Assuming that the word was employed by the legislature in the sense indicated, yet the interpretation contended for by respondent is not permissible. While the amount of money belonging to the general fund of the state is continually changing or fluctuating, caused by the paying of the revenues derived from taxation into the treasury, and by their being disbursed, it is likewise true that the amount in each of the other different funds in the treasury is constantly changing, as the records kept by the treasurer and auditor, respectively, will disclose, and of which public records this court is bound to take judicial notice.

We do not entertain a doubt as to the sinking fund, relief fund, which is also a sinking fund, and the permanent educational funds, the moneys in each of which, counsel strenuously insist, are not "current funds," within the meaning of the law. The sinking and relief funds, now aggregating about a quarter of a million of dollars, consist of moneys derived from taxes levied for the purpose of paying the interest on outstanding bonds issued by the state, and for the purpose of paying the principal of said bonds when they become due. The moneys constituting these two funds are collected and paid into the treasury from time to time, precisely the same as the taxes are collected and paid into the general fund. The interest on one set of the bonds is paid by the state treasurer annually, and the other semi-annually. The permanent school fund, permanent university, normal school endowment, and agricultural college endowment funds constitute the permanent educational funds of the state. The permanent school fund is composed of the proceeds of the sale of land by the state, and of the redemption of United States and state securities, and county bonds belonging to said fund, and of escheated estates, and a 5 per centum granted by congress on the sale of government lands in the state. Each of the other educational funds is composed of the proceeds of lands which have been set apart for that purpose and sold by the state, and the redemption of securities belonging to said funds, respectively. Each of these several funds is continually augmented by moneys received from the sources indicated, and the moneys therein are diminished from time to time by the making of investments for the benefit of said funds. Hence, the several educational funds are "current funds," in the sense in which that term is used in the law, if the moneys composing the general fund fall within the definition, and all concede that the law applies to the fund last named. In the language of counsel for relator: "For the purpose of the business of a great state, all funds are current, so long as they remain on hand, or not invested. Shall we, by the use of jugglery of language, extend the provisions of this law to the pittance of the general fund, as we often find it, and deny them to the sacred trust funds of the state? . . . These trust funds are current in that they should have and in that they demand, constant attention hourly, daily, all the time, looking to their profitable, permanent investment. These trust funds are current, moving, and changing funds, increasing and diminishing." In respect to two of the other funds of the state treasury, the temporary school and temporary university, which aggregated at the close of the last year more than $360,000, it may be observed that the first of them is derived from a tax levied and collected at the same time as other state taxes for the support of the common schools of the state, together with the interest and rentals accruing from the sale and lease of school lands, and the interest received from the investments made for the benefit of the permanent school fund. The temporary university fund is supplied from a tax levied for the support of the state university, which is likewise paid at the same time other taxes are collected, and by moneys received from the interest and rentals of lands belonging to the university endowment fund, sold and leased by the state, together with the interest on securities belonging to said fund, and tuition fees. The moneys composing the temporary school and temporary university funds are paid into the state treasury as often as the moneys constituting any other fund of the state are paid in, and more frequently than the moneys belonging to the general fund. The moneys composing the temporary school fund are apportioned among the counties every six months, and are paid upon warrants upon the state treasury drawn by the auditor. The moneys belonging to the temporary university fund are disbursed from time to time upon the auditor's warrant. Both of these are moving funds, so to speak, and the balances therein are constantly increasing and diminishing. There is no word or provision in the act we are discussing which directly, in terms or by fair implication, limits the operation thereof to the moneys of the state belonging to one fund, more than another. On the contrary, the subject-matter of the act, and the obvious scope and purpose of its provisions, conclusively show it was the intention of the legislature that the statute should apply to all funds of the state, alike. An examination of the provisions of the second and fourth sections of the law strengthens this conclusion. By the second section, it is made the duty of every bank designated as a depository "to keep separate accounts of such several funds of the state as may be deposited, showing the name of the fund to which the same belongs and the amounts and sums paid to the state for the privilege of keeping the same on deposit as aforesaid, and to each of said funds respectively shall be credited directly to the account of the fund or funds so held on deposit, in proportion to the amount of such fund as held." There is no ambiguity in this provision: Plain language could not have been used. It shows that the moneys in the several funds were to be deposited, and that the depository should keep a separate account with each fund. The fourth section, which we have quoted above, makes it the duty of the state treasurer to make every reasonable effort to secure to the state the best terms for the depositing of "the money belonging to the state," and it is also made a felony for such officer to make any profit out of any money in the state treasury, belonging thereto, by loaning, depositing, or otherwise using or disposing of it; and the removal of such money, or a part thereof, by the treasurer, or with his consent, out of the vaults of the treasury, or any legal depository, except for the payment of warrants, or for the purpose of depositing in the banks legally selected as depositories, is also declared a felony. Whether or not this section is legal and valid as a criminal statute, is not now involved, and will not be decided. Its consideration, however, tends to show the purpose and object of the legislature in enacting the law, and that the power to deposit all the moneys in the state treasury for the benefit of the state was meant to be conferred, and we think it has been, in plain terms, so far as the legislature possessed the power to do so.

This brings us to the consideration of another question, and that is whether the act which we have been considering is unconstitutional, in so far as it requires the deposit in banks of the moneys in the treasury belonging to the several educational funds of the state. Section 9 of article 8 of the Constitution of Nebraska reads as follows: "All funds belonging to the state for educational purposes, the interest and income whereof only are to be used, shall be deemed trust funds held by the state, and the state shall supply all losses thereof that may in any manner accrue, so that the same shall remain forever inviolate and undiminished; and shall not be invested or loaned except on United States or state securities, or registered county bonds of this state; and such funds, with the interest and income thereof, are hereby solemnly pledged for the purposes for which they are granted and set apart, and shall not be transferred to any other fund for other uses." The foregoing provision prohibits the loaning or investing of any moneys belonging to any of the permanent educational funds of the state, "except on United States or state securities, or registered county bonds of this state." The moneys in these several funds the constitution has impressed with a trust character, and the legislature is powerless to authorize them to be devoted to any purpose not within the scope of the constitutional provision quoted. Does the statute attempt to authorize the loaning or investing of these trust funds? Counsel for relator contend that it does not; that it merely requires their deposit temporarily for safe-keeping, pending need for use, or opportunity for permanent investment. This construction would be a reasonable and proper one, if the deposit contemplated by the statute was a special one, merely for safe-keeping, and that the same identical money should be returned. But this is not the kind of deposit the legislature meant. If it was, the purpose is not indicated in the title of the act, since it makes no reference to the safe-keeping of the funds deposited in banks. It is manifest from an examination of the entire act that a general deposit of the funds was what the framers intended. True, the first section declares that "the state treasurer shall deposit and at all times keep in deposit for safe-keeping," in the banks that shall be designated as depositories, the moneys in his hands belonging to the several current funds, subject to payment on the treasurer's check. But, further along in the same section, the bank receiving and keeping such deposit is required to pay the state not less than 8 per cent per annum upon the amounts so deposited; and the next section provides, among other things, in substance, that the interest shall be computed on the average daily balances of the public moneys kept on deposit. While the statute mentions "safe keeping," when the several provisions are construed together it is quite clear that the transaction contemplated does not amount to a special deposit. Whoever heard of that kind of a deposit of money being paid out on checks, or of a banking institution paying for the privilege of holding a special deposit of funds? The identical moneys deposited are not required to be returned. Obviously, the bank receiving them had the right to use and control the money as its own. It could loan the funds for the purpose of earning the money, with which to pay the stipulated interest due the state. A deposit of state funds, under the provisions of the law, amounts to a loan or investment of the funds so deposited. As was said by Mr. Justice Miller in his opinion in Marine Bank of Chicago v. Fulton County Bank, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 256, 17 L. ed. 787. "All deposits made with bankers may be divided into two classes, namely, those in which the bank becomes bailee of the depositor, the title to the thing deposited remaining with the latter; and the other kind of deposit of money peculiar to banking business, in which the depositor, for his own convenience, parts with the title to his money, and loans it to the banker, and the latter, in consideration of the loan of the money, and the right to use it for his own profit, agrees to refund the same amount or any part thereof, on demand." The decisions are quite uniform to the effect that, where money deposited in a bank is passed generally to the credit of the depositor, the relation of debtor and creditor is thereby created, and the transaction, although called a deposit, is nevertheless, in substance and legal effect, a loan, and this though it is payable on demand. Commercial Bank of Albany v. United States Sav. Inst. 2 Mo. App. 563. In Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28, Lord Chancellor Cottenham said: "Money, when paid into a bank, ceases altogether to be the money of the principal. It is then the money of the banker, who is bound to return an equivalent by paying a similar sum to that deposited with him when he is asked for it. The money paid into the banker's is money known by the principal to be placed there for the purpose of being under the control of the banker. It is then the banker's money. He is known to deal with it as his own. He makes what profit of it he can, which profit he retains to himself, paying back only the principal, according to the custom of bankers in some places, or the principal and a small rate of interest, according to the custom of bankers in other places. The money placed in the custody of a banker is, to all intents and purposes, the money of the banker, to do with it as he pleases. He is guilty of no breach of trust in employing it. He is not answerable to the principal if he puts it into jeopardy, if he engages in a hazardous speculation. He is not bound to keep it or deal with it as the property of his principal, but he is, of course, answerable for the amount, because he has contracted, having received that money, to repay to the principal, when demanded, a sum equivalent to that paid into his hands. That has been the subject of discussion in various cases, and that has been established to be the relative situation of banker and customer. That being established to be the relative situation of banker and customer, the banker is not an agent or factor, but he is a debtor." The Ohio case was this: The Ohio canal fund commissioners deposited with the Columbus Insurance Company $100,000 of the money and funds of the state, belonging to the canal fund, and in consideration of which the company gave a bond, signed by various persons, to repay the same in two years, with 7 per cent interest thereon per annum, payable annually. In an action by the state upon the bond, the court held that the advancement of the money to the insurance company was a loan, although the bond denominated the receipt of the money as a "deposit." In State v. Keim, 8 Neb. 63, this court held that the deposit of state moneys by a state treasurer in a bank was a loan, in its legal effect. This case was cited with approval in First Nat. Bank of South Bend v. Gandy, 11 Neb. 431.

It is urged that the Nebraska cases cited do not apply to the questions here at issue, since, at the time they arose, no law was in existence which required the deposit of public funds in bank, while now the treasurer is not only authorized to deposit them for safe-keeping, but he is expressly commanded to do so. We are unable to see the force of the argument. The fact that the legislature has enacted that state moneys shall be deposited in banks does not make the placing of the funds therein any the less a loan than had they been deposited without sanction of law. On the contrary, it would seem that the two cases decided by our own court are the more valuable as precedents for our now holding that such a transaction amounts in law to a loan, since we have a statute which authorizes the deposit of public funds, and in every case of deposit this statute enters into, and forms a part of, the contract.

Connecticut has a statute which declares that where the real estate of a married woman has been sold, and the proceeds thereof "secured or invested in her name or in the name of a trustee for her benefit, the same shall . . . not be liable to be taken on execution for the debts or liabilities of her husband." The supreme court of that state, in Jennings v. Davis, 31 Conn. 134, held that, where the money received by the wife from the sale of her lands is deposited in her name in a bank, it is invested, within the meaning of the statute. Sanford, J., in delivering the opinion, observes: "It is not stated whether the money was deposited in the bank for safe-keeping merely, or in the character of a loan to the bank, for which a stipulated rate of interest was paid during its continuance there, nor is it material to inquire, because, in either case, the deposit (being a general, as contradistinguished from a special, one) creates a debt in favor of the depositor, and against the bank, and then the money became 'invested' in that debt, and, being thus invested in the name of Mrs. Morehouse, was protected by the statute against her husband's claims upon it. . . . It can make no difference whether the depositor took any written evidence of this investment, or did not. The statute does not require any particular species of evidence that the investment has been made. It only requires that it shall be made in her name, or in the name of a trustee for her benefit. Money loaned is 'invested' in a debt against the borrower. If a promissory note is taken for it in the lender's name, the note becomes the evidence of the investment, and secures it to the lender. If no note is taken, the money is nevertheless 'invested' in the debt against the borrower, and in the lender's name."

The conclusion is irresistible that the framers of the law under review contemplated that the moneys deposited in pursuance of the provisions thereof should be retained by the bank receiving the same for an indefinite period of time and be used and loaned by it as its own, the bank being under obligation to repay the amount so deposited on the presentation of the check of the state treasurer. There is no room for doubt that, where money is deposited under this act, the bank receiving the same is not a bailee, which would be the case if the title to the money remained in the state after the same was received by the bank. Prior to the adoption of the present statute, there existed in this state no law authorizing or requiring the deposit of public funds in banks. It was, however, generally understood that each of the former state treasurers had loaned the state funds to various banking institutions of the state for his own pecuniary benefit. The state received no income from such use of its money, and it was to remedy this that the depository law was enacted, rather than to provide for the safe keeping of the moneys belonging to the state treasury. The clear and manifest object of the statute was to enable the state to receive interest on its funds deposited in banks. The transaction contemplated by the statute is as much a loan or investment of the moneys deposited under its provisions as where a bank loans its moneys on the note of its customer; and if this law can be upheld, so far as it relates to the depositing of the permanent educational funds in banks, then there is nothing to prevent the legislature from enacting a law authorizing the loaning of the educational or trust funds to its citizens, with or without security for the repayment thereof; and all will agree that such a law, if enacted, would contravene the section of the constitution above quoted. But it is said that the constitution does not say that these educational funds shall not be temporarily deposited in bank, until opportunity for their permanent investment is presented. That instrument, in express terms, forbids their being "loaned or invested," except in a certain manner; and, as we have already attempted to show, the depositing of these moneys in bank on open account, drawing interest, although deposited temporarily, constitutes a loan and investment of the money. The fact that a person borrows money for an indefinite period, payable on demand of the lender, does not make the transaction any the less a loan than if the money had been taken for a fixed, long period of time. The same is equally true as regards the depositing of money in bank. The length of time the money is left does not determine whether the transaction is a loan or not. We are satisfied, both from reason and upon authority, that the depositing of the moneys belonging to the permanent educational fund of the state in banks, under the provisions of the depository law, is, in effect, a loan and investment of the funds so deposited, and is therefore inhibited by the constitution. We do not wish to be understood as in the least intimating that the legislature is powerless to enact a law requiring the state treasurer to deposit the moneys belonging to these funds in a bank or banks for safe-keeping merely. Perhaps it has that power, but such is not the scope and effect of the law before us, since it requires a general deposit of the funds, and not a special deposit, where the identical moneys deposited are to be returned. The amount of uninvested moneys belonging to the several permanent educational funds of the state is large, and opportunities for the permanent investment of these moneys in the class of securities and bonds described in the constitution are daily becoming less frequent, so that the amount in the treasury belonging to these trust funds is constantly increasing. That they should be invested so that they will yield an income to the state, no one will deny. But the remedy, in part at least, must come through an amendment of the constitution. The courts cannot, under the guise of interpretation, extend the powers conferred by the constitution beyond the scope of its provisions.

We have not considered, nor do we now determine, whether the relator has such an interest as entitled it to maintain the action, since its right to do so has not been raised or argued by counsel. As the state at large is directly interested in the enforcement of the depository law, the attorney-general could, and doubtless it is his duty to, institute proceedings to compel the depositing of the funds in the banks designated as depositories; and perhaps a bank which has complied with the law might do so, at least in case the attorney-general should refuse to appear and file the application. As it is important to the public interests that the real questions involved in this controversy should be determined and set at rest, we have thought it necessary to pass upon the merits of the case, without going into the question of who should have instituted the proceedings. It follows from the views expressed in the above opinion that the demurrer to the application should be overruled, and a peremptory writ of mandamus allowed.

C. F. FURLEY et al.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL

(.....Iowa.....)

Absolute liability for damages caused by importation of cattle infected with Texas fever without allowing it to be shown that defendant had no notice and could not have ascertained the condition of the cattle by the exercise of reasonable care, is not created under Iowa Acts 21st Gen. Assm. chap. 153, § 2, 8, substituted for §§ 4058 and 4059 of the Code prohibiting the importation of such cattle and making a violation of the law a misdemeanor with a right of action to persons injured for the damages sustained.

NOTE.—An exemption from liability for violation of the express terms of a statute when done unintentionally and without negligence, although allowed in the above case, is not made without dissent. But the harshness of the operation of a law which would inflict a penalty for dealing in cattle which communicate an unknown and undeveloped contagion, where the dealer exercises ordinary care, and is free from any wrong intent, is so great that an implied exception seems to the majority of the court to have been intended. The statute, as an exercise of the police power, is not altogether unlike one who should make a person subject to a penalty for personally communicating a contagious

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court of Tama County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of certain cattle which died from Texas fever, which was alleged to have been communicated to them by a cow unlawfully transported into the state by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Mills & Keeler, for appellant:

The statute in question, enacted in 1886 for the protection of domestic cattle from contagious diseases, was evidently taken from an earlier and substantially similar law of the state of Kansas.

See Kan. Laws 1881, chap. 161; Laws 1884, chap. 3. In 1887 the supreme court of that state construed their statute, in a case involving the precise question at issue here, and held: "No recovery could be had against the defendant where he acted in good faith, unless he had knowledge, or such facts existed as made him chargeable with knowledge, that the cattle were diseased, or of a kind liable to communicate the disease to the domestic cattle of the state."

Patee v. Adams, 87 Kan. 138.

In 1888, a similar case against a common carrier, the supreme court of Kansas reaffirmed the construction placed upon the statute in the Patee Case.

Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Finley, 38 Kan. 550.

In the Iowa statute, the civil action for damages allowed by section 5419, is based and conditioned upon a violation of the provisions of the preceding section. The legal wrong, if any, lies in doing the act prohibited by section 5418. This section is highly penal, and must therefore be construed strictly.

Bond v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 716; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 849, 850.

As the language used does not require the interpretation of absolute liability, irrespective of negligence, the further presumption obtains that the legislature did not intend to abrogate the common-law rule in such cases, which makes negligence the basis of liability.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 290, 291, 371; Potter's Dwar. Stat. 185.

The trial court so construed and applied this statute that defendant became liable in treble damages if it erred by refusing to transport the cow, and in actual damages with added fine or imprisonment, or both, if it erred by carrying the cow into the state. A construction of statute which necessarily leads to such absurd, unjust, and oppressive results cannot be correct in law, and should not be adopted by this court.

Even in strictly penal laws, the general rule excuses an innocent violation committed under an honest mistake of the facts, and this upon the plainest principles of reason and justice.

Under the Fire and Stock Statute the liability is just as absolute for failure to keep the fence in proper condition after construction, as for failure to erect it originally, yet this court has uniformly held that knowledge of the defective condition of the fence, and negligence in maintaining it, were necessary conditions of liability on the part of the railroad company.

Ayleworth v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 30 Iowa, 461; Perry v. Dubuque & S. W. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 105; McCormick v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 195.

There must be negligence somewhere to make the company liable.

The construction placed upon this Texas Fever Statute by the court below brings it in direct conflict with section 8, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, as amounting to a regulation and burdensome restriction of interstate commerce.

The statute, as construed below, cannot be justified as a mere quarantine regulation, or legitimate exercise of the police power of the state.

Messrs. Struble & Stiger for appellees.

Rothrock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the record that on June 22, 1890, one Nathan L. Brown shipped from Long Beach, on the Gulf of Mexico, six disease. If such diseases were communicated by a person in whom it had not fully developed, and who was not aware of the fact that he had it or could communicate it, a statute making him liable therefor might be constitutional, but surely a very strict construction of it would be proper.

As to the liability of persons for communicating

For liability of one who kills a horse which was not in fact diseased, in supposed obedience to a statute requiring the destruction of glandered horses, see Miller v. Horton (Mass.) 10 L. R. A. 116.

miles east of Pass Christian, in the state of Mississippi, a carload of emigrant movables, consisting of household goods, a horse, and a cow, to a station on defendant's road at Elberon, Tama county, in this state. Brown accompanied the car, and remained in charge of its contents, throughout the journey. The car was billed through from the starting point to its destination, and it was transported over connecting lines until it reached Port Byron Junction, in the state of Illinois, where it was delivered to the defendant, to be forwarded over defendant's road to its destination. When the car arrived at Elberon, which was about June 27, 1890, Brown unloaded and took away his property. He turned the cow into a pasture with plaintiffs' cattle, and it is claimed by the plaintiffs that their cattle contracted the disease known as "Texas Fever" from said cow, and that by reason thereof about thirty-two of plaintiffs' cattle died. The defendant filed an answer in two counts. The plaintiffs demurred to the second count of the answer. The court sustained the demurrer. The trial proceeded upon the petition and the first count in the answer. The main contention on the trial, after the demurrer was sustained, appears to have been on the question whether the plaintiffs' cattle died from Texas fever by contagion from the said cow owned by Brown, or from some other disease.

It is conceded by counsel for the respective parties that the principal question in this appeal is whether the demurrer to the second count of the answer was rightly sustained. We will therefore proceed to a consideration of that question. The defendant, in the second count of the answer, admits that it received the car at Port Byron Junction in the state of Illinois, with a waybill of said car and contents, and that said cow and other property were shipped from Long Beach, near Pass Christian, Miss. The defensive part of the answer is as follows: "And defendant further avers that at no time while said car and stock were so in its possession or under its control, whether in transit or otherwise, did it have any knowledge or information whatever, of any nature or degree, that said cow was in such condition as to infect with or to communicate Texas fever to other cattle, or to plaintiffs' cattle; that, if such cow was then in that condition, such fact was utterly unknown to this defendant, and could not have been discovered by it with the means then at its command, or in the exercise of such care on its part as was required by law, under the circumstances; that this defendant exercised all due care and caution on its part, and had neither knowledge nor means of knowledge that said cow, when so brought within the state of Iowa, or when delivered at Elberon, was diseased, or was in such condition as to infect with or to communicate to other cattle Texas fever, as alleged in plaintiffs' petition, and it was not negligent in that respect." There were several paragraphs in the demurrer, separately numbered; but there was really only one ground upon which it was claimed that the answer was vulnerable to the demurrer. It is clearly stated in the seventh paragraph, which is as follows: "The statute of Iowa expressly prohibited any person from bringing into this state cattle in such a condition as to infect with or to communicate Texas fever to other cattle. Defendant, in the said second count of its answer, admits, by implication, the violation of this statute, but pleads, as a defense and excuse, that it acted in ignorance and without information as to the condition of the animal in question; and the admission of the defendant that it violated the law of this state is not excused by an allegation of want of knowledge or information, nor that it acted in violation of law in ignorance of its provisions, and exercised care in the premises." It will be observed that the demurrer is as broad as the answer and the question presented is, Is the defendant absolutely liable to the plaintiffs, notwithstanding the fact that its agents and employes had no knowledge or information of the condition of the cow, and that the said condition could not have been discovered by the exercise of proper care and caution, and that the defendant was not negligent in receiving the car, and transporting its contents to the destination? The ruling on the demurrer precluded the defendant from showing that it exercised all proper care and caution, and was not chargeable with negligence; and the charge to the jury was to the effect that if the cow was, at the time of shipment, in such condition as to infect with or communicate Texas fever to other cattle, and did communicate the disease to plaintiffs' cattle, from which disease they, or some of them, died, the defendant was absolutely liable for damages.

The question is to be determined by the construction placed on chapter 156 of the Acts of the 21st General Assembly, which is amendatory to, or rather substituted for, sections 4058 and 4059 of the Code. The second section of the Act, which is designated as section 4058, prohibits any person or corporation from importing any cattle into this state which, at the time of such importation, are in such condition as to infect with or communicate to other cattle pleuropneumonia, or splenic or Texas fever. It makes the violation of the law a misdemeanor, and visits the offender with a fine of not less than $300, and not more than $1,000, or by both fine and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, in the discretion of the court. The third section of the Act is as follows: "Any person who shall be injured or damaged by any of the acts of the persons named in section 4058, and which are prohibited by such section, in addition to the remedy therein provided, may bring an action at law against any such persons, agents, employes or corporation mentioned therein, and recover the actual damages sustained by the person or persons so injured, and neither said criminal proceeding nor said civil action shall in any stage of the same be a bar to a conviction or to a recovery in the other." This statutory provision does not appear to us to be essentially different, so far as the rule of liability thereunder is involved, from that part of section 1289 of the Code which was under consideration by this court in the case of Small v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 50 Iowa, 388. That provision is as follows: "Any corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages by fire that is set out or caused by operating of any such railway, and such damage may be recovered by the party damaged in the same manner as set forth in this section in regard to stock, except as to double damages." It was held, in the case above cited, that this does not create an absolute liability, but makes the fact of an injury so occurring only prima facie evidence of negligence, which may be rebutted by a showing of freedom from negligence. It is true that the decision in that case was made by a divided court; but the rule of the majority has since been followed in very many cases. See Slosson v. Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co. 51 Iowa, 294; Lobby v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 52 Iowa, 92; Babcock v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 62 Iowa, 598, 598; Rose v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 62 Iowa, 625; Seska v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 137; Engle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 661, 666; Greenfield v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 83 Iowa, 270. And since the decision was made in Small's Case there have been six regular sessions of the general assembly, and we are not aware that at any time there has been any proposition introduced looking to an amendment of this statute, so as to make the liability for setting out fires absolute. Under the circumstances, it would be an amazing departure from a long line of decisions to hold that the construction adopted in Small's Case is not the settled law of this state, as expressed by this court, and as enacted by the lawmaking power. As we have said, the statute declaring liability for setting out fires, so far as the question of its absoluteness is involved, is not different from the statute applicable to this case. We need not here set them out side by side. They are essentially the same, as will appear by any fair examination of their provisions. It is provided by a statute of the state of Kansas as follows: "That no person or persons shall drive or cause to be driven into or through any county in this state, any cattle diseased with the disease known as Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever. Any person violating any provision of this Act shall on conviction be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than one hundred and not more than one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned in the county jail not less than thirty days and not more than one year." Another section of the same Act is as follows: "Any person or persons who shall drive or cause to be driven into or through any county in this state any of the cattle mentioned in section one of this Act, in violation of this Act, shall be liable to the party injured for all damages that may arise from the communication of disease from the cattle so driven to be recovered in civil action, and the party so injured shall have a lien upon the cattle so driven."

In the case of Pates v. Adams, 37 Kan. 188, it was held that in an action to recover damages under this statute it was essential for the plaintiff to allege and prove that the defendant knew, or had reason to know, that the cattle so driven were diseased with the fever, or were liable to communicate the disease to the domestic cattle of the state. It will be observed that the statute involved in that case is not essentially different from our own. They both declare a liability in general terms, without any language importing an absolute liability. The cited case goes much further than Small's Case, or than we do in the case at bar, and holds that the burden of proof of knowledge or negligence is on the plaintiff. Pates v. Adams, supra, was followed and approved in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Finley, 38 Kan. 550. Counsel for appellee admit that the cited cases involve the same question which we are considering. It is to be conceded that a contrary rule has been adopted in the state of Missouri. See Wilson v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 60 Mo. 184, and Surface v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 63 Mo. 452. In our opinion, the rule of the Kansas cases is in line with the better principle.

But it is claimed by counsel for appellee that the question has, in effect, been determined by this court; and we are cited to the cases of Jamison v. Burton, 48 Iowa, 282; Dudley v. Sautbaine, 49 Iowa, 650, 31 Am. Rep. 165; State v. Thompson, 74 Iowa, 119, and State v. Cloughly, 73 Iowa, 626.

These and other cases which have been decided by this court are mainly prosecutions for violations of the prohibitory liquor law of this state by selling beer to minors and inebriates, and it is held that want of knowledge of the age or habits of the purchaser is no defense. The principle upon which the cases rest is that the avocation of the vendor of intoxicating liquors is unlawful, except under certain circumstances, and that, when he sells, he assumes the burden of knowing that these circumstances exist, and sells his liquor at his peril. It is a general rule that mere ignorance of fact will not excuse a person from a penalty provided by statute. 3 Greenl. Ev. § 21. But that principle can have no application to one who, in the pursuit of a lawful calling, and in the exercise of proper care and caution, does an act contrary to some statutory requirement. The theory of appellee is that defendant committed a criminal act, the violation of which is punishable by fine and imprisonment, and that, as it could make no successful defense to a criminal prosecution, it is absolutely liable for the damages occasioned by the criminal act. This is not an absolute rule. The law is well settled that, when a railroad train is operated through a city at a rate of speed prohibited by law or ordinance under a penalty, there is no absolute liability to a person injured by reason of the violation of the law or ordinance. It may, in such case, be shown that the person injured contributed to cause the injury by his own negligence. The application of the principle contended for to the facts of this case, it appears to us, shows conclusively that the defendant should have the right to prove, if it can, that it was free from negligence in receiving and transporting the car over its road. There is no hardship to plaintiffs in adopting this rule. The case is exceptional in its facts.

It was not an ordinary shipment of livestock, which would put the employers on inquiry as to whether the animals were such as come within the provisions of the statute. The cow was not bred in the south. The owner of the property was a resident of this state. In the fall of the year previous to the shipment complained of, Brown went to Long Beach to remain during the winter. He shipped his cow, with certain household goods, to that place, and the alleged cause of action arose when he reshipped the property to this state in the spring following. There was nothing in the appearance of the cow indicating that she had any disease. The fact appears to be that she was not diseased. She was milked during all the time she was in the south, and after she was returned to this state, and the milk was used by Brown's family. In the autumn of the following year she was fattened and slaughtered, and her flesh was used for food. There is evidence, however, to the effect that an animal acclimated in the south, and removed to this state, may communicate the Texas fever to cattle here without showing any evidence of the disease itself. In view of this claim, and in consideration of the fact that the defendant, as a common carrier, is bound to receive and transport freight offered for shipment, it would be unjust and unreasonable to require that it be absolutely liable to pay all damages arising by reason of the carrying of animals that may communicate contagious diseases, without allowing it to be shown that the carrier had no notice, and could not, by the use of reasonable care, have ascertained, that the animal belonged to the class, the transportation of which is forbidden by the statute. We think the statute under consideration does not impose any such absolute liability. The business of a common carrier is not only lawful, but it is absolutely essential as an agency in the transaction of the business interests and commercial affairs of the country. Under the facts of this case, the claim of appellee, in the face of the facts pleaded in the answer, is that the defendant was bound at its peril, before receiving the car, to ascertain that the animal was not in such condition as to communicate the disease to other cattle. Under the law of this state and the act of congress known as the "Interstate Commerce Law," the defendant was bound to receive freight in car lots, and haul it to its destination. McClain's Code, § 2039; 24 Stat. at L. 879. And the nature of the freight in this case was such that the defendant was bound to act promptly. It was liable to an action for damages if it failed to do so. The contention of plaintiff is that there is a liability for fine and imprisonment and damages for receiving and hauling the car. Suppose that the defendant was a natural person, and should be indicted, and he should offer to prove the facts set up in this answer; we think there ought to be no question that it would be a great error to reject the evidence, and hold the defendant guilty of a crime, and imprison him in a county jail for six months, and fine him $1,000. There is nothing in either the letter or the spirit of the statute which would sanction any such proceeding. The case is essentially different from those arising upon such police regulations as are enacted for the purpose of regulating dramshops, gambling houses, and the smuggling of goods, and the like. Counsel for appellee, in their argument in this court, say that, if the construction of the statute which we have adopted is to prevail, "it will at once become a dead letter, and may as well be repealed." We think the fears of counsel are groundless. As we have said, the case at bar is exceptional in its facts. We hold that the defendant should be allowed to show that it was blameless, if it can make such a showing. The rule in the Small Case left that statute in full force, and recovery has been had under that law in a large number of cases, as the reports of the decisions of this court will show.

Kinne, J., took no part in the decision of this case.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

I do not agree to what is said in the foregoing opinion in regard to the effect of chapter 156 of the Acts of the 21st General Assembly. Section 4058 of the Code, as amended by that act, provides as follows:

"Any railway company . . . who shall carry, ship, or deliver any cattle into this state . . . which at the time they were . . . brought, shipped, or transported into this state were in such condition as to infect with or to communicate to other cattle, pleuropneumonia, or splenic or Texas fever, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than three hundred dollars and not more than one thousand dollars, or by both fine and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months. . . ." In my opinion, the offense for which that section provides is one of the class referred to in 3 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 21, in the following language: "Where a statute commands that an act be done or omitted which, in the absence of such statute, might have been done without culpability, ignorance of the fact or state of things contemplated by the statute, it seems, will not excuse its violation. Thus, for example, when the law enacts the forfeiture of a ship having smuggled goods on board, and such goods are secreted on board by some of the crew, the owner and officers being alike innocently ignorant of the fact, yet the forfeiture is incurred notwithstanding their ignorance. Such is also the case in regard to many other fiscal, police, and other laws and regulations, for the mere violation of which, irrespective of the motives or knowledge of the party, certain penalties are enacted; for the law, in these cases, seems to bind the party to know the facts and to obey the law at his peril."

In Com. v. Raymond, 97 Mass. 568, it is said to be the general rule, where acts which are not evil in themselves are prohibited by law from motives of public policy, and not because of their moral turpitude or the criminal intent with which they are committed, that persons are bound to know the facts and obey the law at their peril. That doctrine I understand to be fully sustained by the authorities. Thus, in 1 Wharton on Criminal Law, § 88, it is said: "When a statute makes an act indictable irrespective of guilty knowledge, then ignorance of fact, no matter how sincere, is no defense. . . . The function of imposing indictability on pernicious acts, irrespective of intent, is one which has been exercised by legislatures, not only frequently, but from necessity. . . . The question is one of policy; and this may be taken into consideration when the legislative meaning is sought. That a man should be convicted of a malicious act without proof of malice, or of a negligent act without proof of negligence, is of course an enormity which no legislature could be supposed to direct. But it is otherwise as to certain mischievous acts, which it may be a sound policy to prohibit arbitrarily, because they imperil public safety (as, for example, the selling of intoxicating drinks and defective storing of explosive compounds), and because to require scienter to be proved would be to defeat the object of the statutes, since in many cases, and those the most dangerous of the class, it would be out of the power of the prosecution to prove scienter beyond reasonable doubt."

The doctrine of the statements quoted is illustrated by the citation of numerous cases where persons were adjudged guilty of crimes by innocently doing acts which they believed, and had good reason to believe, were lawful; and the conclusion of the author is that honest ignorance of a fact may be no more of a defense than honest ignorance of a law, and that honest belief that an illegal act is legal is not necessarily a defense in a criminal prosecution. See also State v. Hartfel, 24 Wis. 60; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 689. The doctrine of the authorities cited was approved in the recent case of Com. v. Weiss, 189 Pa. 247, 11 L. R. A. 530. A legislative enactment of that state, known as the "Oleomargarine Act," provided that "no person, firm, or corporate body shall manufacture out of any oleaginous substance or any compound of the same, other than that produced from unadulterated milk or of cream from the same, any article designed to take the place of butter or cheese produced from pure unadulterated milk, or cream from the same, or of any imitations or adulterated butter or cheese, nor shall sell or offer for sale, or have in his, her, or their possession with intent to sell the same as an article of food." The act also provided that every person who should manufacture, sell, or offer or expose for sale, or have in his possession with intent to sell, any substance, the manufacture and sale of which is prohibited by the provision quoted, should for every such offense forfeit and pay the sum of $100. The action named was commenced against the keeper of a restaurant to recover the statutory penalty for a violation of the law. It appeared that he had served a customer with oleomargarine, contrary to the provisions of the act specified, but that he did not knowingly furnish, or authorize to be furnished, to any of his customers, any oleomargarine, but, so far as he knew, furnished genuine butter. In considering his guilt the court said: "Whether a criminal intent or a guilty knowledge is a necessary ingredient of a statutory offense is a matter of construction. It is for the legislature to determine whether the public injury threatened in any particular matter is such, and so great, as to justify an absolute and indiscriminate prohibition, even if, in the honest prosecution of any particular trade or business, conducted for the manufacture of articles of food, the product is healthful and nutritious; yet, if the opportunities for fraud and adulteration are such as to threaten the public health, it is undoubtedly in the power of the legislature either to punish those who knowingly traffic in the fraudulent article, or, by a sweeping provision to that effect, to prohibit the manufacture and sale altogether. The question for us to decide, therefore, is whether or not, from the language of the statute, and in view of the manifest purpose and design of the same, the legislature intended that the legality or illegality of the sale should depend upon the ignorance or knowledge of the party charged. The statute in question was the exercise of the police power, and the act was sustained upon this ground, not only in this court, but also in the Supreme Court of the United States. . . . The prohibition is absolute and general; it could not be expressed in terms more explicit and comprehensive. The statutory definition of the offense embraces no word implying that the forbidden act shall be done knowingly or willfully, and, if it did, the design and purpose of the act would be practically defeated. The intention of the legislature is plain,—that persons engaged in the traffic shall engage in it at their peril, and that they cannot set up their ignorance of the nature and qualities of the commodities they sell as a defense."

The rule of the authorities cited has been frequently recognized by this court. In State v. Probasco, 62 Iowa, 401, it was held that if a minor was permitted to remain in a billiard saloon, in violation of the statute, the offense prescribed by the statute was committed, even though the keeper of the saloon did not know of the presence of the minor. See also State v. Thompson, 74 Iowa, 122. The same rule has been applied in cases involving acts wrong in themselves. Thus, in State v. Newton, 44 Iowa, 45, it was held that a person who made an assault on a female under the age of ten years for a purpose forbidden by section 8861 of the Code was guilty of a violation of section 3873, even though he did not know that the child was under that age. It was said that the crime did not depend upon the knowledge of defendant of the fact that the child was under ten years of age but upon the fact itself. The case of State v. Ruhl, 8 Iowa, 449, announces a similar doctrine, and it is supported by numerous decisions in civil cases. In Dudley v. Sautbine, 49 Iowa, 650, 31 Am. Rep. 165, it was held that, where the agent of the owner of a saloon sold intoxicating liquor to a person who was in the habit of becoming intoxicated in violation of law, his principal was liable, although the liquor was sold without his knowledge, and in violation of instructions he had given. See also Church v. Higham, 44 Iowa, 482. Where a person had the right to sell intoxicating liquor to some persons, but was prohibited from selling to a minor, he was guilty of a violation of the law in selling to a minor, although he did not know that the purchaser had not attained his majority, and had good reason to suppose that he had. Jamison v. Burton, 43 Iowa, 282. If a person set fire to and burn, or cause to be burned, any prairie or timber land, and allow such fire to escape his control, between the 1st day of September in any year and the 1st day of May following, he is absolutely liable for damages which result, and his liability is not affected by the degree of diligence he used to prevent the escape of the fire. Conn v. May, 36 Iowa, 241; Thoburn v. Campbell, 80 Iowa, 340.

Section 4059 of the Code, as amended by chapter 156 of the Acts of the 21st General Assembly, provides that "any person who shall be injured or damaged by any of the acts of the persons named in section 4058 and which are prohibited by such section, in addition to the remedy therein provided, may bring an action at law against any such persons, agents, employes, or corporations mentioned therein, and recover the actual damages sustained by the person or persons so injured, and neither said criminal proceeding nor said civil action, in any stage of the same, shall be a bar to a conviction or to a recovery in the other." This section authorizes a recovery for damages which were caused by any of the acts prohibited by the preceding section. It follows that if they may be committed without knowledge of the condition of the cattle, although reasonable care has been exercised to ascertain it, and without an evil intent, persons injured by them may recover damages caused thereby, without regard to the knowledge or intent of the persons who committed them, and without regard to the diligence they used to avoid them. The right of recovery extends to all acts causing damage which are made criminal by the statute. Section 4058 is in the nature of a police regulation. In Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Busen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527, it was admitted that, in the exercise of its police powers, a state may enact laws for the protection of property within its borders, and to that end may exclude animals having contagious or infectious diseases; and the same doctrine has been announced in other cases and is well settled.

It is said, however, that the statute under consideration, so far as the rule of liability thereunder is involved, is not essentially different from that construed in Small v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 50 Iowa, 838, and that the doctrine of that case should be applied in this. It does not seem to me that there is anything to justify the presumption that the general assembly intended to incorporate the doctrine of the Small Case in its revision of sections 4058 and 4059 of the Code. The originals of those sections were enacted by the 12th General Assembly in the year 1868, and were incorporated, in a modified form, in the Code of 1873, nearly six years before the opinion in the Small Case was filed. Both the Act of 1868 and the Code made it unlawful for any one to bring into the state Texas cattle, and provided for the recovery of damages by persons injured by violations of the law, and contained nothing to indicate that such violations would depend upon the knowledge or negligence of the person who should bring the cattle into the state. In that respect those statutes were in legal effect the same as the Act of the 21st General Assembly. An additional reason for concluding that the general assembly did not intend to adopt, in the Act of 1886, the construction placed upon section 1289 in the Small Case, is the fact that the opinion in that case was founded almost wholly upon considerations which have no application to the act under consideration. The portion of section 1289 construed in the Small Case is as follows: "Any corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages by fire that is set out or caused by operating of any such railway, and such damage may be recovered by the party damaged in the same manner as set forth in this section in regard to stock." The court said: "The first clause of the provision might seem to create an absolute liability. It makes the company liable for all fires caused by the operating of its road. If this provision stood alone, it would go far to support the plaintiff's construction (that the liability created is absolute, not depending on the negligence of defendant), although it would not necessarily sustain it, as we will hereafter endeavor to show." The court concluded that the liability was not absolute, for the reasons (1) that the first clause was coupled with a provision which provided for the manner of recovery; (2) that when a fire occurs in the legitimate use of railway property, without fault in the mode of use, and simply by the intervention of an uncontrollable element of nature, the cause of the fire is to be referred to the element, and not to the use; (3) that in paying the damages for its right of way the railway company compensates the property owner for the dangers to which his property is exposed by operating the railway; (4) that the statute was of doubtful construction, and it was therefore proper to give some weight to what might be considered as demanded or forbidden by the public interest; (5) that contributory negligence of the property owner would defeat recovery when the corporation was in fault, and should also defeat it when the corporation was not in fault. It seems to me apparent that the first, second, and third grounds of the opinion, as I have stated them, do not exist in this case. The language used in the Statute of 1886 is not doubtful, but direct and clear, and the policy of the statute is not a matter for judicial consideration. The conclusion of the opinion that the corporation is not liable when the property owner is guilty of contributory negligence is contrary to the rule adopted by this court in West v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 77 Iowa, 654, 659, and other cases.

Whether the decision in the Small Case is correct is, it seems to me, a question which is not involved in this case, and which there is no occasion to determine.

The Kansas cases cited in the opinion of the majority rest in part upon a statute enacted after the one which was directly involved, but upon the same subject, which provided that, when the cattle which communicated the disease were brought into the state from a place south of the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude, that fact should be taken as prima facie evidence that the cattle were capable of communicating, and liable to impart, the disease, and that the owner or person in charge of the cattle had full knowledge and notice thereof. Our statutes contain no provision of that kind. It is said the principle stated in 8 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 21, "can have no application to one who, in the pursuit of a lawful calling, and in the exercise of proper care and caution, does an act contrary to some statutory requirement." So far as that statement refers to acts which are prohibited by statutes, without regard to the knowledge or intent with which they are committed, and especially those in the nature of police regulations, it seems to me to be contrary to the authorities, including decisions of this court, and not to be well-founded in reason. It is well settled that honest ignorance of the law will not excuse its violation, and in many cases it is as reasonable and as consistent with a due regard to liberty and property to provide that honest ignorance of a fact shall not excuse a violation of a law which is demanded by public policy. The Oleomargarine Act of Pennsylvania does not prohibit the acts therein contemplated in terms any more direct and positive than does the statute under consideration, and the language used by the supreme court of that state which I have quoted is, in the main, applicable in this case. The statutory definition of the offense charged against defendant "embraces no word implying that the forbidden act shall be done knowingly or willfully, and, if it did, the design and purpose of the act would be practically defeated." The general assembly intended to protect the large and growing cattle interests of this state from the danger to which they would be exposed if cattle in the condition specified in the act should be brought into the state. It was for the general assembly to determine whether that danger, and the interests threatened, were "so great as to justify an absolute and indiscriminate prohibition." If a railway corporation may excuse its act in bringing into this state prohibited cattle on the ground that it did not know their condition, and could not, with ordinary and reasonable care, have ascertained it, then it seems to me evident that the statute must fail to accomplish its purpose to a great extent, if not wholly; and that is especially true if the corporation may be required to receive such cattle, and deliver them to the consignee within this state, without regard to their condition; and I understand the opinion of the majority to hold, in effect, that when a loaded car, although containing prohibited animals, is tendered to such corporation, it is its duty to receive and forward it, and to act promptly in doing so, and that such duty may make unnecessary such a delay as would be required to ascertain their condition. That it is necessary to so hold to sustain the opinion appears from the fact that, if the mere conclusions set out in the portion of the answer demurred to are disregarded, no effort whatever on the part of the defendant to ascertain the condition of the cow is shown. The theory of the answer seems to be that as the defendant had no actual knowledge of the condition of the cow, and could not have ascertained it readily by inquiry, it would not have been justified in delaying to receive and forward the car until it could ascertain the fact. If that is the law (and under the rule of the majority opinion it seems to be), the cases in which railway corporations bringing prohibited cattle into this state cannot show lack of knowledge must be few; for such cattle will ordinarily be received from other railways, loaded in cars, and forming part, or all, of full car loads, and the obligation to receive and forward them without delay will be as pressing as it was in this case. It is said that the objection that, under the construction adopted by the majority, the statute will have little, if any, effect is groundless, and the result of the decision in the Small Case is cited in support of that statement. But the character of the cases contemplated by section 1289 of the Code is wholly unlike those for which the statute under consideration provides. When property is destroyed by fire from a locomotive engine, the circumstances attending its destruction are, or may become, fully known to the owner, and proof of them is readily obtainable. For that reason he may be able to overcome the prima facie showing of the railway company that its engines were in good order, and that it was free from negligence in setting the fires. But to rebut proof of care, and want of knowledge, on the part of the company in cases arising under the statute in controversy, the person injured would be compelled to seek evidence of a kind difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain, beyond the limits of the state and in unknown quarters, and practically he would be in the power of the company. I do not think that a railway company can be compelled to receive and bring into this state, without delay, freight in car lots which includes prohibited cattle. The act prohibiting them is valid, and, so long as it stands, its violation is not required by any act of congress or of the general assembly.

The hardship involved in holding the defendant liable if it could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered the actual condition of the cow, is evident, and might well be considered by the general assembly in determining whether criminal liability should be incurred in such cases; but, so long as the statute creates the liability, the courts should not interfere to defeat the legislative purpose. That hardship and apparent injustice sometimes result from the enforcement of criminal statutes is inevitable; but that is not a sufficient reason for not enforcing them, nor for adopting a rule of construction which may do justice in exceptional cases, but which will tend to defeat it in others. In this case it would not be a greater hardship to require defendant to pay the damages which its act in bringing the cow into the state caused than it is for the plaintiff to sustain it without compensation, and, if both parties are equally free from negligence or intentional wrong, there would be an element of justice frequently recognized by the courts in compelling the one whose act caused the loss to bear it. That the statute in question was intended to create an absolute liability for the bringing into the state of prohibited cattle, without regard to the knowledge or intent with which it was done, is further shown by the general course of procedure in regard to criminal statutes which was pursued by the general assembly which enacted it. That body passed seventeen acts which were of a criminal character, or contained penal provisions. Two of them—chapter 66 of the Acts of the 21st General Assembly, relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, and chapter 83, relating to the practice of pharmacy—related to subjects upon which it is admitted the general assembly may properly legislate, creating liability for prohibited acts without regard to the knowledge with which they are committed, and need not be considered. Of the remaining 15, chapter 80, relating to embezzlement; chapter 63, relating to fish dams; chapter 76, relating to foreign corporations; chapter 78, relating to the funding of indebtedness of certain cities; chapter 79, prohibiting traffic in hogs which died of disease; chapter 104, regulating the practice of medicine; chapter 117, relating to mortgaged personal property; chapter 148, providing for a custodian of public buildings; chapter 161, in regard to elections; and chapter 177, relating to obscene literature,—contained provisions of a penal nature, without in terms making knowledge or intent an element of the act prohibited; but in each case the act is of such a nature as necessarily to involve knowledge, or negligence in not obtaining it. Chapter 52, relating to imitation of butter and cheese; chapter 65, relating to mutual benefit associations; chapter 165, relating to the sale and transfer of grain; and chapter 174, to prevent fraud in canned food,—create offenses which may, for convenience, be divided into two classes: (1) Those which involve the doing of an act prohibited, or the omission of an act commanded, where knowledge that the act or omission is unlawful exists from the nature of the case, unless there has been negligence to obtain it; and, in those cases, words requiring knowledge as an element of the offense are not used in the statute. (2) Those acts or omissions which are prohibited, but which are not criminal unless the act or omission is with knowledge that it is unlawful; and in the definition of those offenses—some eight or more in all—the word “knowingly” is used in each case. Thus, section 2 of chapter 52 makes it a misdemeanor for any person who manufactures imitation butter or cheese to omit to mark it in the manner prescribed in the act. It is not said that the manufacturer must know of the omission in order to commit the offense, but it is within his power to know and prevent it. The next four sections provide for various offenses, but make knowledge a necessary element of each of them, in terms which cannot be misunderstood. Thus, section 8 provides that “no carrier shall knowingly receive for the purpose of forwarding or transporting any imitation butter or imitation cheese,” unless it shall be marked and consigned in the manner prescribed. Section 8 makes the possession or control of imitation butter or cheese, not marked as required by the act, presumptive evidence of knowledge on the part of the person having such possession or control. Chapter 156 is the only one of the 17 Acts of the 21st General Assembly referred to, if chapter 66 be excepted, which prohibits an act which may be permitted in honest ignorance that it is forbidden, without in terms making knowledge that it was forbidden necessary to a conviction. The general assembly was careful to provide that a carrier should not be liable to a fine of not more than $100, nor to imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, for receiving imitation butter or cheese not properly marked and consigned, unless it was done with knowledge of the fact. The omission to provide that the acts prohibited by the statute under consideration must be done with knowledge to create the heavier criminal liability and the civil liability, in view of the rule followed in other cases, is most significant. It seems to me the omission can have but one explanation, and that is that in enacting chapter 156 the General Assembly designed to make the prohibited act penal, and to create an absolute liability, without regard to the knowledge of the party committing it. The facts in this case tend strongly to justify the general assembly in adopting stringent measures to keep out of the state cattle in the condition described in the statute. The bringing into the state of one cow resulted in the death of thirty-two cattle owned by the plaintiff. If shipments into the state of cattle in condition to communicate to other cattle the disease contemplated by the statute were numerous, the loss which such shipments might cause to the cattle industries of the state is beyond computation. That fact was known to the general assembly when the statute was enacted, and no doubt was felt to be a sufficient justification of the severe provisions which it contains. It seems to me that the interpretation of the statute adopted in the opinion of the majority is contrary to the legislative intent, and that its practical effect will be to defeat the legislative will.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

William T. Wiant et al., Appts.,

- *1. The title to land forfeited for non-entry on the assessor's land books, by section 7, p. 90, Acts 1869 (Code 1868, chap. 31, § 84), vested in the state upon the forfeiture, by the mere force of the statute, and without judicial or other proceeding declaring the forfeiture, and therefore a judgment against the former owner, rendered after such forfeiture, is no lien on such land.
- *2. The right of the former owner to the excess of the proceeds of the sale of such forfeited land, after payment of taxes, interest, and costs, accorded to him by section 5, article 13, of the Constitution, is property in the former owner,—personal property,—which he may sell, and which is liable to the lien of a fiert facias against him; and such property as that, if a transfer be made of it in fraud of creditors, they may maintain a suit in equity to avoid the transfer.
- *3. Personal property, to be the subject of sale, must have an existence, but a potential existence is sufficient.
- *4. Under section 2, chap. 141, Code, a writ of fiert facias is a lien upon personal property, not of such nature as to be leviable, owned by the debtor before its return day, if docketed as required in said section, against a purchaser for value, without notice other than the constructive notice arising from such docketing; but, if not so docketed, the lien will not affect such purchaser, if he be a bona fide purchaser for value, and without notice of the writ. It makes no difference, so far as the protection of the purchaser is concerned, whether he purchased before or after the return day of the writ.
- *5. A proceeding under chapter 105 of the Code of 1887, by a commissioner of school lands, for the sale of forfeited lands, is a judicial proceeding,—a suit, not simply an administrative proceeding. The court may in it allow one claiming right to the surplus proceeds of its sale to file his petition asking such surplus to be paid to him.

(December 9, 1893.)

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Gilmer County in favor of defendants in a proceeding instituted to reach the surplus of certain property which had been sold for taxes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meers. N. M. Bennett and Linn & Withers, for appellants:

A mere possibility or expectancy cannot be assigned, either at law, or in equity.—Huling v. Cabell, 9 W. Va. 522, 27 Am. Rep. 562; First Nat. Bank of Wellsburg v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 555.

The interest of Peregrine Hays continued to be real estate up to the time of the sale, because up to that time he had the right to redeem.

Code, chap. 105, § 17, p. 788; Waggoner v. Wolf, 28 W. Va. 820.

After the sale the said Hays had a right to the surplus only, and to that the liens of the executions attached.

Code, chap. 141, § 2, p. 888; 1 Bouvier, L. Dict. 15th ed. p. 605; Huling v. Cabell, supra.

Mr. R. F. Fleming, for appellees:

Under the Constitution of this state article 13, section 5, P. Hays the former owner, or R. F. Kidd his assignee in his stead, is the only person entitled to receive the excess.

The title to the excess and the right of Kidd, by virtue of said assignment to him, attached and became effectual and absolute under the law as it then was, before the amendment of 1891 took effect. Neither W. T. Wiant nor R. G. Linn, administrator, was a creditor having a lien on said land at the time of said forfeiture, because this proceeding, in which said 900 acres of land was decreed to be sold and was sold, was neither a suit nor proceeding in rem, or in personam, and was administrative in its character.

McClure v. Mailand, 24 W. Va. 561.

The amendment of 1891, by adding after the words, "the former owner of any such lands" the following: "his heirs, personal representatives, or assigns; or any creditors having a lien on said land at the time of said forfeiture and still existing shall be entitled to recover," etc.,—cannot change and does not change the character of the proceedings.

Hissem v. Johnson, 27 W. Va. 644, 55 Am. Rep. 327; Yokum v. Fickey, 37 W. Va. 762.

The forfeiture of such lands is not dependent upon or brought about by judicial proceeding or sentence, inquest, judgment, or decree, but the same is effected by the statutes; and by the force and vigor of the statutes the forfeiture becomes absolute, and the title to such lands effectually vested in the state.

McClure v. Mailand, 24 W. Va. 576.

One tract of land cannot be treated as forfeited or said to have become forfeited at a certain designated time, and another tract, in identically the same situation, and omitted the same year at another time.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A tract of land, the property of Peregrine

NOTE.—The West Virginia law forfeiting title to land for failure to enter it on the assessor's books for taxation is a very drastic remedy, which is moderated by the provision for returning to the former owner the surplus proceeds when the state sells the land. The nature of the interest of the former owner in the surplus before any sale has been made is held to be a property interest, subject 23 L. R. A.

to assignment, and the transfer of which may constitute a fraud on his creditors. See, as to the assignability of future contingent interests, Read v. Mosby (Tenn.) 5 L. R. A. 122, and note.

For a tax law creating a very different but quite vigorous remedy for the collection of taxes, which is held unconstitutional, see Adams v. Tonella (Miss.) 23 L. R. A. 346.

Hays, was forfeited for nonentry on the assessor's land books of Gilmer county for more than five years, from and including the year 1870; and under a decree in a proceeding instituted by the commissioner of school lands made February 5, 1891, the land was sold as forfeited, and purchased by Kidd, and its proceeds, after paying taxes and costs, left a surplus. The sale was on October 1, 1891, and it was confirmed by decree of October 8, 1891. By a writing dated June 1, 1891, Peregrine Hays assigned to Kidd any excess that might remain from its sale. Peregrine Hays and Kidd, before confirmation of sale, united in filing a petition in the circuit court of Gilmer, wherein said proceeding was going on, setting up said assignment, and asking that said surplus be paid to Kidd, pursuant to the assignment. William T. Wiant and R. G. Linn, administrator of Robert Linn, and others, filed in said proceeding a petition against Hays and others, setting up that Linn, administrator, had obtained a decree for money against Hays in February, 1886, and that Wiant had recovered a judgment for money against Hays, July 2, 1887, which were docketed in the judgment lien docket, and that various writs of flori facias had been issued on said decree and judgment, which were returned unsatisfied; and that certain ones of them had been entered in the execution lien docket.—Linn's first, docketed on February 18, 1891, and Wiant's earliest, docketed June 4, 1891; and they claimed in their petition that, under said judgments and executions, they were entitled to said surplus. The petition of said Wiant and Linn and others was, on demurrer, dismissed, and the said surplus fund was decreed to Kidd, and said Wiant, Linn, administrator, and other petitioners appeal.

To whom should such surplus fund go,—to Kidd under his assignment from Hays, or to Wiant and Linn, administrator, under their said claims as creditors of Hays? By the omission of the land from the tax books, its forfeiture became complete some time in 1875. By such forfeiture the whole title went from Hays, and vested in the state, by force of the statute (Acts 1869, p. 90, § 7; Code 1886, chap. 31, § 24), without any legal proceeding or sale. The act operates as a legislative grant, and vests title in the state. Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Gratt. 572. As was said in McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, and McClure v. Mauperture, 29 W. Va. 633, after the forfeiture became complete, the former owner had no more right or title in the land than if he had never owned it. Therefore, as before Wiant's and Linn's judgments Hays had ceased to own the land, their judgments did not become liens on this land, as they were not rendered until in the years 1886 and 1887. What interest, then, had Hays as to the land after such forfeiture? This is a material question, because under the arguments in the case, we must answer whether Hays had such interest as could be assigned to Kidd, or such as could be subject to the writs of flori facias upon Wiant's and Linn's judgment and decree.

The Constitution (art. 13, § 5), as also the statute, provides that the former owner of forfeited lands shall be entitled to receive the excess of the sum for which the land may be sold over taxes and costs, if his claim be filed within two years after the sale. This surely does not vest any estate that is real estate in the former owner, for the statute vests the whole estate in the state; and in McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, it is held that this provision does not confer upon the former owner any interest in the land. But he has something that is property, dependent upon a sale and the existence of an excess for its fruition. In McClure v. Maitland it is held that the grant to him of the excess is a gratuity,—an act of grace in the state. This language was used to support the position taken in that case that, under the then existing act relative to proceedings for the sale of forfeited lands, the owner had no right to demand to be a party, and was not a proper party, but it was surely not intended to mean that the right, under the constitution and act, to the excess, should it ever come to exist, was not a property right. It is a vested right, contingent, so far as its vesting in possession and enjoyment is concerned, upon the happening of the event of a sale and excess,—a right inchoate until sale, and then consummated, if it leave a surplus. It has potentiality, as contrasted with a mere naked possibility. There is the land out of which money may issue, and that land is required by law to be sold, and will be sold, and to that money the law gives the former owner a right. It is not a mere expectancy, like that of a child as to the estate of the living father, or the sale of the catch of fish on a future voyage. The fact that perchance the land may never be sold, and may never produce a surplus, does not render the former owner's right a mere possibility, legally speaking, but it is a probability. The facts that the land exists, and will be sold under fixed law commanding it, and that the right of the owner to the surplus is connected with it, and that the surplus issues out of it, give that right a potential present existence. That which is in every sense nonexistent—a non-entity—cannot be sold, is not property, but it need not have, in every sense, a perfect, tangible existence, to be regarded in law as capable of ownership. So it have a potential existence, it is enough. A man may not sell the fruit from trees, or wool or lambs from sheep, which he has not; but he may do so if he then owns the trees or sheep. Their ownership gives potential existence to the fruit and wool and lambs, though as yet the trees have not blossomed, or the wool grown, or the ewes become pregnant. "A mere contingent possibility, not coupled with an interest, is not the subject of sale, as all the wool one shall ever have, or the sheep which a lessee has covenanted to leave at the end of an existing term. If rights are vested, or possibilities are distinctly connected with interest or property, they may be sold." 1 Parsons, Cont. 538. What is a devise of land to an executor to be sold,—part of proceeds to one, part to another? The law ought to go as far as possible to deem that property necessary to pay creditors. We find it in old and late books, as laid down in Benjamin on Sales, § 78, p. 80, that "things not yet existing, which may be sold, are said to have a potential existence; that is, things which are the natural product or expected increase of something already belonging to the vendor." Here the land did not belong to Hays, but that land existed, and he had a conceded right to certain money to issue from it. It would be unreasonable to say that a man whose land is worth many thousands of dollars forfeited for a few dollars of taxes, has no such interest in the excess as that, when it comes into real existence as money, it cannot be subjected to pay his debts. It might be said with some force that while the land is, as regards the legal title, vested in the state, yet the state holds in trust for the former owner as to the residue, and that his interest is land; but perhaps that view is untenable. I shall without further elaboration refer to the following authorities for the discussion of this somewhat abstruse subject: Huling v. Cabell, 9 W. Va. 522, 27 Am. Rep. 562, and many citations there; First Nat. Bank of Wellsburg v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 555; Benjamin, Sales, p. 80, § 78; 1 Parsons, Cont. 523; Tiedeman, Sales, § 52; 2 Kent, Com. 468 (641), note a; 2 Bl. Com. 297; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 2 Met. (Ky.) 474, 74 Am. Dec. 421; Honville v. Casey, 5 N. C. 339, 4 Am. Dec. 559, and note.

It is argued that it is no property,—merely a gratuity from the state. So it is as regards Hays and the state; but when once the gift has vested, like any other property given, it is the property of Hays, the donee. It is argued that it is, like pension to a soldier, exempt from creditors. There is no analogy. The pension is exempt by provision of the act granting it, but there is no exemption here made by the constitution. So we hold that this right of Hays touching the land is property; not real, but personal,—a chose in action. Therefore it could pass under the assignment of Hays to Kidd. But what of Wiant's and Linn's executions, docketed as execution liens? Code, chap. 141, § 2, says that every writ of fi. fa. shall, in addition to the effect which it has under chapter 140 of this Code, be a lien from the time it is delivered to an officer to be executed upon all the personal estate of which the judgment debtor is possessed, or to which he is entitled, and upon all which he may acquire on or before the return day thereof, although not levied on, nor capable of being levied on, under that chapter. And then follows a provision that a purchaser shall not be affected by such lien unless the execution be docketed, as in said section provided; and the statute then provides that, if so docketed, it shall be an abiding and continuing lien against a purchaser, and have preference over him. The executions constituted liens on the said property right of Hays, the execution debtor, arising from said land, as it was in existence when the executions were delivered to officers for execution. Huling v. Cabell, 9 W. Va. 522, 27 Am. Rep. 562.

Linn's fi. fa., which issued October 11, 1890, and was docketed February 13, 1891, has preference over Kidd's rights under his assignment. I find no execution of Wiant's docketed before June 4, 1891, and, that being after Kidd's assignment, Kidd has preference over Wiant, provided he be a purchaser for valuable consideration, bona fide, and without notice of Wiant's execution. Though the assignment was, after Wiant's execution, in the officer's hands, and before its return day, yet, the property being a chose not leviable, Kidd has preference over Wiant, if Kidd be such a bona fide purchaser without notice. The lien of a fi. fa., upon a chose is not under chapter 140, but under chapter 141, § 2; and, as this section excepts such purchaser, it is no difference that, when he purchased, the execution was in the officer's hands, and the return day had not passed. Opinion in Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 162. Some change was made in 1882 in chapter 141. As our Code now is, chapter 140 gives the writ of fi. fa. a lien on leviable property, but not at all on property not leviable. Chapter 141 does this. Under chapter 140 the lien on leviable property begins when the fi. fa. goes into the officer's hands, and ends with its return day, unless levied, in which case it continues to bind the property levied upon after its return day. If not levied, it would not bind the property in the hands of one purchasing it after the return day, under chapter 140, whether he had notice of the execution or not. I say under chapter 140. But chapter 141 makes the fi. fa. a lien on property not leviable, and continues, if it does not create, the lien, under chapter 140, on leviable property after its return day, if the fi. fa. be docketed, as required by section 2. The lien given by section 2, chap. 141, as to property not leviable, like a chose in action, begins when it goes into the hands of the officer, but does not end with the return day. As to leviable property, one could not purchase it during the life of the execution, even without notice of it, but he could purchase unleviable property without notice, either before or after its return day, unless it be docketed, as section 2, chap. 141, saves him from the lien it creates on unleviable property; but chapter 140 does not save him from the lien by it created as to leviable property. In other words, if the subject be unleviable property, like a chose, whether purchased within or after the lifetime of the fi. fa., and it be docketed, as required in section 2, chap. 141, the lien is good against a purchaser, though he be a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of the fi. fa. otherwise than by the docketing; but, if not docketed, it is not good against such bona fide purchaser for value without notice. As to leviable property, if purchased before the return day of the writ, its lien, though not docketed, is good, even against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of it, because of chapter 140; but, if purchased after the return day of the writ of fi. fa., the lien is not good against a bona fide purchaser for value, unless so docketed, or unless he have notice of the writ; but, if either so docketed, or the purchaser have such notice, it is good against him.

The petition charged that Kidd's assignment was made with intent to defraud petioners. This, I assume, was regarded by the court as immaterial, and as no ground to save the petition from demurrer, on the theory that the right assigned was not property in Hays, to which a creditor could set up a claim, and could not be the subject of a fraudulent alienation. Were this so, the position would be correct, as a creditor cannot say he has been defrauded by an assignment of anything that is not property of his debtor to which he can resort for satisfaction; but, as the thing assigned is to be regarded property liable to creditors, it follows that its fraudulent transfer could be assailed. Equity, under the statute avoiding fraudulent transfers, will reclaim and subject any species of the debtor's property, prospective or contingent,—all kinds of property, real, personal, legal, or equitable, vested, reversionary, or contingent estate,—subject to debts. It will subject property sometimes where the legal process cannot reach it. Equity is here not technical, but asks whether it is a thing of substantial value of the debtor, which in the facility and flexibility of its remedial procedure it can reach. Wait, Fraud. Conv. §§ 24, 25; Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 238. Certainly, equity would not allow the fraudulent transfer, if such it was, of hundreds of dollars, actual money in the hands of the court, coming from a sale of the land, having no longer a merely potential, but now an actual, existence, on any such theory that it was not property liable to creditors. If capable of assignment, it would, so far as its existence as property is concerned, be liable to creditors.

But it is contended that the proceeding in the name of the commissioner of school lands in the circuit court is not a suit with parties, but only an administrative proceeding by the state ex parte, to sell its own land,—only a method of converting its land into money,—and this contention is rested on McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561, and, not being a suit, Wiant could not file his petition in the proceeding. The question in that case was whether the former owner was a proper party to the proceeding to sell, and whether he could complain of error in the proceeding, and maintain an appeal. It was held that the proceeding was not judicial, in the sense that it involved litigation between parties. But this proposition, as applied to this case, can have no force, for two reasons: First. The act under which McClure v. Maitland was had made no provision for parties. The legislature, desiring to make the proceeding as effectual as possible, and pass good title, and protect the purchaser's title, as under ordinary decrees, by chapter 95, Acts 1882 (Code 1887, chap. 105), greatly changed the law touching the sale of forfeited lands for the benefit of the school fund, directing that the commissioners file a petition which must contain certain matters of allegation, naming the owners of the land by it sought to be sold directing process to issue against the owners and all unknown persons having or claiming the land, and that it be served on them, or, in default of service, that a publication be made, and that the case be referred to a commissioner to report certain important matters, and that all the parties claimant appear before him, and that exceptions might be filed to it, and that a hearing take place on the report and exceptions, and a decree of sale be entered, if the land be found liable, and the sale reported to court for its action. There is an express provision that, if there be exceptions to the report, "the same proceedings shall be had in the case as if it were a suit in chancery." Now, why, with parties plaintiff and defendant, process, pleading, hearing between the parties, decree, etc., it is not, if not technically a chancery suit, yet a suit, I cannot see; a suit under a special statute, it is true, but none the less a suit. So, substantially, it was regarded in Hays v. Camden, (W. Va.) 18 S. E. Rep. 461 (decided this term). Proceedings at rules take place as in ordinary and common-law suits. In some places it is called a "suit." But I know that it is said by those holding the other view that the question is not to be tested by the circumstances, such as I have alluded to, the presence of pleading, process, hearing, etc., but it must be tested by the nature of the proceeding; that is, that it is only an administrative process by the state, through an officer and court, to realize money on its own property. But to this I reply that though the state might make the proceeding such, and did in its acts up to 1882, yet, by its Act in 1882, it changed the proceeding from one ex parte to one inter partes, and clothed the proceeding with all the habiliments of a suit; and still it did not proceed against the land, taking the fact of forfeiture as a concession, and simply at once sell the land, but it subjected its right and title under the supposed forfeiture to question and investigation, under the law, through a suit, called in all interested adversely to its claim, and gave them leave to contest its right, and made its claim the subject of litigation. Second. Suppose it is not a suit, as between the commissioner and the defendants. Still, claimants to the residue might file their petition in the proceeding to obtain that residue, because, the money being in the court, they could in no other way get it, save by asking the court for it by petition; and I understand that always where money is in the hands of a court in any proceeding, which is claimed by parties, and on grounds outside that proceeding by attachment, execution, assignment, or otherwise, a petition may and must be filed. How, otherwise, can the right to it be asserted? And, as incidental, there can be parties defendant to the petition. It would be a petition as to the proceeding, seeking the fund, but not litigating anything involved between the parties to the proceeding; while, as to the parties interested in the fund, it would be a bill,—a suit. It must be filed in the cause, because it seeks a fund in custody of the law, and asks an order in that cause for leave to withdraw the fund; but in no other respect does it concern or become part of it. This petition can be called a "bill," as between its plaintiffs and defendants. It is a bill in equity to render effective the lien of a fi. fa., on a fund not leviable, which is a common function of equity, and also to annul a transfer of it, and settle right to it; and it is only filed in the proceeding because there the fund is. It is no litigation within the other proceeding.

Said decree, so far as it sustains the demurrer of Kidd to Wiant's and Linn's petition, and dismisses it, and gives the surplus to Kidd, is reversed, and said demurrer is overruled, and the cause remanded for further proper proceedings.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

C. M. FORT, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE of Georgia.

(.....Ga.....)

By the Act of October 24, 1887, to regulate the business of insurance, no unincorporated company is required to obtain, or can obtain, from the insurance commissioner a license to transact the business of insurance in this state; and the penalty prescribed in the ninth section of the Act for doing or performing any of the acts or things mentioned therein for any insurance company is not applicable unless the company is one incorporated by the laws of this state or some other state or of a foreign government. According to the facts appearing in the record, the Guarantee & Accident Lloyds is a voluntary association, unincorporated, consisting of one hundred natural persons. This being so, that company cannot be licensed to transact the business of insurance in this state; and, although there is no statutory authority for it to transact business without a license, a person who, as its agent, assists it in doing so, is not guilty of any offense.

ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the state insurance law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hall & Hammond, for plaintiff in error:

The act under consideration is a penal statute, and hence, it must be construed strictly.

Shaw v. Clark, 49 Mich. 384, 43 Am. Rep. 474; Warner v. Com. 1 Pa. 154, 44 Am. Dec. 114; Sondheim v. Gilbert, 5 L. R. A. 432, 117 Ind. 71; Brooks v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 56 Ark. 224; State v. Coffing, 3 Ind. App. 304; Harrison v. State, 22 Md. 468, 85 Am. Dec. 658.

It would take an extremely liberal construction to extend the meaning of the terms of this act, even to companies that were unincorporated, and certainly a strict construction would exclude the possibility of allowing a conviction

*Headnote by LUMPKIN, J.

NOTE.—In connection with the above case, holding that the Georgia statute, requiring a license for business by foreign insurance companies, does not apply to an unincorporated company, or make the agent of such company liable for doing business for it, see, as to the right of an individual to insure his own property in an unauthorized foreign company, Com. v. Biddle (Pa.) 11 L. R. A. 561.

of one who was acting neither for a corporation nor a partnership.

The legislature of a state has a power of control and even exclusion over corporations which it cannot exercise over individuals.

Bank of United States v. Deveaux, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 61, 3 L. ed. 38; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 586, 10 L. ed. 806; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708, and numerous other cases.

Hence it is easy to see why the legislature confined this law to corporations, and did not extend it to individuals.

Individual underwriting is not a new form of insurance. It is one of the oldest forms, and corporations are more modern institutions. Such underwriting has always been held to be a separate contract on the part of each underwriter.

But it is not easy to perceive how a private contract between one individual and another, by which the one, for an agreed consideration, insures the other for the space of ninety days, is a contract so affected.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A careful reading of the Act of October 24, 1887, "to regulate the business of insurance in this state, and for other purposes" (Acts 1886-87, p. 118), will satisfy the reader that the general assembly intended therein to deal with insurance companies chartered by this state or other states or by a foreign government. The second section of the Act requires incorporated insurance companies to procure licenses from the insurance commissioner as a necessary prerequisite to the transaction of the business of insurance in this state; but neither in this section nor in any other portion of the act is there any requirement that an unincorporated insurance company shall obtain a license, or any provision for the granting of a license to such a company. In view of this fact, it may well be doubted if the general assembly had in contemplation the possibility that any insurance company without a charter would be likely to undertake to do business in Georgia; otherwise it is more than probable that the act would either have expressly provided for licensing unincorporated companies, or else have declared in terms that no such company should transact business in that state at all. It is therefore safe to assume that in the general scheme of the act unincorporated companies were entirely overlooked. We are quite certain that the general assembly could not have intended in an indirect manner to make penal the transaction of insurance business by an agent of an insurance company which had not procured a license from the insurance commissioner, when it had made no provision by which the company in question could obtain such license. It would have been much easier and more natural to declare that licenses should not be issued at all to unincorporated companies; and then, in general terms, make it penal for an agent to transact business for any insurance company not entitled by law to receive a license, or to carry on business in this state. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the penalty prescribed in the second paragraph of the ninth section of the Act for rendering the services therein mentioned to "any insurance company" is not applicable unless the company is one which has been chartered under the laws of this or some other state or of a foreign government, and this conclusion seems to be sustained not only by the reasons above stated, but is also borne out by the context of the section last mentioned. The following is a copy of so much of that section as is material to the purpose in hand: "That any person who solicits in behalf of any insurance company, or agent of the same, incorporated by the laws of this or any other state or foreign government, or who takes, or transmits, other than for himself, any application for insurance, or any policy of insurance to or from such company, or agent of the same, or who advertises or otherwise gives notice that he will receive or transmit the same, or who shall receive or deliver a policy of insurance of any such company, or who shall examine, or inspect any risk at any time, or receive or collect or transmit any premiums of insurance, or make or forward any diagram of any building or buildings, or do and perform any other act or thing in the making or consummating of any contract of insurance for or with any such insurance company, other than for himself, or who shall examine into or adjust or aid in adjusting any loss for or in behalf of any such company, whether any of such acts shall be done at the instance or request, or by the employment of such insurance company, or of, or by, any broker or other person, shall be held to be the agent of the company for which the act is done or the risk is taken. Any person, who shall do or perform any of the acts or things mentioned for any insurance company, or agent of said company, without such company having first received a certificate of authority from the insurance commissioner of this state, as required by law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction in any court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished as provided by section 4810 of the Code of Georgia, and shall also pay a sum equal to the state, county, and municipal taxes and licenses required to be paid by insurance companies legally doing business in this state; and it is hereby made the duty of the insurance commissioner to see that all violators of the provisions of this section are prosecuted." It will be observed that the first paragraph undertakes to prescribe who shall be regarded as an agent of an insurance company chartered by the laws of this state or some other state or foreign government, and makes no allusion whatever to an agent of any insurance company of any other kind. The words "such company," "any such company," "any such insurance company," "any such company," and "such insurance company," used in the order stated in the paragraph designated, necessarily refer to an incorporated insurance company of some kind. This will be obvious from a reading of the paragraph. The next paragraph provides that "any person who shall do or perform any of the acts or things mentioned for any insurance company" shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished, etc. It will be observed that in the second line of this paragraph the use of the word "such" before the word "company" is omitted. While it is true that the words "any insurance company" are beyond doubt of themselves sufficiently general to cover all insurance companies, whether incorporated or not, they must be construed with reference to the context, and also with due regard to the general scope and purpose of the act. All of the section preceding the words last quoted was indubitably intended to be applicable to agents of incorporated companies only; and the language following these words shows, we think, conclusively that the general assembly intended to make penal the acts of those persons alone who were agents of insurance companies which the law required should obtain certificates of authority from the insurance commissioner of this state, but which had failed to do so; and these companies, as we have seen, could, under the provisions of the act, be incorporated companies only. It therefore seems free from all doubt that the words "any insurance company" must be construed to mean any insurance company having a charter.

The tenth section of the Act provides that "any insurance company not incorporated or organized under the laws of this state, desiring to transact business in this state," shall appoint an agent upon whom service can be perfected; and we think that the words just quoted were intended to apply exclusively to incorporated insurance companies, and not to foreign companies having no charter. The proviso to this section declares that its provisions "shall not be construed to alter or amend the laws now of force in this state relative to bringing suits and serving process on foreign corporations doing business in this state." As no reference whatever is here made to foreign companies other than corporations, we are strengthened in the opinion above expressed that in passing the act in question the general assembly did not have in contemplation at all insurance companies which were not incorporated. The evidence in this case showed that the "Guarantee and Accident Lloyds" is a voluntary, unincorporated association, consisting of one hundred natural persons. As has been seen, there is no provision of law for granting a license to such a company authorizing it to transact insurance business in this state, nor is there any statutory authority for it to transact business without a license. Nevertheless we are fully satisfied that a person who, as its agent, assists it in conducting its business, is guilty of no criminal offense. We think this conclusion follows legitimately from what has been said, and, in view of the rule that criminal statutes must be strictly construed, there is scarcely any room to doubt its correctness. In our judgment, the whole difficulty arises from the fact that the attention of the general assembly had not been called to the question of dealing with unincorporated insurance companies; otherwise the matter would doubtless have received the proper attention and direction, and we should find in the act now before us such provisions in regard to companies of this kind as the lawmaking power deemed it expedient to make. Whether such companies should be prohibited from transacting business altogether, or, if not, upon what terms and under what penalties they should be permitted to do so, are questions purely for the general assembly. As a court, we can do nothing but enforce the law as we find it. In the present case we are therefore constrained to hold that the conviction of the accused was contrary to law.

ST. PAUL & DULUTH R. CO., Resp't.,

v.

City of DULUTH, Appt.

- *1. McClure v. Red Wing, 28 Minn. 194, followed on the point that a municipal corporation is not liable to the owner of private premises within its boundaries for failing to provide a system of sewerage to carry away from such premises surface water and the water of perennial streams naturally coming thereon.
2. The owner of a swamp which is the natural place of deposit of the surface waters and perennial streams from the higher adjoining territory cannot complain because such municipal corporation continues to deposit such waters on such swamp by means of mere storm sewers after such swamp has been improved.
3. This rule is not changed by the fact that the municipal corporation has diverted such waters from natural ravines, and, through such sewers, deposited them on such swamp at different points from those at which the ravines terminate, the owner of the swamp having adopted the change made by such diversion in building the roadbed of a railroad across the swamp, by leaving no openings in the raised surface of such roadbed opposite the ends of the ravines, and by putting in box culverts across such roadbed opposite the ends of some of the sewers, to carry off such waters.

(February 10, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County denying a motion for a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful disposition of surface water so as to injure plaintiff's property. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. H. F. Green, City Atty., for appellant.

No one of the numerous decisions in Minnesota upon this class of cases ever went in favor of the plaintiff or party complaining of the intrusion of water, unless two facts were shown, first that more water came upon property than before the trespass or intrusion complained of, and second that there was a consequent injury,

NOTE.—This case presents somewhat new particulars in respect to the application of the law as to flow of surface waters.

This case is distinguished from every case decided in this state on the subject in that in every one of said cases it appears that the defendant cast the water on plaintiff's land, and that this act of defendant was manifestly the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. In the case at bar,

1. It does not appear that any greater volume or even as great a volume of water comes upon plaintiff's tracks as before.

2. It does not appear that such changes as defendant has made in the discharge of the various channels on respondent's tracks has or will have any effect upon plaintiff's damages either past or prospective.

The injury complained of is entirely the result of acts of the complaining party.

The city had a right to turn this surface water into the ravines before constructing the sewers, and drain the same either by natural or artificial drains into these ravines, and having this right before the sewers were constructed, the city certainly retains it after that construction and can conduct this surface water into the streams now contained within the sewers just as before it could conduct it into the same streams then contained in the ravines.

Viewing these channels as watercourses we have done respondent no injury, not by changing their course, for the injury from that cause is merely nominal, and none from draining surface water into them, for that we had a right to do.

If the entire drainage from this hill is to be looked on as surface water, this case comes clearly within the doctrine of—

Messrs. Lusk, Bunn & Hadley and Moore, Towne & Harris for respondent.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The part of the city of Duluth here in question is a steep hillside, sloping towards St. 23 L. R. A.

Louis bay. This slope rises 600 feet above the bay, and extends back from it more than a mile. In 1870, between the foot of the hill and the bay, there was a wide margin of marsh or swamp, covered more or less, with the water of the bay. Between what is now Fourth avenue east and Twelfth avenue west, there were on this slope seventeen large ravines, which were well-defined water channels, in which water ran down the hill into the swamp below, and there spread out over the swamp, and flowed off into the bay. In seven of these ran perennial streams of water, and in the other ten large volumes of water ran during times of storms, freshets, and melting snows. There were many other smaller depressions and ravines, which carried more or less surface water at such times into the swamp. In 1870 the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff constructed its track along on this swamp, parallel to the foot of the hill and the side of the bay, upon piling driven into the swamp. This piling offered no resistance to the free egress of the water. From time to time since, the plaintiff has added other tracks built on piles, and has filled up the right of way under the tracks with embankments of earth, leaving no place or passage for the egress of the water, except one near Tenth avenue west, which is sixteen to eighteen feet wide, and is still crossed by the track, supported on piling. At seven or eight other points, plaintiff has put in temporary box culverts of wood across the right of way, not opposite the ravines and natural water channels, but opposite the ends of the storm sewers hereinafter mentioned. The part of the city built on this slope was platted before the railroad was built, with streets running along the side of the slope, parallel with the railroad right of way, and other cross streets running up and down the side of the hill, terminating at the right of way. These streets have since been improved, and now exist as so platted. The city has also constructed under these cross streets fourteen sewers, which run down the hill, and all of them terminate at plaintiff's right of way, except two, one at Lake avenue, and one at Fifth avenue west, which have been extended under the right of way to the bay. Some of the others connect with the box culverts above mentioned, some have no connection, and one or two empty into said bridged open space left across the right of way. These sewers carry off the surface water deposited by rains and snows and the water of the seven perennial streams, all the water having been diverted from the said seventeen ravines into these storm sewers. They are connected only with the catch basins in the streets, not with the houses. There is another system of sanitary sewers running at right angles to these storm sewers, and having no connection with them.

The plaintiff brings this action against the city to enjoin the use by it of these sewers, and the depositing of the water from them on plaintiff's right of way. It is not claimed that these sewers bring any more water onto plaintiff's premises than was brought by ravines and creeks in a state of nature; but it is claimed that the water has been diverted from the creeks and ravines, and deposited at other points on the premises; that it runs down these sewers with great velocity, and strikes the roadbed with great force, tearing it up. The plaintiff further claims that "it is well settled that the construction of ditches and pipes for the sole purpose of drainage, gathering water in streams or bodies solely to discharge it, and thus dumping it onto another's land, is actionable. Such works are not a reasonable and proper improvement of one's own premises." The cases cited by counsel are cases where surface water was collected and discharged onto premises where it would not naturally go. The city of Duluth would have no right to discharge surface water on the land of any private owner, unless his land is the natural channel or dumping ground for it. But the land of plaintiff is such natural dumping ground. Plaintiff complains that the city is making such of it, but it seems to forget that nature, and not the city, has made this place such dumping ground, and that the city has never relieved the land of such servitude. It complains that the city diverted the water from its natural channel into these sewers, which deposit the water at different points on its premises from those at which the ravines deposited it; but it forgets that these premises are, so to speak, all channel, and that, while the city diverted the water from its natural channels upon the slope of the hill, it returned the water to that channel,—the common dumping ground,—at plaintiff's premises. If plaintiff had improved its right of way with special reference to the ends of the ravines, and left openings opposite such ends for the water coming down the ravines, then the plaintiff might be in a position to object to a diversion afterwards of the water to the points where the sewers terminate. But it has not done so. It has permitted the city to make these changes, and has to a considerable extent adopted the plan of the city, by closing up all openings for egress of water at the ends of the ravines, and putting in the box culverts opposite the ends of the sewers. Estoppel by conduct, if any exists is against the plaintiff, not against the city. The defendant is not liable for failing to relieve plaintiff of the burdens put on plaintiff's premises by nature, or for failing to provide a sewer system for plaintiff's premises. "The duty of providing drainage or sewerage is in its nature judicial or legislative, and consequently a municipal corporation is not liable for mere nonaction in failing to perform it." McClure v. Red Wing, 28 Minn. 194.

It is true that the water comes down against plaintiff's right of way with considerable velocity, but that is a velocity given it by the hillside, which was made by nature, and not by the city. It seems to us that the case is simply this: Can the owner of a swamp improve it, and then compel the owner of the high land around it to keep the surface water naturally tributary to the swamp from coming from the higher lands upon the swamp? We think not.

For these reasons the order denying the motion for a new trial should be reversed.

So ordered.

v.

Henry H. ISHAM et al., Respts.

1. A banker who loaned money for a customer without any compensation for the service is liable for failure to exercise the skill and knowledge of a banker engaged in that business, especially where he had promised to give careful attention thereto.
2. A banker making a loan for a customer on collateral securities is not, for the purpose of avoiding loss on the collaterals, bound to make inquiry as to the solvency of the borrower, if he was reputed to be responsible when the loan was made and nothing indicated the slightest reason for refusing the loan.
3. Taking stock as collateral without verification of its validity at the company's office, especially if there is nothing in the appearance of the certificate to excite suspicion, is not negligence on the part of a banker in making a loan for a customer.

4. A banker is not chargeable with negligence in loaning a customer's money on raised collateral, if the forgery was such as to deceive any reasonable scrutiny of a fairly prudent banker, knowing the signatures but not suspecting fraud in the body of the instrument.
5. Evidence that a banker charged with negligence in loaning money of a customer on raised certificates of stock loaned large sums of his own money on similar certificates to the same borrower is admissible on the question as to his negligence.
6. Evidence that the identical raised certificates of stock have been used as collateral for years and accepted by skillful bankers and brokers without suspicion is admissible on the question of negligence in loaning a customer's money upon such certificate.

APPPEAL by Mary E. Post from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming judg-respect to a class of transactions by bankers on which there does not seem to have been much, if any, direct authority.

NOTE.—The general principles governing gratuitous bailments are well illustrated in the present case which constitutes an important precedent in 23 L. R. A.

ments of a special term for Kings County in favor of Henry H. Isham; individually, and as trustee, and also in favor of the cestui que trustent in proceedings brought to hold the estate in her hands liable for losses which occurred through the insufficiency of collateral security taken by Augustus T. Post when loaning money belonging to the trust estate. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Alfred Ely, for appellant:

In making this loan to Mills, Robeson & Smith, Mr. Post acted in all that he did within the scope of his authority as agent, as contemplated and intended by Isham, and Mr. Isham, as principal, is alone responsible for the results.

Lambert v. Heath, 15 Mees. & W. 487; Peckham v. Ketchum, 5 Bosw. 506.

The $25,000 delivered by Isham to Post was not chargeable with any trust in Mr. Post's hands.

Post had no notice that the money was trust funds.

There was nothing in the character of the transaction to put Mr. Post on his guard or require him to inquire further.

Where a transaction is prima facie for the benefit of the trust and not prima facie a repudiation of it, the party dealing with the trustee has not been held to have had, merely by the use of the word "trustee," any such notice, as would put him on his inquiry.

Gerard v. McCormick, 14 L. R. A. 284, 180 N. Y. 287; Duncan v. Jaudon, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 165, 21 L. ed. 142; Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 894, 1 Am. Rep. 115, 97 Am. Dec. 107; Walker v. Manhattan Bank, 25 Fed. Rep. 254.

The transaction undertaken by Mr. Post for Mr. Isham in this case was a gratuitous bailment and one of those rare transactions known to the law as a "mandatum."

Story, Bailm. chap. 8.

A mandatary is responsible to his principal only for the exercise of ordinary care, and is liable only for gross negligence. The gratuitous bailee or mandatary is not a guarantor—there is no consideration upon which to found any agreement of warranty—and in acting bona fide to the best of his judgment without gross negligence he is not liable for loss.

Story, Bailm. §§ 179-188; Shiells v. Blackburne, 1 H. Bl. 158; Beardslee v. Richardson, 11 Wend. 25, 25 Am. Dec. 596; Tompkins v. Saltmarsh, 14 Serg. & R. 275; Finucane v. Small, 1 Esp. 815; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 478, 9 Am. Dec. 168; Loeb v. Hellman, 88 N. Y. 601; Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 66, 87 Am. Rep. 546.

The exercise of ordinary care did not require Mr. Post to verify these certificates at the office of the company.

The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff.

Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 46 N. Y. 279, 7 Am. Rep. 327.

All the certificates delivered to Mr. Post possessed all the indicia of genuineness required by law and universal custom. They had been duly signed by the proper officers and duly issued by the company, "and the transfer indorsed thereon was duly signed in blank by the shareholder," and this indorsement and the whole certificate guaranteed by a reputable 23 L. R. A.

stock exchange firm. According to the established usage in the commercial world, they were acceptable to lenders or purchasers without inquiry or other formality than that of delivery.

Under the universal custom and established usage of the commercial world Mr. Post was entitled to rely on the possession of the certificates without verification or further inquiry. Ibid.

Mr. Post was not required to know the handwriting in the body of the certificates.

Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 8 N. Y. 280; White v. Continental Nat. Bank, 64 N. Y. 816, 21 Am. Rep. 612.

Any and all presumption of negligence on Mr. Post's part, if there was any, would be and is rebutted by the fact that he treated Isham's money in the same way as he did his, Post's own.

Mr. Post is not liable because he expressly exempted himself from liability by specific agreement to that effect with Mr. Isham at the time he undertook the loan.

Mr. Frederick A. Ward, for respondent:

The fair interpretation of the contract is that Post engaged to loan the money for Isham, as trustee and in his name, to a solvent borrower upon genuine, sufficient, and proper collateral.

The liability of Mr. Post to furnish genuine and not counterfeit security in this case did not arise out of any collateral contract of guaranty nor because of negligence, but by reason of the principal contract, the condition precedent of which was that the loan should be made upon securities which were genuine, not on those which were false or counterfeit.

In all dealings in negotiable securities there is an implied warranty on the part of the one proffering them, whoever he may be, as a part of the agreement, that such securities are genuine and not forged.

Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 66, 37 Am. Rep. 546.

Upon the notice imparted by the check and the two accounts kept by defendant, one with plaintiff individually and one with him as trustee, as found by the court, defendant's intestate was chargeable with knowledge that he had absolutely no right to loan these trust moneys upon such securities as he accepted without the written consent of the cestui que trust, and that he did so at his peril.

Gerard v. McCormick, supra; Sturtevant v. Jaques, 96 Mass. 623; Shaw v. Spencer, supra; Budd v. Munroe, 18 Hun, 316; Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 139; Thompson v. Poland, 48 Cal. 99.

Even had this been a contract of gratuitous bailment, still the gratuitous bailee is bound to use a due diligence and attention adequate to the trust imposed in him; to perform his engagement in good faith, and neither do nor omit anything which the nature of the trust requires.

Rutgers v. Lucet, 2 Johns. Cas. 92; Wilkinson v. Coverdale, 1 Esp. 74; Doorman v. Jenkins, 2 Ad. & El. 256.

Whatever the relation between the parties, whether that of principal and agent, bailor and bailee, or cestui que trust, the fact that it was agreed that the services should be gratuitously rendered had it been proven would have been immaterial.

Messrs. Williams & Ashley, for the respondents, cestui que trust:

Post had notice that Isham was a trustee using trust funds, and was bound to ascertain what the trust was at his peril.

The check of Isham, with the word "Trustee" added, was full notice to him of the trust, and put him upon inquiry.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relation between the parties to this controversy must be regarded as that of principal and agent. Post was a banker; not a member of the stock exchange, and so bound by its rules, but familiar with its customs and usages, and controlled by them, to some extent, whenever dealing with stocks in the Wall street market. He held himself out to the business world in that character. By his circulars he advertised himself as dealing in "choice stocks," and promised his customers "careful attention" in all their financial transactions. Those who dealt with him contracted for, and had a right to expect, a degree of care commensurate with the importance and the risks of the business to be done, and a skill and capacity adequate to its performance. That care and skill is such as should characterize a banker operating for others in a financial center, and different in kind from the ordinary diligence and capacity of the ordinary citizen. The banker is employed exactly for that reason. Without it, there might cease to be motives for employing him at all. Isham was the trustee of an express trust, but in this dispute must be regarded simply as an individual, and without reference to his trust character; for the trial court has found as a fact that, in employing the banker to loan for him $25,000, he gave no notice of the trust character attaching to the money, contracted apparently for himself, and left Post to believe, and be justified in believing, that the money was his own. The evidence on the subject admits of some difference of opinion, but on this appeal the finding must control.

In the same way, the question whether Post's services in making the loan were or were not to be gratuitous must be deemed settled. The finding is that those services were to be without compensation; and on that ground the appellant claims that Post was a gratuitous mandatary, and liable only for gross negligence. But while no compensation, as such, was to be paid, it does not follow that the banker was freed from the obligation of such diligence as he had promised to those who dealt with him, or was at liberty to withhold from his agency the exercise of the skill and knowledge which he held himself out to possess. Nothing in general is more unsatisfactory than attempts to define and formulate the different degrees of negligence; but, even where the neglect which charges the mandatary is described as "gross," it is still true that, if his situation or employment implies ordinary skill or knowledge adequate to the undertaking, he will be responsible for any losses or injuries resulting from the want of the exercise of such skill or knowledge. Story, Bailm. § 182a; Shiells v. Blackburne, 1 H. Bl. 158; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168; First Nat. Bank of Lyons v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 60 N. Y. 295, 19 Am. Rep. 181. In the latter case, it was said that ordinary care, as well as gross negligence,—the one being in contrast with the other,—must be graded by the nature and value of the property, and the risks to which it is exposed. Post, therefore, was required to exercise the skill and knowledge of a banker engaged in loaning money for himself and for his customers, because of the peculiar character and scope of his agency, because of his promise of careful attention, and because the contract was made in reliance upon his business character and skill.

We should next consider upon whom rested the burden of proof. The plaintiff alleged and proved that he put into Post's hands, as his banker and agent, to be loaned upon demand at the high rates of interest prevailing, and in the mode approved by custom and usage, the sum of $25,000, which sum Post had not returned, but refused to return, upon proper demand, and so had converted the same to his own use. That made out plaintiff's case. Judgment for him must necessarily follow, unless Post, in answer, has established an affirmative defense. That which he pleaded and sought to prove was that the money was lost without his fault, and through an event for which he was altogether blameless. In other words, he was bound to show that he did his duty fully and faithfully, and without negligence or misconduct, so that the resultant loss was not his, but must justly fall upon the plaintiff.

Mervin v. Brooks, 94 N. Y. 75; Ouderkerk v.

Central Nat. Bank, 119 N. Y. 267. With that burden resting upon him, we must examine his defense, and the evidence given in its support, and determine whether or not it is our duty to sustain the adverse conclusion, to reverse which he brings this appeal.

The trial court has found that Post was negligent in making the loan upon the security of the certificates of stock taken as collateral, which had been raised by a forgery to indicate a larger number of shares than was the actual truth. Negligence is usually a mixed question of law and fact, and is never purely one of law, unless the facts are wholly undisputed, and admit of no conflicting inferences. Filer v. New York Cent. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 47, 10 Am. Rep. 327. In the face of the finding referred to we cannot reverse this judgment, unless it clearly appears that upon no possible view of the facts, and upon no inferences deducible from them, can proof of negligence be found, or unless, in reaching the result, some material error in the admission or exclusion of evidence has affected the judgment rendered. The finding of negligence, by its terms, rests upon three omissions. The admitted cause of the loss was a forgery of the number of shares of the stock given as collateral on the loan, by raising that number in one certificate from 7 shares to 70; in another, from 8 to 80; and in a third, from 3 to 93. The certificates were the genuine and lawful certificates of the company, when issued, signed, and attested by the proper officers, and defective only in the forgery which raised the number of the shares. The loan was made to Mills, Robeson & Smith, who were in good repute and standing at the time, but failed two days later for a very large amount. The trial court asserted Post's liability upon the ground that he took the certificates without examination, without presenting them for verification at the office of issue or of registry, and without inquiry as to the solvency of the borrowing firm. Assuming, as the court held, and as the facts of the agency appear to justify, that Post was bound to exercise, in making the loan, ordinary care, such as belonged to his business as a banker, and to the duty he attempted to perform, we must consider the alleged omissions upon the facts disclosed in the record. In so doing, we may dismiss the claim of negligence, as inferred from the omission to inquire as to the solvency of the borrowers. There is no proof that inquiry would or could have developed any different information from that which Post already had. There is no hint of any unfavorable rumors preceding the failure, or of any doubt in any quarter of the solvency of the borrowing firm; but, on the contrary, the undisputed evidence is that they were reputed to be solvent and responsible when the loan was made. There is no indication that inquiry would have yielded to Post any different information from that which he already possessed, or would have furnished the slightest reason for refusing the loan. There was certainly no negligence in omitting a new and further inquiry. Nor do I think that ordinary care required Post, before accepting the certificates, to have presented them for verification, if there was nothing on their face calculated to arouse suspicion. They had been issued, as appears by their dates, more than six years before the loan was made, but had been issued directly to Smith, who was one of the borrowing firm, and of course knew that they were genuine when the stock was transferred to him on the company's books. He had executed the usual blank assignment, which enabled them to pass from hand to hand, and which had been attested by his firm; and no suspicion could attach to them, except upon a doubt of Smith's integrity, which no known fact warranted. There is no proof that it was ever a habit or custom for bankers or brokers to present such certificates for verification, and it is quite obvious that the business methods of Wall street do not admit of such a custom, suggest no necessity for its existence, and would be badly hindered and hampered by such a regulation; so that I am of opinion that in ordinary cases, and at least where the official signatures are genuine, and nothing in the body of the certificates reasonably awakens suspicion, it is not evidence of negligence that the stock was taken as collateral, without verification, at the company's office. Where there is nothing in the surrounding facts or on the face of the paper to create a doubt, it would be an instance of great and extraordinary care to present them for verification, and much beyond the degree of diligence required of Post, in the present case.

There remains only the alleged omission to give the certificates a reasonable examination. I am inclined to regard that question as sufficiently debatable to prevent our treating it wholly as a question of law. And that is true partly because of some serious conflict in the testimony, but mainly because of the inherent character of the inquiry, which is much more one of fact than of law. The evidence fairly indicates that Post personally never saw the certificates when the loan was made. In all his correspondence with Isham, and when standing on his defense, he made no such claim, but himself said he trusted too much to his clerks. Isham, in one of his letters, reminds Post of his having made that remark, and the latter does not dispute it. And as matter of fact the loan was negotiated and consummated by his managing clerk, Shephard, who was fully examined as a witness, and did not claim or pretend that he showed the certificates to Post at all. But Shephard was not incompetent. Enough appears in the evidence to indicate that he possessed the necessary skill and knowledge to properly perform the duty assigned to him. He held a responsible position in Post's office, had an extensive and valuable experience, succeeded to Post's business on his death, and testifies that he was familiar with, and had handled, very many of the certificates of the company whose stock was taken as collateral. We are not justified in saying that he did not examine the forged certificates at all, and the finding of the trial court cannot mean that. What it must mean, in view of the facts, is that he gave them no close and careful scrutiny. He does not pretend that he did. He says only that they were brought to him by the messenger of the borrower, and that he took them, and gave Post's check in exchange. Undoubtedly, he recognized the familiar signatures, and noted the number of shares represented; but there was nothing like careful scrutiny or examination, but unhesitating trust in the honesty of the borrowers. I cannot say, as matter of law, that such was the full measure of his duty, and that he did not hastily withhold more or less of the very skill and knowledge upon which Isham relied in selecting Post to loan for him the money. The answer made would be sufficient, if it had been proved. That answer is that the forgery was so skillfully and deftly executed that no ordinary skill, exercised upon a reasonable examination, would have disclosed the fraud, or even aroused suspicion. But we do not know that. The certificates themselves were before the trial judge, and what inference he drew from their inspection we cannot say. What we do know is that one of them, raised from $ to $8, was so skillfully changed that when Shephard and Isham examined it critically, after knowledge of the forgery, the latter thought it genuine. What Shephard thought, he did not tell us, and omitted to say that what would have deceived the inexperience of Isham would also have deceived him. But at this stage of the case the defendant realized the necessity of proof that the forgery was deft enough to deceive the skill and knowledge of any ordinary banker dealing in such securities. As I look at it, the point had become vital to the defense. If a fair and reasonable examination of the papers, in the room of a hurried and momentary glance, would have disclosed the fraud to the skilled eye of an experienced banker, or awakened a suspicion which would have led to a verification, then I think a finding of negligence would be justified. But if, on the contrary, the forgery was such as to deceive any reasonable scrutiny of a fairly prudent banker, knowing the signatures, but not suspecting fraud in the body of the instruments, then scrutiny would have done no good, and the deception suffered would be excusable. Just that the defendant sought to prove in two ways. He offered to show—First, that he himself had loaned $50,000 of his own money to the same borrowers, accepting in part similar raised collateral; and, second, that for several years the same identical raised certificates had been given and received on the street as collateral for loans, and deceived the skill and care of a great number of bankers and brokers, who took and held them without suspicion. Both offers of proof were refused, and the evidence excluded. I think that was error. The proof would have shown, at least, the character of the forgery, and that Shephard was not in fault for not disclosing it. It would have established Post's absolute good faith in the transaction, and that he took the same care of Isham's money as of his own. Of course, it was not admissible to show merely that some others were no more prudent than Post, or that his own fault was less because they did the same; but it was admissible to prove that Shephard was deceived by a forgery so perfect and skillful that it escaped, for years, the vigilance of the street. With that fact in the case added to what already appears, I should deem the defense sufficiently established. It was objected to this offered evidence that it might involve an examination of each separate transaction with others. That was not proposed or necessary. The witness testifying was Watson. He had been the clerk of Mills, Robeson & Smith for eleven years, and had charge of all their loan business. The offer was to prove by him that for years these raised certificates had been used on the street as collateral for loans without a suspicion on his part, and baffling the skill and knowledge of banks, brokers, and business firms of experience and reputation. It seems to me, if that is the truth, that no fact could more conclusively establish the perfection of the forgery, and more completely excuse and justify the failure of Shephard to discover it. What was permitted to be proved makes the existence of such a fact quite probable. The certificate raised from 3 to 98 was well enough done to have deceived Isham; and, as to the others, it was much easier to change 7 to 70 and 8 to 80 without attracting notice. If this occurrence has disclosed a new danger in the business methods of the stock market, it may serve at least as a warning, and tend to make more deliberate inspection and closer scrutiny an ordinary duty. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

1. Foreign corporations are included within the Laws of 1855 requiring assessment on all moneys invested in business by nonresidents.
2. Debts cannot be deducted from funds invested by nonresidents under Laws 1855, chap. 87, providing for the taxation of funds invested in business by nonresidents although it says they shall be assessed on funds invested "the same as if they were residents."

APPEAL by relator from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of the Special Term dismissing a writ of certiorari sued out to review the refusal of the tax commissioners to deduct indebtedness from the personal property assessed to relator for the purpose of taxation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—The right of a nonresident to deduction of debts from the amount of property in the state in order to obtain the amount of taxable property is, although here decided with reference to the laws of New York, a question which is important 23 L. R. A.

Mr. L. C. Waehner, for appellant:

The relator is organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, and that state is therefore its domicil, and it is a nonresident.

Foreign corporations are comprehended within the words "persons and associations" in the Act of 1855.

People v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 259; British Commercial L. Ins. Co. v. Tax Commissioners, 1 Keyes, 308.

This is the only statute regulating the taxation of foreign corporations for local purposes, and therein alone must be found the power and method of assessing and taxing them.

People v. McLean, supra; People v. Tax Commissioners, 28 N. Y. 242.

The basis—and the only basis—for assessment and taxation under the act is "on all sums invested in any manner in said business."

People v. Wemple, 183 N. Y. 823.

In the enumeration of the kind of property which is taxable the court speaks of tangible property ("things"); and so it was also held in People v. Equitable Trust Co. of New London, 96 N. Y. 398, that "nonresidents, property having no legal situs here and business not carried on here are not the subject of taxation here."

People v. Tax Commissioners, 28 N. Y. 224; People v. Tax Commissioners, 58 N. Y. 246; Re Swift's Estate, supra.

The tax commissioners, therefore, have no concern with and no power to inquire as to the debts, choses in actions, or any property belonging to the relator, not having a legal situs here for the purpose of estimating its taxable property. The assessors have to do with the sums invested here, nothing else.

People v. McLean, supra.

The statute prescribes that the assessment shall be "the same as if they were residents of this state." And the rule of assessing residents upon their personal property is "the full value of all the taxable personal property owned by them after deducting the just debts owing by them."

1 Rev. Stat. 391; People v. Ferguson, 88 N. Y. 89.

Full effect must be given to the language of the legislature and a meaning must be sought for each word.

Potter's Dwarrr. Stat. 197, 200-219; McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. 593; People v. Matsell, 94 N. Y. 179.

The basis of taxation in the case of foreign corporations can only be the tangible property here that alone is afforded governmental protection; whereas the resident enjoys such protection over all his personal property (except only such as has a definite situs and is taxable out of the state).

in other states under statutes more or less similar, and under which the above decision will most likely be followed unless the right to exemption is unmistakably expressed.

The statute does not provide that in case a foreigner invests all his personal estate here, he shall be entitled to deduct all his debts, and when he invests a part he shall be entitled to a deduction of only a proportionate amount of his debts.

People v. Wemple, 138 N. Y. 325.

Messrs. David J. Dean and George S. Coleman, with Mr. William H. Clark, for respondents:

Under the scheme of the statute for the taxation of nonresident persons and corporations, no deduction for debts, from the amount of capital invested in business of the state of New York, is authorized.

In the absence of proof to the contrary the court will assume that the laws of New Jersey with respect to the assessment and taxation of property are the same as the laws of New York.

People v. Tax Commissioners, 4 Hun, 596.

The Statute of 1855 comprehends only a scheme by which the capital in this state shall be reached for the purposes of taxation, and to accomplish that purpose it is not necessary that the assessors should ascertain the general indebtedness of the relator.

People v. Tax Commissioners, 28 N. Y. 224;

Williams v. Wayne County Suprs. 78 N. Y. 561.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator complains of the amount of its assessment for purposes of taxation, because, as is alleged, its indebtedness was not deducted therefrom by defendants. It is a foreign corporation, having, according to the affidavit made by its president, a principal office at 76 Montgomery street, Jersey City, N. J., in which state it was organized under the laws thereof. Its office in New York city is stated to be at 116 Reade street. It also appeared by the affidavit that the company was organized with a nominal capital of $3,000,000, of which $2,500,000 had been issued, $100,000 for cash, and the rest for property consisting of merchandise, trademarks, good will, etc. On January 11, 1892, it owned merchandise within the state, exclusive of imported goods in original packages, of $500,000 in amount. It also had accounts and bills receivable owing to it within the state of New York of about $200,000, cash in bank about $20,000, and other personal property in the state of about $50,000, or a total of $750,000. It owed on the day above named, in New York city, open accounts of about $150,000, and bills payable $1,068,904.42, or a total indebtedness of $1,218,904.42. It was further stated in the affidavit that the balance of the capital was employed outside the city of New York, principally in the form of accounts receivable, amounting to about $1,400,000. The tax commissioners assessed the personal property of the relator at the sum of 500,000, after hearing the relator and considering its demands; and they decided that sum to be just, and the amount for which the personal estate of the relator was lawfully assessable for the year. The relator claimed that the indebtedness above set out should be deducted from the sum of $750,000, which it stated was the utmost amount of its property that could under any circumstances be regarded as invested in any manner in business in this state, and that, if such deduction were allowed, there was no sum remaining upon which to make any assessment. Objection was made by it to the addition of any part of the above-named sum of $1,400,000 to the sum of $750,000, because, as it alleged, the former sum was employed outside the city of New York, and was principally in the form of accounts receivable. The claim was that, as to such accounts, they had no situs in and of themselves, and were mere choses in action, and took in law the situs of their owner, and that situs was its domicile in New Jersey. It was, therefore, urged that no part of such sum could be regarded as invested in any manner in the business of the relator in the city of New York.

Prior to 1855, great numbers of persons doing business in this state, and having large amounts of moneys invested within its borders, nevertheless chose to reside just outside its confines. Although these persons were nonresidents of the state, yet they came daily within its boundaries for the purpose of doing business here, and had here large amounts of capital invested in their business; and yet, under our laws, they could not be reached for taxation. Their names could not be put upon an assessment roll, because they did not reside in any town or ward where an assessment could be made; and they had no agents or trustees who resided in the state, against whom any assessment on account of such property could be made. To reach the nonresident for the purpose of subjecting such property to taxation was the object of the Act, chapter 87 of the Laws of 1855. People v. Tax Commissioners, 28 N. Y. 224. Section 1 of the Act reads as follows: "All persons and associations doing business in the state of New York as merchants, bankers, or otherwise, either as principals or partners, whether special or otherwise, and not residents of this state, shall be assessed and taxed on all sums invested in any manner in said business, the same as if they were residents of this state, and said taxes shall be collected from the property of the firms, persons, or associations to which they severally belong." We are of the opinion that this act does not contemplate the deduction of debts from the sums invested in this state by nonresidents. As the person is a nonresident, it is to be assumed that he will, at the place of his domicile, have all of what might be termed his "equities" adjusted, and that, if entitled to it anywhere, it will be at such domicile that he will claim and be allowed the right to have such deduction. In his case the Statute of 1855 seizes upon the certain, specific sum which he has here invested in the business carried on by him, and that sum is to be assessed and taxed the same as if the person were a resident of the state. In using the expression, "the same as if they were residents of this state," we do not think it was intended that exceptions were to be allowed here the same as if the party were a resident, or that deductions from the sum thus invested should be made as if that were the case. It meant, as it seems to us, that the sum invested in any manner in business in this state should be assessed in the same manner and form as a resident would be assessed. Foreign corporations are included within the terms of the Act of 1855. British Commercial L. Ins. Co. v. Tax Commissioners, 1 Keyes, 303, cited in People v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 254, 259. Hence it was said that a foreign corporation doing business in New York was properly taxable in the city of New York, where its principal place of business or office of the agency existed. And in this last-cited case, in 80 N. Y., it is said that the Act of 1855 points out the mode of taxation, viz., "the same as if they were residents of this state;" and, in referring to the mode of taxing a resident corporation, it is found that it is to be taxed in the town or ward where it has a principal office or place for the transaction of its financial concerns. The foreign corporation is not to be taxed in all things the same as if it were a resident, because the statute expressly provides that it is only to be taxed for the sum invested in business in this state, and, in order to tax it upon that sum no indebtedness should be allowed. The percentage, the form, the mode of the assessment and taxation upon the specific sum invested in business in this state are to be the same as if the person were a resident; but inasmuch as all the subjects of assessment against a nonresident are not within the jurisdiction of the state, but only the sum here invested, it is plain that it was never contemplated by the legislature that such nonresident should have the right to make deductions from the sum by reason of debts, while the taxing authorities would have no right to balance such deductions by an assessment of other property of the nonresident not situated within the state. The resident has no right to deduct his indebtedness from any specific piece of personal property, or from any special chose in action. In a general way, it may be said that he is to be charged with all his personal property, and from that total he may deduct his debts. This cannot be done in the case of a nonresident, although it may (as we may assume) be done at his domicile. All we are to do is to assess and tax the sum here invested; and the equities must, as we have said, be adjusted at the domicile of the person. The assessment of a domestic corporation is made after a deduction for debts, because its capital and surplus are to be assessed at their actual value, which cannot be arrived at without considering and deducting debts. A foreign corporation is not to be thus taxed, and no inquiry is made as to the actual value of such capital or surplus, and, as such value is not to be assessed or taxed, the debts should not be deducted from specific property here invested. The relator having no right to deduct its debts from the sum it had invested in its business here, it is unnecessary to discuss the question whether the amount of the debts due it should be regarded as any part of the sum invested in its business in this state, because the sum assessed by the defendants is less than the amount which the affidavit of the president of the relator shows was invested in its business in this state at the time of such assessment, exclusive of those accounts. The order of the general term should therefore be affirmed, with costs.

Order affirmed.

In the Matter of the Judicial Settlement of the Accounts of Sara N. WORTHINGTON et al., Exrs., etc., of Henry R. Worthington, Deceased.

1. An assignment by an executor before his accounting of his commissions is void as contrary to public policy, since when the hope of compensation is gone, a strong incentive to diligence and zeal is wanting and the temptation to be content with a lax or perfunctory administration of the trust becomes more persuasive.

2. An assignee of the commissions of an executor has no such vested title, legal or equitable, to any share or interest in the assets of the estate to be distributed upon the account as confers upon him the right to be made a party to the proceedings or to be heard upon a settlement and entry of the decree.

A PPEAL by petitioner from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of the surrogate of Westchester County denying his petition to open the decree settling the accounts of the executors of Henry R. Worthington, deceased, in order to permit him to make claim to commissions alleged to have been earned by one of the executors and assigned to the petitioner. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Alexander V. Campbell, for appellant:

The surrogate's holding that if an executor for any reason fails to complete his duties, "whether he resigns, dies, or is removed for cause, no commissions can be allowed" was error.

Re Jones, 4 Sandf. Ch. 615, 7 L. ed. 1229; Wheelright v. Rhoades, 28 Hun, 60; Re Allen, 29 Hun, 9; Re Baker, 85 Hun, 272; Re Hayden, 54 Hun, 197; Welling v. Welling, 8 Dem. 511.

The executors' commissions were assignable.

The surrogate erred in holding that the petitioner was not a "person interested," under § 2514, subsec. 11, and so not entitled to be cited, nor to make himself a party under Code, § 2731.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2514, subsec. 11.

Mr. William A. Jenner, for respondents:

The petitioner has no standing in court in this proceeding or right to interfere with the executors' accounts or decree settling them.

NOTE.—The rule that an assignment of unearned salary of a public officer cannot be lawfully made, which is strongly illustrated in State v. Williamson (Mo.) 21 L. R. A. 827, and shown also in Schwenk v. Wyckoff (N. J. Eq.) 9 L. R. A. 221, and Bowery Nat. Bank v. Wilson (N. Y.) 9 L. R. A. 706, and note, is here extended to the case of an executor as to which the decision seems to be a new one.

His status, at most, was that of an alleged creditor of a removed and deceased executor, holding an assignment of the latter's claim to commissions.

By Code, § 2780, only a "party may contest the account with respect to a matter affecting his interest in the settlement and distribution of the estate."

This assignment was, and could be, to the petitioner as security merely for Harry's alleged debt to him.

The petitioner's claim, if he has any, is against the estate of Harry F. Worthington, by whom he was employed. That claim the petitioner has never attempted to establish. If he had no valid claim against Harry F. he has no interest in any commissions to which Harry F. might have been entitled.

Harry F. Worthington was not entitled to any commissions upon the corpus of the estate, he having been removed before the final execution of the duties imposed upon the executors by the will.

Re Jones, 4 Sandf. Ch. 615, 7 L. ed. 1229; Re Allen, 29 Hun, 7; Re Hayden, 54 Hun, 197.

The commissions of an executor are not assignable, and an instrument purporting to assign the same is void.

Wheelright v. Rhoades, 28 Hun, 57; Redfield's Surrogate Practice, p. 781; Re Hayden, supra; Re Manice, 31 Hun, 119.

It is against public policy that an executor should assign his commissions in advance of their being ascertained, fixed, and allowed to him.

It has been frequently held that the assignment of the salary or fees of a public officer is void as against public policy.

Code of Civil Procedure, § 1910; Bowery Nat. Bank v. Wilson, 9 L. R. A. 706, 122 N. Y. 478; Bliss v. Lawrence, 58 N. Y. 442, 17 Am. Rep. 278; Toft v. Marsily, 120 N. Y. 474; Lawrence v. Townsend, 88 N. Y. 24; Platt v. Platt, 105 N. Y. 488; Decker v. Saltzman, 59 N. Y. 275; Daly v. Stetson, 23 Jones & S. 202; Zubriskie v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 322, 64 Am. Dec. 551; Lamphere v. Hall, 26 How. Pr. 509; Brooks v. Hanford, 15 Abb. Pr. 342.

Every reason forbidding the assignment by a sheriff of his fees is equally cogent against allowing an executor to assign his expected commissions, especially when the latter's commissions are payable only upon and for the faithful rendition of the services.

Abbott v. American Hard Rubber Co. 33 Barb. 578; Ten Eyck v. Craig, 62 N. Y. 406; Moore v. Moore, 5 N. Y. 256; Ackermann v. Emtott, 4 Barb. 626.

Per Curiam:

This appeal has been taken from an order of the general term affirming an order of the surrogate refusing to open and modify a decree entered upon the final judicial settlement of the accounts of the surviving executors of the will of Henry R. Worthington, deceased. The appellant claims no other interest in the estate of the decedent than that derived from an assignment by one of the executors of his commissions. This executor was subsequently declared a lunatic, and removed for mental incapacity, and died before the remaining executors had rendered an account. The executrix of the removed and deceased executor was made a party to the accounting, and the surrogate rendered a decree in which it was, among other things, adjudged that the removed executor was not entitled to commissions because he took no part in the management of the estate, or in the making and keeping of the accounts of the executors. The appellant was not cited nor heard in this proceeding, and we think it is clear that he had no such vested title, either legal or equitable, to any share or interest in the assets or property of the estate to be distributed upon the accounting or affected by it, as conferred upon him the right to be made a party to the proceeding, or to be heard upon the settlement and entry of the decree. It may be conceded that the assignment of the commissions was made for a good consideration, and that the removed executor had actively participated for many years in the management and administration of the estate, and that his representatives were therefore entitled to some consideration upon the final allowance of commissions by the surrogate. The difficulty in the way of the appellant is of another kind. Until ascertained and liquidated at the times and in the manner authorized by law, the commissions are not subject to the executor's disposal, but the right to them is inchoate, and upon grounds of public policy, unassignable. There is no fundamental distinction in this respect between public and private trusts, where the statute fixes the compensation, and prescribes that it shall not become due and payable until the services have been rendered, or at stated periods during the term of service. It is well settled that a public officer cannot, during his official term, and before his salary or fees become due and payable, make a valid assignment of such salary or fees. Bliss v. Lawrence, 58 N. Y. 442, 17 Am. Rep. 273; Bowery Nat. Bank v. Wilson, 122 N. Y. 478, 9 L. R. A. 706.

It is believed that the efficiency of the service to be rendered depends upon the enforcement of such a rule. If the emoluments of the office might be separated from it and transferred to another, it would leave the duties of the office as a barren charge to be borne by the incumbent. It is evident that transfers of this kind would not tend to promote activity and care in the discharge of official obligations. The same considerations forbid the recognition of an assignment by an executor of his commissions in advance of the time prescribed by law for their adjustment and payment. When the hope of compensation is gone, a strong incentive to diligence and zeal is wanting, and the temptation to be content with a lax or perfunctory administration of the trust becomes more persuasive. As the appellant failed to establish a valid title to any interest in the estate of the decedent, we are not required to consider the other questions discussed upon the argument of the appeal.

The order of the General Term must be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Bartlett, J., not sitting.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

LIMBURG

v.

GERMAN FIRE INSURANCE CO. OF

1. Both conditions need not be shown in order to avoid a policy of insurance under a clause making it void when "vacant or unoccupied."
2. The words "vacant or unoccupied" in an insurance policy must be construed with respect to the use and adaptability of the building insured.
3. An old counter not intended to be moved but left for sale in the insured building on removal of the tenant who had used it for a cigar store and factory and a few bottles and jugs of liquor stored there under an arrangement with him without the knowledge of the owner of the building do not constitute an occupancy of the building where the owner is seeking another tenant.
4. Altering or repairing a building does not constitute an occupancy within the meaning of an insurance policy which provides that mechanics may be employed for a certain number of days in such work.
5. A verdict ignoring the instructions of the court to limit the recovery to the amount required to repair the building and giving the whole amount of insurance thereof will be set aside.

(January 26, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Keokuk in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.
Mr. James C. Davis for appellant.
Mr. J. F. Smith for appellee.

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Defendant company issued to plaintiff its policy of insurance for the sum of $500 on a frame store building in the city of Keokuk, Iowa. The policy insured the property against loss by fire from September 4, 1890, to the 4th day of September, 1891. On March 29, 1891, the property was partially destroyed by fire. Plaintiff brings this action to recover, claiming that the loss is total. Defendant pleads a provision in the policy that if the premises "be or become vacant or unoccupied, and remain so for ten days," the policy shall be void. It alleges that for more than ten days immediately prior to the fire said premises had become and remained vacant and unoccupied. It also claims that the insured property was only damaged to the amount of $200. Other issues were presented, as to which no question is now made, and they need not be stated.

2. The provision of the policy on which the defense is chiefly based is: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied, and remain so for ten days." It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine when, in legal contemplation, a building may be said to be "vacant or unoccupied," within the meaning of these words as used in the policy. At the outset it will be well to bear in mind that, in order to avoid liability under this clause of the policy, it is not incumbent on the defendant to show that both conditions existed for the ten days immediately preceding the fire. It is sufficient, under this provision of the policy, to defeat liability, if the building was either vacant or unoccupied for the required time, in the absence of other provisions indorsed upon or added to the policy. A learned writer has said that the words "vacant" and "unoccupied" are not synonymous; that "vacant" means empty of everything but air, and that "unoccupied" means that no one has the actual use or possession of the premises; and it is further said that the words must be construed with reference to the kind of structure or building insured. 1 May, Ins. § 249a. It occurs to us that these words must also be construed in view of the uses and purposes for which the building is adapted; that is, as to whether it is so built and arranged as to be used as a dwelling house, or a store building, or a school-house, or a structure fitted and adapted for use for some other purpose. Webster defines "vacant" as being "deprived of its contents; not filled; empty." The same authority defines "occupy" thus: "To take or hold possession of; or hold or keep for use; to possess." Another definition is: "To hold possession; to be an occupant." It is said that occupancy implies an actual use of a dwelling house as a dwelling place; that the insurer has a right, by the terms of such a policy, to the care and supervision which would be involved in such an occupancy. Bonenfant v. American F. Ins. Co. 76 Mich. 658; Shackleton v. Sun Fire Office of London, England, 55 Mich. 288, 54 Am. Rep. 379; Ashworth v. Builders Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 423, 17 Am. Rep. 117.

Weidert v. State Ins. Co., 19 Or. 261, was a case of insurance of a dwelling house, where the policy contained a "vacant" or "unoccupied" clause. It appeared that plaintiff moved out of the house about March 20; that on the next day one McNett moved in, and remained until the 20th of June; and after that time, and up to the time of the fire, plaintiff or his hired man visited the house daily, and that some of the members of his family were at the house every day. It was held that the house was vacant and unoccupied. In Keith v. Quincy Mut. F. Ins. Co., 10 Allen, 228, the court held that the fact that tools remained in a shop, and that it was visited daily by the son of the insured, did not constitute occupancy; that the policy contemplated some practical use of the building. In Corrigan v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co., 123 Mass. 298, the occupant of the house had moved out, leaving in it some of his furniture, and retaining the key; and the premises were held to be unoccupied. In Herrman v. Merchants Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 184, 37 Am. Rep. 438, it was held that a dwelling house was unoccupied when no one lived in it; and in Herrman v. Adriatic F. Ins. Co., 85 N. Y. 168, 39 Am. Rep. 644, the holding was that occupancy contemplated the use of a house by human beings as their customary place of abode. In Cook v. Continental Ins. Co., 70 Mo. 610, 35 Am. Rep. 438, the insured had moved out of the house, leaving some furniture, and leaving a man in possession of the house, and to sleep therein. He abandoned it, and afterwards the house was burned, no one being then there. It was held that it was unoccupied. In Watertown F. Ins. Co. v. Cherry, 84 Va. 72, the premises insured consisted in part of a dwelling house. The evidence showed that the insured had moved out of the house; that it was not in use, except that a party had put some fodder in the outbuildings; and the buildings were occasionally visited by a resident of the neighborhood, who had the key. The building was held to be vacant and unoccupied.

In Halpin v. Insurance Co. of North America, 120 N. Y. 73, 8 L. R. A. 79, it was held that a building used as a morocco factory, and which was unused for about six months prior to the fire, was unoccupied within the meaning and contemplation of the parties, even though all the machinery remained in the building, and it was closed and locked, and in the hands of the plaintiff's agent for rent, and he visited it frequently. The court said "that to constitute occupancy of a building used for manufacturing purposes there must be some use or employment of the property. Its use as a place of storage merely is not sufficient."

The insurer has a right, by the terms of the policy, to the care and supervision which is involved in the use of the property contemplated by the parties at the time of entering into the contract." In Continental Ins. Co. v. Kyle, 124 Ind. 182, 9 L. R. A. 81, a tenant moved out of an insured dwelling house March 26, after which one who had previously engaged the house made some repairs thereon, and kept in the house some planes, and on March 30, put some hay in the stable, and buried some potatoes on the premises, intending to move in on April 1. March 31, the house was destroyed by fire, and it was held that a policy conditioned against the premises becoming "vacant or unoccupied" was avoided.

In American Ins. Co. v. Padfield, 78 Ill. 169, it is said: "A fair construction of the 23 L. R. A.

language 'vacant and unoccupied' is that it should be without an occupant,—without any person living in it." In Ashworth v. Builders Mut. Ins. Co., 112 Mass. 422, 17 Am. Rep. 117, it is said: "Occupancy, as applied to such buildings [dwelling house and barn], implies an actual use of the house as a dwelling place, and such use of the barn as is ordinarily incident to a barn, belonging to an occupied house, or at least something more than a use of it for storage." In Farmers Ins. Co. v. Wells, 42 Ohio St. 519, the tenant moved out with no intention of returning, leaving in the premises a barrel of corn and a coal-oil can. On the following night the building burned. It was held that it was vacant or unoccupied. In Sleeper v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co., 56 N. H. 401, the occupant of the house removed to another town, taking his family, their wearing apparel, and part of their furniture. It was held that the building was vacant and unoccupied, even though he may have intended to return in eight or ten months, and left in the house a few articles not necessary for his present use. In Moore v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 64 N. H. 140, it is held that the premises were vacant and unoccupied where the occupant had removed therefrom, though a little furniture was left in the house; and it is also held that the terms "vacancy" and "nonoccupancy" are used interchangeably, and as equivalent in meaning. In Dennison v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 52 Iowa, 457, a building used as a boarding house and hotel, which had been vacated by a tenant, and stood awaiting another occupant, was held vacant and unoccupied. In Fease v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co., 74 Iowa, 876, the tenant moved out of a dwelling house on September 26, and it was burned October 1, following. The owner lived a mile and a half away, and spent a part of each intervening day in examining and cleaning the house, but did not sleep there nights. Her father, who lived near the insured premises, left an axe and grub hoe in the house at night; otherwise it was not occupied. It was held that to all intents and purposes the house was vacant and unoccupied. It was said: "There was nothing left or placed in the house which indicated an intent to occupy it as a dwelling at any time. It is true it had been rented, and a tenant expected to take possession in about two weeks subsequent to the fire; but this is immaterial." In Snyder v. Firemans Fund Ins. Co., 78 Iowa, 146, the tenant had moved everything out of the insured dwelling house except some trumpery,—a box or barrel, a cross-cut saw, a pair of skates,—and did not expect to return, and there was no evidence touching its future occupancy. The house was destroyed by fire the next morning. Carpenters had been at work repairing it. It was held vacant or unoccupied. In Seaton v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 69 Iowa, 99, the dwelling house had been vacated by the tenant about three months prior to the fire. He had left therein two or three jars, and two large four or five gallon jars, and a molasses keg, and a table. It appears also that plaintiff had in the house some tools and other things. It was held that the articles in the house did not constitute an occupancy, and that a verdict was properly directed for defendant.

Appellee relies upon and cites many cases, among which we specially refer to the following: McMurray v. Capital Ins. Co. (Iowa) 54 N. W. Rep. 354, was a case where a dwelling house was insured and it was claimed that the premises had become vacant and unoccupied. The facts were that the insured had been away for several months, working at his trade. His wife and children were away temporarily on a visit to her parents. The house remained the home. None of the furniture had been removed. There was no intention to abandon it as a place of residence. The absence was for a temporary purpose only. In Eddy v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 70 Iowa, 473, 59 Am. Rep. 444, the tenant had removed from the house on Tuesday. The fire occurred the following Friday. Plaintiff was residing in another house on another part of the farm; and on the morning after the tenant moved out plaintiff took possession of the house, cleaned it, and prepared to move in. Before the fire plaintiff had in part moved in, had placed therein carpets, bedding and bedsteads, cans of fruit, chairs, pictures, mirrors, stoves, clothing, dishes, and a table, and expected to be there to remain on Saturday; and it was held that the house was not vacant or unoccupied. In Doud v. Citizens Ins. Co., 141 Pa. 47, the provision in the policy was, "if the premises insured be vacated." The tenant moved out, and on the following day the owner was at the house all day, and then left, and began packing up preparatory to moving into the house herself, and in fact had placed some things in the house. She was held to be in possession, and that the house had not been vacated. Roe v. Dwelling House Ins. Co., 149 Pa. 94, was like the Doud Case in its facts. In Home Ins. Co. v. Wood, 47 Kan. 521, it was claimed that the house was unoccupied within the meaning of the policy. The jury found that the plaintiff's family was residing in the house at the time it was burned, but were temporarily absent. The evidence showed that the household goods were all in the house; that some of them had been packed; that plaintiff stayed in the house every night until five days before the fire, and thereafter slept at another place, because he was ill; that he was at the house every day up to the day of the fire. The court, while expressing doubts as to whether the building was occupied, held that, as the jury had so found, and there was evidence to sustain their finding, it would not disturb the verdict. In Burlington Ins. Co. v. Brockway, 138 Ill. 644, the property was a building occupied by the assured as a dwelling and store-room. The policy contained a provision like that in the case at bar. The insured ceased to occupy the dwelling part of the building, but did occupy the store up to the time of the fire. The company contended that a failure to occupy the whole building avoided the policy. The court held that the occupancy of the store portion of the building was an occupancy under the terms of the policy. In Traders Ins. Co. v. Race, 142 Ill. 338, the court held that by reason of special provisions in the policy the trustees therein mentioned, or the mortgage, was not affected by a violation of the conditions of the policy by the assured as to nonoccupancy; and, further, as the proceeding was in equity, which will not enforce a penalty or forfeiture, that the company must show that the vacancy or nonoccupancy in some degree contributed towards causing the fire. In Traders Ins. Co. v. Race (Ill.) 29 N. E. Rep. 846, the insured had moved furniture in the house, and from that and other circumstances the court held it was not vacant and unoccupied.

It will be observed that few if any of the cases relied upon by appellee sustain his contention that the premises in controversy were occupied within the meaning of that word as used in policies of insurance. Facts touching vacancy or occupancy differ in each case presented; hence each case must be determined upon its own peculiar facts. It must be conceded also that the decisions of courts are not always in harmony where the facts are substantially the same. It will serve no useful purpose to further review the authorities. From them may be deduced certain rules or principles applicable to cases like that at bar. We must, in construing the meaning of the words, "be or become vacant or unoccupied," have in view not only the technical meaning of the words, but the uses for which the property is adapted, which must have been in contemplation of the parties when they entered into the contract. Again, mere use of a store building as a place in which a few articles may be left no business being carried on therein, and the premises not being so used as to in any wise insure for them the care, watchfulness, and protection from danger to exposure to fire which must have been in contemplation of the parties to the contract, in view of the adaptability of the building for certain uses only, cannot be deemed an occupancy. To prevent a policy from being avoided for vacancy or unoccupancy in such a case, the use and occupancy must be of such a character as ordinarily pertains to a building adapted for such purposes. A mere storage of property therein, which does not involve the care and watchfulness which the policy holder owes to the insurer, will not suffice to constitute occupancy. The undisputed facts in the case at bar are that the insured property was a two-story building, the lower story being adapted and used for a store-room, with access therefrom to the story above. There was no means of access to the upper story except by going through the store-room. When the policy issued, the building was occupied by one Reimbold as a tenant of the plaintiff. He had a cigar store in the front part of the building downstairs, and a cigar manufactory in the rear part. There were two rooms upstairs which seem to have been but little used by the tenant. His lease expired on March 11, 1891. He moved his stock out of the building on March 7, and on the same day he had his government license transferred to permit his carrying on business in the building to which he had moved. He had a policy of insurance upon his stock and tools used in his business. This he had properly transferred on March 6. When he moved out on March 7, he left in the building one counter, which he did not intend to move, but wanted to sell, some shelving, and some leaf tobacco in an upper room. All these articles he had taken from the building prior to March 20, except the counter, and he thinks he had them all out, except the counter, before the 18th of March. The counter remained in the building, and was burned. The fire occurred on March 29. The tenant, when he went out, or at least by March 11, gave one key to the building to the agent of the insured, and retained the other. He retained the key so that he might show intending purchasers the counter which he had left there. He exercised no control over the property after his lease expired. During the continuance of his tenancy he had given one Masterson, a saloon keeper, the right to store some liquors in one of the upper rooms, for which Masterson was to pay him $3 per month. He had given Masterson no authority to thus use the upper room after his own lease expired. Masterson's place of business was two or three doors from this building. He never used any part of this building as a store-room to do business in. He simply kept a few bottles of liquor upstairs there, and, as he needed a fresh supply in his saloon, he would come there and get it. He did not come there frequently, only occasionally. He had in the building, within ten days before the fire, one or two bottles of brandy, one or two jugs of whiskey, some bottles of whiskey, and a couple of boxes of wine, and some bottles. It does not appear that Masterson had any key to the building after March 11, or that he was allowed any means of access to his goods. He had no lease from the plaintiff. He was not thus occupying or using this upper room, after the tenant moved out, by reason of any arrangement with plaintiff, so far as the record shows. Nor does it appear that his use of this room was known to plaintiff. Plaintiff's agent had rented the building to a new tenant, who was to move in on March 18, but failed to do so. At the time of the fire there was no certainty as to when, if at all, the building would be occupied. Certain repairs had been made in anticipation of the occupancy of the tenant who was to move in, and failed to do so. Plaintiff's agent testified that at the time of the fire plaintiff was not in any way occupying the building, and had no tenant in there. Plaintiff's agent was frequently in the store-room, painting and papering and scrubbing it out, prior to the fire. Do these facts show occupancy? We think not. The tenant who was to occupy more than ten days prior to the fire had failed to come. No other tenant had been found. The premises were not used for the purpose of carrying on business therein for more than fifteen days preceding the fire. They stood awaiting a tenant. There is nothing to show that plaintiff would ever be able to rent the premises. There was absolutely no use made of the building whatever for the ten days preceding the fire, except that the counter of the late tenant was in there, and the Masterson liquors, before mentioned. The parties, when they entered into the contract of insurance, did not contemplate that the property would be treated as occupied if an outgoing tenant left an old counter in the building, nor if some one unknown to plaintiff stored a few bottles of liquor there. Such use, if it can be dignified into a use, of the building, insured to it practically no care and protection whatever. Such a use, to our minds, falls far short of a compliance with the terms of the contract. That contemplated the use incident to a store, and such a use would carry with it a large degree of protection to the property, which was not essential or possible under the facts as they appear here. The building was vacant or unoccupied for more than ten days prior to the fire. Counsel for appellee seem to think that to hold the parties to the contract which they have voluntarily entered into, and in the absence of fraud, is technical. We cannot change or ignore the agreement of the parties. We cannot make a new one for them, but we must construe their agreement as we find it.

3. Appellee contends that, as the policy provides that mechanics may be employed in the building, altering or repairing it, for not more than fifteen days at any one time, and it was being repaired, that should be considered as an occupancy within the terms of the policy. We do not think so. The repairs might be made while the building was occupied. Again, it is not shown that these repairs continued up to within ten days before the fire. The provision of the policy does not indicate that it was in the contemplation of the parties that there should be no occupancy of the premises while repairs were being made. As the point is not pressed with any apparent confidence, we need give it no further consideration.

4. Under the instructions of the court the jury should have found for the defendant. Indeed, under the undisputed facts, there was no such occupancy as the policy contemplated, and hence the court would have been justified in directing a verdict for the defendant.

5. The jury were told by the court in an instruction that if they found that the building was not totally destroyed, and it could be repaired at an expense of $200 to $250, then plaintiff's damages would be limited to the amount it would have cost to repair said building, and put the same in as good condition as before the fire occurred, with 6 per cent interest per annum thereon. Under the provisions of the policy this instruction was proper, and, whether it was so or not, the jury were bound to follow it. The undisputed evidence was that for $250 the building could have been made as good as it was before the fire. The jury disregarded the court's instruction, and found for plaintiff for the full amount of the policy, with interest. The court should have set the verdict aside for the reasons given.

Reversed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

P. S. WILKES, Appt.,
v.
Griffith DAVIES, Resp't.

1. The owner of improvements on school lands in Washington, who is entitled to compensation therefor on sale of the land, need not yield up possession before bringing an action to recover their value from the purchaser of the lands.
2. A decision that the owner of improvements on school lands which have not been appraised as required by law, cannot have an injunction against the consummation of the sale of the lands to the highest bidder until he has been paid for his improvements because he has two other remedies, one of which is to sue the purchaser of the lands for the value of the improvements, must be held conclusive in a subsequent suit between the parties in interest of the right of the owner of the improvements to bring an action for their value against such purchaser, the parties in the two suits being identical except for the omission in the latter suit of the officers against whom the injunction was sought but who were not parties in interest.

(Hoyt, J., dissents.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of improvements placed by the plaintiff upon school land, which was afterward bid in by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. S. Reife for appellant.

Messrs. Fishback, Elder & Hardin for respondent.

Dunbar, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action at law to recover the alleged value of improvements on school land. The plaintiff alleged his possession of said lands by virtue of a lease from the county commissioners of King county, the appraisement of the land by the county commissioners under the act to provide for the sale and leasing of school lands, approved March 28, 1890, and all the subsequent steps taken by the commissioners under said law. He alleged that the defendant, Davies, was the highest and best bidder for the land upon which the plaintiff's improvements rested, and alleges that in appraising said lands the county commissioners of King county, although, at the time, having full knowledge and notice of the fact that plaintiff had improvements thereon, and of their value, and that the plaintiff was the owner of said improvements and living thereon, arbitrarily, and without just cause, failed and refused to appraise or value the improvements made by the plaintiff, as aforesaid, upon the land, and failed and refused to set down the value of said improvements upon the land so appraised, and to report the same, as required by law. The complaint also alleged the value of the improvements, and asked for judgment for that amount. The complaint is a long one, but we think we have stated sufficient of it for the purposes of this decision. Upon the trial of the cause the defendant objected to the introduction of any testimony by the plaintiff, for the reason that the complaint did not state a cause of action. The court sustained the motion, and plaintiff, standing on his complaint, appeals; so that the only question before the court is the sufficiency of the complaint.

The first and main contention for the respondent is that the plaintiff, being in possession of the improvements, not having delivered them to defendant, he could not recover their value from defendant. We cannot agree with this contention of respondent. We think the law accords to him, without any question or peradventure, the value of his improvements upon the sale of the land, and that he should not be compelled to yield up possession and depend upon a personal judgment, which might prove inadequate or entirely worthless. Neither do we think the law will compel him to remain upon the land awaiting the pleasure of the purchaser to take possession of the premises and the improvements.

There is another proposition in the case, however, that is vastly more troublesome, namely, whether or not the appellant is precluded by the action of the county commissioners in reporting no improvements upon the land, and what appellant's remedies and rights are under such circumstances, if he have any. Although the court entertains grave doubts upon these propositions, yet we think it is unnecessary to determine them in this case. Substantially, this same case was before the court, and this statute was construed, in Wilkes v. Hunt, 4 Wash. 100. In discussing the statute now under consideration, the court, in its opinion rendered in that case, said: "To maintain injunction against any one, the plaintiff must make sure that he has not some other adequate remedy; and this is none the less the rule when an officer of the state is the person sought to be enjoined, and the object of the injunction is to prevent his performing a statutory duty. In this case the appellant shows that there was no appraisalment of his improvements, and that, therefore, the purchasers from the state will take title to the land without paying him for their value, as the statute says he shall do within thirty days. Were we clear that such results would follow, we should feel inclined to reverse the judgment since it is plain that the intention of the statute is to reimburse persons situated as the appellant avers himself to be. But he seems to have not only one, but even two other remedies, either of which would save him harmless. In the first place, if there has been no compliance with the statute by the appraisalment of his improvements, certainly no court would permit a purchaser, under those circumstances, to interfere with his possession of the land until he is compensated as the law required. Secondly, the purchaser is required to pay the appraised value to the owner of the improvements,—that is, he is the debtor to the owner to that amount, and must pay it within thirty days. He can be sued for the debt, and, if there has been no appraisalment, the court and a jury can fix the reasonable value as well as the commissioners. With such a wealth of remedies at his hand we think the state should be permitted to proceed with its business without the hindrance of an injunction, and the judgment is therefore affirmed." By reference to the record in the case of Wilkes v. Hunt, supra, it will be seen that the parties in interest in that case were the identical parties in interest in this action; it being alleged in that action that Hunt was the agent for Davies, the defendant in the action at bar, in bidding in the land. That action was against both Hunt and Davies. It is true that the land commissioners were necessarily made parties defendant to the action; but it was equally true that they were not the parties in interest, and, under the theory of the plaintiff in that action, it was necessary that the commissioners should be made a vehicle to convey him into court to obtain an adjudication of his right with Hunt and Davies. That adjudication could only affect the parties in interest, namely, Wilkes on the one side, and Hunt and Davies on the other. Afterwards, Davies was substituted for Hunt as the purchaser, so that it will be seen that the parties to this suit were the parties to that.

NOTE.—For the general doctrine as to what matters are concluded by a judgment, see Wiese v. San Francisco Musical Fund Soc. (Cal.) 7 L. R. A. 577, and note.

The present case presents a peculiar application of the doctrine, in which the declaration in suit for injunction of the existence of other remedies made as the reason for denying the injunction is held conclusive of the right to one of such specified remedies, on an attempt to enforce it in a subsequent action. This the dissenting opinion regards as a commingling of the doctrine of stare decisis with that of res judicata. The exact point seems to be a novel one.

The next question is, Was the subject-matter of the litigation the same? The object of the first action was to obtain the value of the improvements on the land by enjoining the sale until such improvements were paid for. The avowed object of this action is to obtain the value of the same improvements. The complaints in both actions are the same; the same state of facts is alleged; and, by referring to appellant's brief in the former action (the respondent not appearing), it will be seen that the injunctive relief there sought was sought on the theory that no legal relief was available. We quote from appellant's argument, on page 23 of the brief: "Since the title to the land would pass to the purchaser from the state by this contract and patent, if delivered, the plaintiff having only the right to be paid the appraised value of his improvements, he could interpose no defense to an action by the purchaser to recover possession of the lands and improvements. He could not recover the value of his improvements from the state, nor could he compel the purchaser to pay for them, for the reason that no valuation had been placed upon them by the commissioners. How, then, can he be protected, except by injunction?" So that it will be seen that the very question raised by the respondent in this case, namely, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, was before the court in that case, and one of the grounds alleged by the court for refusing the equitable relief asked for was the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief asked for in this action. So that the question involved here was directly before the court, and passed upon by the court, in Wilkes v. Hunt, and the court, in its opinion, plainly states that the judgment in that case was based upon its construction of the statute on the questions raised in the case now before the court; and, while it may be that the case might have been decided on some other ground, these questions were involved in the case, were considered and decided by this court and such consideration and decision on these points decided the former case. So says this court in its opinion. This was in no sense obiter dictum, but was the decision on one of the points involved in the case.

The plaintiff in this action, relying upon the rule laid down by the court, has brought himself squarely within it, and the decision of this court, whether right or wrong, must bind the parties to the action in which it was rendered, and becomes the law of the case. Whether or not the judgment in the former case was res adjudicata, so far as the public is concerned, in the way of a precedent, it is not necessary to determine, for there is a well-defined distinction between the doctrine of res adjudicata in that sense and the doctrine of res adjudicata in its application exclusively to the parties to the action. The general rule is that the judgment of a competent court is binding and conclusive upon the parties, and will not be reversed or reviewed by any court possessing concurrent jurisdiction. It is not only binding and conclusive as to all questions of law and fact that were made upon the first trial, but as to all questions of law and fact which, from the organization and powers of the court, might have been submitted. Wells, Res Adjudicata, § 424. In Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Cal. 75, the court, in referring to a case which had been before it, and had been decided, at a previous trial, says: "This view of the case is conclusive of this appeal. The same facts are brought before the court now as when the case was heard and decided here. The agreement was before the court between Dallas and Gilson, and the effect of it was passed upon." In Thomason v. Dill, 34 Ala. 175, it was decided that a decision of the supreme court is the law of the case in which it was announced, and is conclusive both in the primary court and on a second appeal; and by the supreme court of Indiana in Haw- ley v. Smith, 45 Ind. 183: "When the supreme court has laid down a rule of law, it will adhere to it in a subsequent action between the same parties, where a different decision would leave one party without a remedy, even though doubtful of the correctness of the rule when applied to other cases." In Stacy v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 82 Vt. 551, the rule was announced that the supreme court would not revise a former decision made by the same court in the same cause, and on substantially the same state of facts. Said the court: "Upon carefully examining the original bill of exceptions that was then before the court, and comparing it with the one now before us, we are wholly unable to discover in this case any fact material to its determination that was not contained in that. The facts are stated with more particularity now than then, but substantially they are the same. We find no such alteration or addition to the facts as calls for the application of any different rule of law than what the case then required." And so with the cases under consideration. The complaints are substantially identical, and consequently call for the application of no different rules of law or modes of construction. This rule is so obviously based upon the plainest principles of justice and fair dealing that it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 8 How. 413, 11 L. ed. 658, that after a case has been decided on its merits, and remanded to the court below, and is again brought upon a second appeal, it is then too late to allege even that the court had no jurisdiction to try the first appeal; virtually holding as the law of the case a decision of a court without jurisdiction. This case has been followed by the appellate courts in many of the states. In Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 685, it was decided that when a case has been once taken to an appellate court, and its judgment obtained on the points of law involved, such judgment, however erroneous, becomes the law of the case, and that this rule applies, not only to questions of law arising out of the case, but to questions of jurisdiction. And while the case at bar was not brought here on appeal directly as a matter of record the second time, yet in fact and in effect it is here, for all the purposes of the case, exactly as though it were brought here on a second appeal. Dugan v. Hollins, 18 Md. 149, is a case where the parties to the second action were not nominally the parties to the first action; but the same questions were adjudicated in both cases, and the same law points involved, just as in the action at bar, and it is a case in point, so far as parties to the action are concerned. There the court said: "The present defendants . . . were the plaintiffs in the suit against Coonan, reported in 9 Gill, 62. That case, in form, was an action of assumpsit to recover rent for the house now in dispute, but in reality was designed to obtain a decision upon the title to the property, under the will of Cumberland Dugan, Sr. This is evident from the admission stated on page 66." Analogous to this, the case of Wilkes v. Hunt was in form an equitable proceeding, but it was in reality designed to obtain a construction of the statute in relation to the rights of owners of improvements on school land. Quoting again from Dugan v. Hollins, the court said: "As regards the effect or influence of the former decision upon the present case, it will be seen to be quite immaterial whether it shall be considered as an estoppel or as a decision by the court of last resort, giving an interpretation to the clauses of the will of Cumberland Dugan, Sr., in relation to the same property now in dispute, and where the same question arises which was before decided."

And so we say again that the decision in the case of Wilkes v. Hunt was an interpretation of the clauses in the statute with reference to improvements on school land, and in relation to the particular improvements now in dispute, and that the same questions arise in the case at bar which were before decided; and we again adopt the language of the court in that case, and apply it to the case at bar, when we say: "The same property, the same statute, and the same questions arising upon similar facts which were presented in the former case are also before us in this." We therefore think the following quotation from Hammond v. Inloe, 4 Md. 138, would constitute a very appropriate closing for us: "We have not been able to discover a sufficient reason for making this an exception to the almost uninterrupted practice of all courts, of receiving their own decisions as of binding force."

In the appeal of Thomson and others in the case of Winn v. Albert, 15 Md. 268, the court decided that, where the court of appeal has declared a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors to be void, that decision is the law of the case, and must govern in all further proceedings in the same case, notwithstanding a different decision upon a similar deed may have been subsequently made by the court in another case. And this, also, was a case where the parties to the last action were not, in form, parties to the action in the former case. Such, also, was the condition in the case of Tuttle v. Garrett, 74 Ill. 444. The parties to the action, the decision of which was held to be stare decisis, were John G. Tuttle et al., plaintiffs in error, against Augustus O. Garrett, defendant in error; but the court held in the latter case that it was substantially the same case, and that the court was concluded by its decision in the former case. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Aurora v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 82, 19 L. ed. 42, lays down the rule as follows: "Courts of justice, in stating the rule, do not always employ the same language; but, where every objection urged in the second suit was open to the party within the legitimate scope of the pleadings in the first suit, and might have been presented in that trial, the matter must be considered as having passed in rem judicatam, and the former judgment in such a case is conclusive between the parties. Except in special cases, the plea of res judicata, says Taylor, applies, not only to points upon which the court was actually required to form an opinion and pronounce judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time." And, referring to Washington, A. & G. S. Packet Co. v. Sickles, 65 U. S. 24 How. 841, 16 L. ed. 653, the court said: "Attempt was made in that case, as in this, to maintain that the judgment in the first suit could not be held to be an estoppel, unless it was shown by the record that the very point in controversy was distinctly presented by an issue, and that it was explicitly found by the jury; but the court held otherwise."

It seems to us that this high authority is decisive of the case at bar, for, if the contention of the respondent in this cause in regard to the construction of the statute is correct, it would have been a complete answer to the complaint in the former action. It is true that the plea of res adjudicata was not presented by the pleadings, nor was it offered in proof under the general issue, which are the two ordinary ways of bringing this question to the notice of the court. But this case falls within the rule laid down by many courts where no opportunity to plead the former adjudication is presented. The plaintiff brought his action in accordance with his legal rights, as pronounced by this court. He could not very well plead an estoppel in his complaint. The defendant answered, but his answer was a denial of the facts alleged in the complaint. No question of law was raised by the answer to render the plea of an estoppel necessary by reply. It denied that the plaintiff had the improvements which he alleged he had; denied that he lived on the land, or that he was in possession of the land, as averred in the complaint; denied that the lands were advertised for sale, as alleged; denied that either the defendant or his assigns were claiming the right to take plaintiff's improvements without compensation, but averred that all the plaintiff's improvements had been duly and regularly appraised and compensation made therefor in the sum of $600, and that plaintiff had accepted and received said sum. There was much more to the same effect in the answer, but it only put in issue questions of fact, and informed the plaintiff that these facts must be substantiated by proof. This court had not passed upon any question of fact in the case. If it had, such decision could have been pleaded as res adjudicata to the answer. But there was certainly no opportunity to plead res adjudicata of any decision of the court on the law involved. Neither was there any opportunity to offer such a plea in evidence, even if it had been admissible to have done more than to have cited the court to the decision; for the case was really disposed of on demurrer, or a motion which was equivalent to a demurrer to the complaint; for, after the jury was impeached, the defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence, on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the plaintiff was deprived of the right to introduce evidence of any kind by the action of the court in sustaining the motion. But, in any event, this objection was not raised here, and we will not raise it for the parties. Both cases are matters of record in this court, and the court can take judicial notice of its own records. But, further, it was made a direct issue by the brief of appellant in this court, and is the only matter which is discussed in the brief. No objection was made in the respondent's answering brief to the consideration of this question, or in oral argument to its discussion. In fact, it was claimed by respondent in his brief that the case of Wilkes v. Hunt was res adjudicata, to the effect that the plaintiff could not hold possession of the land, and at the same time recover its value in a suit at law. Both parties therefore conceded it to be res adjudicata, and treated it as such, but placed different constructions upon the decision. In consideration of the importance of this statute in its effect upon the public, and of the doubt that is at present in the minds of the court as to whether the construction placed upon it in Wilkes v. Hunt was the proper construction, we will not pass upon that question now, nor consider ourselves bound by it in any independent cases; but, having so construed the statute in a case in which the identical parties to this action were the parties in interest, and the identical property here involved was involved, so far as this case is concerned we feel ourselves bound by the decision therein rendered, and by the opinion therein expressed; and on this ground the judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded to the lower court, with instructions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

Hoyt, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the conclusions of the majority as stated in the foregoing opinion, and, as I deem the questions discussed therein of great importance, shall at some length state the reasons which induce me to dissent therefrom. Such conclusions are founded entirely upon the alleged fact that what was said by this court in the case of Wilkes v. Hunt, 4 Wash. 100, was conclusive of the rights of the parties in the case at bar. If these conclusions had been put upon the ground that what was thus said had become a rule of decision for all cases presenting a similar state of facts, I should find little fault with the reasoning of the court in regard thereto. But it clearly appears from the opinion that they were not at all founded upon such rule. It appears from inferences to be drawn from the course of the discussion in the opinion, and also by express announcement therein, that what was said in that case will not be considered as the settled law of the state; that, owing to the importance of the questions involved, the court will not now decide anything in regard thereto, but will hold them open for further investigation. What was said in that case is not applied to this, for the reason that it is now thought to be the law in this state, settled or unsettled, but is so applied solely on account of the alleged substantial identity of the parties and of the subject-matter in the two cases. By reason of such identity it is argued that what was said in the former had become the law of this case, or a matter res adjudicata as between the parties thereto. This makes it necessary that the principles underlying those questions which are technically termed "the law of the case," "res adjudicata," and "stare decisis" should be considered, and their application pointed out. As I understand these matters, "the law of the case" is a rule of law announced by a court in the particular case under consideration. The question as to its application most frequently arises in a case which has been before an appellate court, and certain rules of law applicable thereto announced by that court, and the cause remanded for a new trial. In such a case the law, as laid down upon the first appeal, will be held to be the law of the case on the second appeal, and will be adhered to by the court, without any investigation as to whether or not the court is then satisfied with the law as so laid down. After a somewhat extended investigation I have been unable to find that the rule of "the law of the case" has ever been applied, except as to questions thus decided. It may be possible that some courts have, in some particular case, applied the law established in one case in another not technically the same, but it will be found that it was substantially identical with the one in which the rule was laid down. That is said to be "res adjudicata" as between the parties to an action when it appears that a court of competent jurisdiction has passed upon it in a case where the parties and the facts were substantially the same. A question thus decided is conclusive upon the parties; and, whether or not it was correctly ruled, they must abide by the decision. A legal principle is said to be "stare decisis" when it is so established by the rulings of a court that it feels bound thereby, and will not further investigate the question as to its correctness. The line of distinction between these several principles is clear and distinct, and founded on reason and authority. That such is the fact will sufficiently appear from the cases cited in the foregoing opinion. They are so cited for the apparent purpose of showing that there is no such well-defined distinction, and that what would come within the rule of "stare decisis," as above defined, may be applied as "the law of the case," or as "res adjudicata" between the parties to the action. I am unable to gather any such doctrine from such cases. All excepting four may be grouped together, and the most careful reading of the entire group will fail to show that in any of them is any other question decided than that a rule of law laid down by a court in a particular case will be adhered to as the law of that identical case when it again comes before the court.

The four cases cited, not included in the above group, will now be considered. Hammond v. Inteco, 4 Md. 188, refers entirely to the rule of stare decisis, and simply holds that when an appellate court has, upon careful consideration, announced a certain rule of law as applicable to a certain state of facts, it should adhere to that rule in another case presenting the same state of facts, unless it is satisfied that the decision is wrong. As I understand the facts of this case, there was much better reason for the application of the rule of "the law of the case" or res adjudicata than in the case at bar; but the court refused to found its decision upon either of these principles. In the case of Dugan v. Hollins, 18 Md. 149, the court held that where it had once decided as to the force of a law with reference to the title to certain property, and the same law, in reference to the same property, was brought up for consideration upon the same question in another suit, the former decision would be adhered to, whether the judgment be technically an estoppel or not, unless there is manifest error therein. It will be seen that in this case the court announced the doctrine that it would adhere to its former decision even where the parties were not identical, unless it was satisfied that such decision was erroneous; but there is no intimation in the opinion that the court would hold the parties to that action bound by the decision should it be overruled in its application to other cases. It clearly appears from the opinion that the court refused to decide as to whether or not the former decision was rendered under such circumstances as to bind the parties in the case under consideration. In Hawley v. Smith, 45 Ind. 183, the court held a rule of law which had been announced in a former case to be binding upon the court in that one, whether or not said rule of law would, upon a further consideration be found to be correct; but the facts of the case show clearly that in so holding it applied the rule of "res adjudicata" as above set out. The language of the court is as follows: "It having been held in the former action between the same parties, on the same cause of action, that the relation of principal and agent existed, we should regard the question as res adjudicata between the parties. This should be the rule, even if we doubted the correctness of the ruling when applied to other cases." The case of Aurora v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 82, 19 L. ed. 42, only applies the rule of "res adjudicata" as between the parties to the action in relation to the same subject-matter, but extends the doctrine to questions which might have been adjudicated in the former suit, as well as to those which were actually so adjudicated. This extension can have no influence in deciding the case at bar, and was only the announcement of what had been held by many of the courts, though Justice Miller, in his dissenting opinion, gives reasons, which to me are satisfactory, why the rule should not be so extended. These are all of the cases cited, and I can gather nothing therefrom that in any manner tends to extend the rule of "the law of the case," res adjudicata, or stare decisis so as to warrant their being in any manner intermingled, or applied to cases except as above stated.

I will now proceed to examine the decision in the case of Wilkes v. Hunt, as related to this case, and state my reasons for holding that, if the case at bar is to be at all affected by that decision, it must be because it is stare decisis in this court, and not for the reason that it is "the law of the case" or res adjudicata in any sense. That it is not the law of the case is too well established by the principles hereinbefore announced, and by the cases bearing thereon, cited by the majority, to need further discussion. The case in which that decision was announced was in no sense this case. It was between different parties, and related to an entirely different subject-matter; for while, except for the reason to be hereinafter stated, there may be something in the facts which would justify the statement of the majority that the ultimate object sought by the plaintiff in that case was the same as the ultimate object sought in this, yet the immediate objects of the suits were entirely different. In the former case the only object was to prevent a sale of the land being consummated as between the state and the purchaser at the sale. Under the complaint therein the court had no jurisdiction whatever to in any manner render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the value of his improvements as appraised, or to be appraised. The only thing which he sought was to have the hands of the officers of the land department stayed. There is no intimation in his complaint, or in any part of the proceedings, that he seeks any express relief as against the defendant in this action. It is nowhere suggested that in the proceeding there should be an appraisal ordered, and, upon such appraisal being had, the purchaser at the sale adjudged to pay the amount thereof to the plaintiff. Nor does it in any manner appear therefrom that the injunctive relief is auxiliary to any other relief to which he may be entitled; while in the case at bar the only thing sought is to recover, in an action at law, the value of his improvements. If, in the former case, he had brought his action to recover for such improvements, and had, as auxiliary thereto, sought to stay the hands of the land department from completing the contract of sale, there would be some ground for the contention that the two suits were as to the same subject-matter; but such was not the fact, and the assertion of the majority of the court that the only object of the former suit was to secure the payment to the plaintiff for his improvements is in no manner founded upon the records in that case, but entirely upon a loose statement in the brief of the plaintiff. It in no manner appears from said record that the plaintiff would have been satisfied to submit the question of the value of his improvements to a jury. The gravamen of his complaint is that he was entitled to have them appraised under the statute, and that, until they had been so appraised, the sale should not be consummated. In my opinion the subject-matter of the two cases was in no legal sense the same, and for that reason the decision in the first case could not be res adjudicata in the latter one. But, if it were, the parties were not so identical as to warrant the application of that rule. It is true that, so far as any pecuniary interest was concerned, the defendant in this action was the substantial party in the former one; but when we take into consideration the object of that suit, and the parties at the hands of whom the relief was asked, and also consider the fact that the purchaser at the sale may have cared very little as to whether or not the officers were allowed to consummate it by the execution of the contract, it should not be held that he was the principal person against whom the plaintiff was waging that suit. For aught that appears in that case, this defendant may have been entirely content to have had the court restrain the execution of said contract. It was nowhere intimated therein that he, or his agent who made the bill for him, had acted in the premises in any manner wrongfully. All the wrongful action alleged was on the part of the officers of the land department, and they were the substantial parties to that action, and the defendant in this action was but incidentally interested therein. Under these circumstances, the responsibility of defending the action should have been, and probably was, cast upon the officers of the land department, and for that reason, if for no other, this defendant should not be bound by the decision rendered therein.

There is another, and to my mind conclusive, reason why the former decision could not be relied upon here as having been an adjudication which established the rights of the parties to this action. Before that rule can be invoked, the former decision must in some manner be brought into the case under consideration; and as the correctness of the ruling of the lower court must be determined upon the record as presented to it, and not by anything occurring in the case subsequent thereto, I am unable to see how its decision can in any manner be affected by the former one. The transcript of the record from the lower court will be searched in vain for anything that in the most remote manner calls the attention of that court to the fact that there had ever been such a decision made by any court as that now relied upon. As I understand the rule, a court will never, for the purpose of applying a principle of law as "res adjudicata" in a particular case, go outside of that case to ascertain what that principle is. If a rule of law has been so established by the courts of a state as to be "stare decisis" therein, it must be given effect without being specially brought into the particular case; and this must be done as well when the parties and subject-matter are entirely different as when they are identical with those of the case in which the rule was announced. But I cannot understand how it can be held that in the trial of this case in the lower court it was bound to take notice that this principle of law had been adjudicated between the parties under such circumstances as to be binding upon them in this case, without the fact of such decision, or the circumstances under which it was rendered, having been in some manner brought to the attention of that court. The rule announced would require of a trial court not only that it should bear in mind every principle of law theretofore announced by it, and every other court of competent jurisdiction, but also to take judicial notice of all the facts in every case, and at its peril, without its attention being in any manner called thereto, deciding rightfully as to the identical parties in all of the cases, and the entire subject-matter which was, or might have been, adjudicated therein. That such could not be the rule seems clear to my mind. The utmost extent to which any of the cases go is to hold that, where there has been no opportunity to plead the former adjudication, it may be given in evidence under the general issue. There is no intimation in any of such cases that, where the plaintiff relies upon such adjudication as the foundation for his action, he should not set it up in his complaint. If he does not have to thus set it up, then the court, when it rules as to the sufficiency of such complaint, must bring to its aid an adjudication in another case, of which it has no notice whatever, or else have its decision reversed by having such adjudication suggested in the appellate court. But, even if it was held that it was not necessary for such prior adjudication to be set up in the pleadings, under the circumstances of this case the plaintiff was not in a situation to take any advantage of such adjudication. After the intimation of the court that it thought the complaint on its face insufficient, he made no suggestion that its allegations were in any manner aided by matters not appearing therein. Not only was there no attempt in this manner to aid the complaint, but the plaintiff substantially told the lower court that he had no proof to offer upon that subject, as, after the court had intimated that the complaint was insufficient, he stated to the court what he proposed to prove to establish the issues on his part, and in so doing made no reference whatever to any matter as "res adjudicata" between the parties.

The majority of the court have evidently seen the force of some of these suggestions, and have attempted to show that the parties here conceded that the question of res adjudicata was involved in the case. But, even if the briefs of the parties do make such concession, that fact would not be sufficient to warrant this court in finding therefrom that the question was presented in the court below; and, unless it was so presented, this court should not allow it to influence the decision here. The transcript of the record shows clearly that nothing of the kind was relied upon in the lower court. Such being the fact, this court, if justified in acting upon any concession of counsel to the contrary, could only do so when the concession was made in such express and unmistakable terms that there could be no doubt of the intention. No suggestion, by way of argument, or anything of that kind, should have the force of such express concession. As I understand the briefs, however, there is no claim, even on the part of appellant, that the question of res adjudicata was presented to the court below, or even that he relied upon it here. That there may be no misunderstanding as to the facts, I here set out the entire brief and argument of the appellant. It was in words and figures following: "The sole question before this court is the sufficiency of the complaint. It was contended by counsel for defendant at the trial that, the plaintiff being in possession of the improvements, not having delivered them to defendant, he could not recover their value from defendant; also, that plaintiff should have appealed to the state school land commission on the refusal of the county commissioner to appraise the improvements. The court, on its own motion, held that there having been no appraisal by the county commissioners, the sale was void, and the defendant acquired no title, hence was not liable. This same controversy came before this court in the case of Wilkes v. Hunt, 4 Wash. 100, in which the plaintiff sought to enjoin the execution and delivery of the contract of purchase of the lands in question on the same theory which was adopted by the court below in this case, namely, that the failure of the county commissioners to appraise the improvements vitiated the sale. As a matter of fact, Hunt attended the sale, and was the purchaser, as shown by the memoranda of the sale; but he and defendant, Davies, being members of the same syndicate, Davies was, under the peculiar and loose methods of the King county commissioners, substituted for Hunt in the contract of purchase; hence the suit against Davies as purchaser. In the case cited, this court says, inter alia: 'If there has been no compliance with the statute by the appraisalment of his improvements, certainly no court would permit a purchaser, under those circumstances, to interfere with his possession of the land until he is compensated as the law requires. The same doctrine is announced in Pearson v. Ashley, 5 Wash. 169. Secondly, the purchaser is required to pay the appraised value to the owner of the improvements,—that is, he is the debtor to the owner to that amount, and must pay it within thirty days. He can be sued for the debt, and, if there has been no appraisalment, the court and a jury can fix the reasonable value as well as the commissioners.' Relying on this as an announcement from the highest authority, the plaintiff brought his suit. The superior court for King county reversed the decision of the supreme court, and dismissed his case. Having lost his right to an injunction by reason of the fact that he had a legal remedy, and having been denied a legal remedy because of his right to an injunction, he, although somewhat bewildered, confidently appeals to this court for an adjustment of his rights in the premises, and for a reversal of the decision of the court below." It will be seen from an examination of such brief that, while it cites our former decision as an authority, it nowhere suggests that it was made under such circumstances as to make it conclusive of the rights of the parties in this action. The only expression in the most remote degree justifying the contention on the part of the majority is in the statement that "the same controversy came before this court;" but, if counsel had intended to place any special reliance upon the decision by reason of the identity of the subject-matter and of the parties it would have been incumbent upon him to have at least shown by the title of the case that the present defendant was a party to that suit. It can only be gathered, from all that is said by appellant, that he relied upon said deci-ion for the reason that it had been announced by this court. But such reliance can only avail him in the event that the court still adheres to the decision as having been properly ruled. This the majority of the court expressly refuse to do. They, in effect, say that, if this question was presented in a case where the parties were different from those in which it was decided, we would not adhere to it, but would proceed to investigate further.

From the brief of respondent it clearly appears that the idea that the former decision was relied upon as "res adjudicata" in this case was never in the mind of the one who drew it. The case of Wilkes v. Hunt is cited, but there is nothing added to the citation to show that the parties were in any manner identical with those of the case at bar, or that the decision therein was relied upon as in any way concluding their rights. It was simply cited as a case in point, as any other case involving a like principle would have been. This not only appears from what has been already said, but it further appears from the fact that later in the brief the question of res adjudicata is expressly presented, and the claim made that, when the board of county commissioners decided that there were no improvements of value upon the land, their decision was conclusive as to plaintiff's right to recover therefor. What was said in the former case as to the right of plaintiff to recover the value of his improvements in an action at law was not an adjudication that could conclude the parties. That matter was not before the court. What the court was called upon to adjudicate in that case was as to whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction. There was nothing set up in the complaint, or anywhere in the proceedings, which could in any manner authorize an adjudication by the court as to any recovery for the value of said improvements. What was said in relation thereto was only the stating of a reason why the injunction should not be granted. Such reason may not have been a good one, and yet the decision entirely correct. If, for any other reason founded upon the record, the injunction was properly refused, then the decision was right, even although one or a dozen faulty reasons were given therefor. The court was not called upon to say what was the remedy of the plaintiff. The most, under any circumstances, it could properly adjudicate, was that he had a remedy, and it was not called upon to adjudicate that fact to warrant the decision made, if, regardless of the question of remedy, he was not entitled to the injunction. There is another reason why what was said in that case should not conclude the parties to this. There is nothing to show that the improvements referred to in the two cases are the same. In the first case it is alleged that the improvements are upon a certain forty-acre tract, and there is no direct averment that any portion thereof are upon the particular twenty acres of said tract to which the complaint in this action is confined.

For the foregoing reasons I do not think that what was said in that case should be given any conclusive force in this one. But, if all that was so said is given full force, the contention of appellant is not aided. It cannot be fairly deduced therefrom that the court intended to hold that the owner of improvements, without surrendering possession thereof to the purchaser at the sale, could maintain an action against him for the value of such improvements. The most that can be claimed is that it was there held that the plaintiff had one of two remedies,—he could remain in possession of his improvements until compensated therefor, or surrender the possession to the purchaser, and maintain his action for their value. I cannot believe that the court intended to hold that by making a bid for school land, and accepting a contract therefor, the purchaser becomes at once liable to one having improvements thereon for the value thereof, where there had been no appraisal by the board of county commissioners, and nothing placed of record to show, in any manner, that there are any improvements on the land. Such a construction would compel a purchaser of such lands to settle with the owner of the improvements upon whatever terms he should dictate, or be put to the expense of a lawsuit, in which he was sure to have the costs of both parties to pay. A brief consideration of the facts, as applied to such ruling, will show that such results must follow. If, at the time plaintiff brought his action in this case, the defendant was liable for the value of such improvements, he must have made himself so liable by making the bid, or in accepting the contract from the state, for no other acts of his are alleged which could in any manner tend to establish such liability. It will follow that one in possession of improvements would have a direct interest in not having them appraised by the board of county commissioners. If not so appraised, he can get the value thereof at the time the land is sold, as found by a jury of his neighbors, and can have the beneficial enjoyment thereof while he is prosecuting his action for such value, and while, after the recovery of his judgment therein, the purchaser is waging his action of ejectment to obtain possession of the improvements for which a judgment has been theretofore rendered against him. Not only will he have the right to do this, but during the time of his beneficial enjoyment of the improvements he may make such use thereof as to absolutely destroy their value to one who afterwards comes into possession of the land. When a construction will lead to such hardships to the purchaser and to the state, some other should be adopted, if possible. As to the construction of the statute, it seems to me there can be little difference of opinion. This court has already announced—that is undoubtedly the law—that the one in possession of such improvements had, at the date of the passage of the act, no vested right to compensation therefor. Therefore, the measure of his rights must be found in the statute, an investigation of which will show that it is only to have the improvements appraised by the board of county commissioners, and, when appraised, to have the purchaser pay to him the value thereof as so appraised. There is nowhere in the act an intimation that he shall have any right to recover, or anybody shall be in any manner liable to him for, the value of such improvements, excepting as so appraised. It must follow that, until there has been such an appraisal, there can be no foundation for his recovery of anything on account of such improvements. He can assert no rights to such improvements or their value, except in accordance with the provisions of the statute. The board of county commissioners will be presumed to have done their duty in that regard, unless the contrary appears, and as they are charged with that duty, and as he has no right to his improvements excepting such as grow out of their action in that regard, it is possible that he has no remedy, when they refuse to make an appraisal thereof, except an appeal to the board of state land commissioners. If he has any remedy aside from that, it can only be to have the board required to make such appraisal by proceedings in mandamus. The majority of the court having expressly refused to say what the rights of the parties would be under the statute, I have a right to assume that, if they did, they would decide as above suggested. It must follow that, in their opinion, what was said by this court by way of argument in deciding a case in equity, where the only object sought was to stay the hands of certain officers, and to which this defendant was only an incidental party, was sufficient to create a liability on the part of the defendant, and a right in the plaintiff to enforce such liability without any contract existing between them, and without any authority of law whatever. I cannot consent that such results shall be held to flow from what was said in the former case. In my opinion the judgment should be affirmed.

J. J. ADAMS

v.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF WINSTON,
Appt.

.....N. C.)

The deposit of a partner cannot be applied to an overdraft of the firm, although the bank, in an action by the partner, might set up such overdraft as a counterclaim.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the balance of a bank deposit, which the bank claimed a right to hold as a set-off to a claim against plaintiff on an overdraft by a partnership, of which he was a member. Affirmed.

Plaintiff's evidence tended to show that on the 21st day of March, 1892, the firm of J. J. Adams & Co., composed of himself and one J. A. Reid, dissolved co-partnership; that theretofore they had an account with the defendant bank, and plaintiff went to defendant bank before noon of the said day, and asked for the account in bank of J. J. Adams & Co., wishing to know the balance; that he was told by the bookkeeper of the bank that the balance due J. J. Adams & Co. was $201.08, which amount was there and then paid to him; that this sum was coming to witness as due him of the assets of J. J. Adams & Co.; that several days thereafter, about the 23d of March, the plaintiff deposited with the defendant bank the sum of $615 of his own money from the sale of his own individual property, and opened the account in his own name; that he checked on this sum various times in various amounts, and that on the 5th day of April, 1892, he made a check for balance due him, when he was told by the officer of the bank that his check was not good by $40; that this sum had been taken from his account, by order of the president of the bank, and paid on a draft drawn by J. J. Adams & Co.; that this balance, less the $40, was paid to plaintiff, plaintiff demanding the total amount, including the $40, which was refused. Plaintiff further testified that he did not know whether the check for $40 drawn in the name of J. J. Adams & Co. was in the bank at the time he asked for the balance due J. J. Adams & Co., on March 21st, or not; that no notice of the dissolution of the copartnership of J. J. Adams & Co. has been given by publication. James Martin, in behalf of the defendant, testified that he was a bookkeeper in the defendant bank, and on the 21st March,

NOTE.—Application by bank of individual partner's deposit on firm debt.

In addition to the case of Watts v. Christie, 11 Beav. 553, which is cited in the above case as authority for the decision that the deposit of one partner cannot be applied to an indebtedness of the firm, other cases without any conflict have decided the same proposition. Coates v. Preston, 105 Ill. 470; International Bank v. Jones, 119 Ill. 407, 59 Am. Rep. 807; Raymond v. Palmer, 41 La. Ann. 425, 2 Bg. L. J. 14; Ex parte McKenna, 30 L. J. Bankr. 20.

Although the partner is individually liable for the firm debt, the denial of the right of the bank to 23 L. R. A.

apply his deposit thereto involves something more than procedure. It may involve matters of substantial right in addition to those mentioned in the main case, especially if the depositor is insolvent. As is said in International Bank v. Jones, supra: "Notwithstanding he owed the duty to pay the firm debt, still, inasmuch as the bank could not set off the firm debt against his deposit, he could lawfully appropriate his deposit to a bona fide creditor by drawing a check in his favor." This well illustrates the importance of the decision as affecting the possible rights of third parties, as well as those of the bank and the depositor. B. A. R.

1892, the plaintiff asked him for balance of J. J. Adams & Co., which he told him was $201.08, and which plaintiff made check for, and drew the amount out of bank. That a check of J. J. Adams & Co. for $40, made by J. A. Reid, came into bank, I think, on that day. It might have been in the bank at the time I gave the balance of $201.08 to Mr. Adams. It was not entered on the books, but might have been on the file. I cannot say whether it was in bank at the time or not. I did not know it had been paid by the teller. If I had known so, I would have charged it in the account of J. J. Adams & Co. before giving the plaintiff the balance. J. A. Reid, a witness for defendant, testified that he was a member of the firm of J. J. Adams & Co.; that he drew the check for $40 on the firm account in bank to pay an individual debt due by him for rent; that the check was given several days before the 21st of March; that the firm agreed to dissolve on the 21st of March, but no final settlement of the copartnership had ever been made; that on the 21st of March they quit business, and Adams drew out all they had in bank.

The court instructed: "That if the check given by J. A. Reid was paid by the defendant after the payment to plaintiff of the balance of $201.08, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover; that if, as the defendant contended, the check for $40 was paid by the bank before the check for $201.08 was paid plaintiff, and the defendant gave the balance by mistake, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover,"—to which defendant excepted. Defendant further excepted because the court did not tell the jury that the defendant had a right to offset the $40 check as an overdraft of the firm against the individual account of J. J. Adams.

Messrs. Watson & Buxton for appellant.
Messrs. Glenn & Manly for appellee.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the overdraft of the firm of which plaintiff was a member was paid by the bank after the balance was drawn out, it not appearing that the bank had any notice of the dissolution, such overdraft could be recovered by the bank out of the plaintiff as a member of the firm. If, at the time the plaintiff drew a check for the balance which the cashier told him was due the firm, in fact there was less due the firm, it was equally an overdraft, by mutual mistake of the parties, and the bank could recover it back out of the plaintiff as a member of the firm. But the bank had no right to charge up against the individual account of a member of a partnership a balance due it on the firm's account. Such right of set-off only exists between the same parties, and in the same right. Morse, Banks, § 384. The bank has no lien on the deposit of a partner for a balance due from the partnership. Bolles, Banks, § 885. The reason is thus given by Lord Langdale, master of the rolls, in Watts v. Christie, 11 Beav. 555: "It is of the nature and essence of transactions between banker and customer that a customer, having a balance in the hands of his banker, should have full power over it, and be able to command payment at sight. If, where there is an account between a firm and the bank, and another account with one particular member of the firm, it be once held that the bank has a lien upon the balance due upon the separate account of the individual partner for a balance due to the bank from the firm, there would be an end to some transactions which it is most important to commerce should be continued." Inasmuch as the member of the partnership can draw in the name of the firm, if their overdrafts can instantly be charged up against the individual account of a member of the firm, no partner would be safe in keeping his private account in the same bank where the partnership account is kept. Otherwise, his private funds, deposited perhaps for special engagements he may have in view, would be liable at any time to be swept away by checks drawn by another for his own personal ends, but in the name of the firm, and the partner's checks on his private account would go to protest, to his damage and inconvenience. Then, too, in case of insolvency and an assignment by the partner or of the partnership, his available cash could be subject to appropriation by the bank in this shorthand mode to his partnership liability, notwithstanding his or the firm's election in the deed of assignment to prefer another, or to share the assets pro rata; and this, also, would deprive the individual partner, having a sum to his credit, using it as his personal property exemption as against the indebtedness of the partnership to the bank. It is true, in the present case, the plaintiff being liable to the bank for the overdraft of the firm, the bank could sue him therefor, and hence, of course could have pleaded it as a counterclaim, instead of bringing an independent action. But the bank did not plead a counterclaim. It claimed the right to charge up against the individual account of the plaintiff the overdraft of the firm, and hence pleaded the general issue that it was not indebted. This it cannot do. The difference between a counterclaim and a payment is not merely technical, but substantial. Some of the differences are pointed out above. There are others, among them the cases in which the statute of limitations might be pleaded to the counterclaim. In the present case it is still open to the bank, as it did not plead the counterclaim, to bring an action against the plaintiff for the balance due by the firm. It is not yet barred by the statute of limitations, and, if the plaintiff has property in excess of his exemptions, the bank has lost nothing except the bill of cost in this case.

While not concurring altogether in the reasons of his honor, we reach the same conclusion, and declare the judgment affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

RE MUNICIPAL SUFFRAGE TO WOMEN.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A statute providing that it shall take effect upon its acceptance by a majority vote of the people of the state cannot be upheld under the Constitution of Massachusetts, which makes the senate and house of representatives the legislative department of the government, and does not reserve to the people any direct power of supervision.
2. A statute allowing women to vote in town and city elections cannot be made to take effect in any city or town upon its acceptance by a majority vote of the voters of such city or town, since it is a matter of general and not local concern, to which the principle of local option cannot properly apply.

*(Holmes and Barker, JJ., dissent from proposition 1.)(Holmes, Barker and Knowlton, JJ., dissent from proposition 2.)NOTE.—Power of the legislature to make a statute contingent on approval by vote of the people.

The above case presents both sides of a constitutional question of very great importance. The right of the legislature to refer to the people themselves the question of giving effect to a proposed statute is one that has been denied in a considerable number of cases in which the question was not fairly involved, as well as in a very few cases in which it was involved. Nearly all the cases in which this power is denied have been founded on the Pennsylvania case of Parker v. Com., 6 Pa. 507, 47 Am. Dec. 480, and the Delaware case of Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr. (Del.) 492, which, although decided on the broad ground that the legislature cannot refer a statute to the people, were in fact local option cases and have been, on the express question involved in them, very generally repudiated by later cases, the Pennsylvania case being expressly overruled. But in the New York case of Barto v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 453, declaring the same doctrine, these cases were not referred to, although they must have been considered as they had been discussed in earlier cases decided by the general term of the supreme court.

This New York case was one in which an act establishing free schools throughout the state, passed March 23, 1849, and providing that the electors shall determine by ballot at the next annual election, "whether this act shall or shall not become a law," was held by the court of appeals to be unconstitutional, on the ground that it attempted to make a delegation of legislative power to the people.

This case overruled Johnson v. Rich, 9 Barb. 680, in which the act had been held constitutional by the supreme court, while the other supreme court cases of Thorne v. Cramer, 15 Barb. 112, and Bradley v. Baxter, 15 Barb. 122, in other judicial departments of the state, had held the act unconstitutional. Thorne v. Cramer relied largely on Parker v. Com., 6 Pa. 507, 47 Am. Dec. 480, and Bradley v. Baxter relied on the Pennsylvania case and also on Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr. (Del.) 479.

In Santo v. State, 2 Iowa, 165, 63 Am. Dec. 497, followed by State v. Beneke, 9 Iowa, 208, the submission to a vote of the people of the state of the provisions of a statute was held unconstitutional, but as the submission declared that in the event of a majority of votes in its favor "then this act shall ADVISORY OPINIONS in reply to an order of the House of Representatives submitting to the Supreme Judicial Court the following questions:

"(1) Is it constitutional, in an act granting to women the right to vote in town and city elections, to provide that such act shall take effect throughout the commonwealth upon its acceptance by a majority vote of the voters of the whole commonwealth? (2) Is it constitutional to provide in such an act that it shall take effect in a city or town upon its acceptance by a majority vote of the voters of such city or town? (8) Is it constitutional, in an act granting to women the right to vote in town and city elections, to provide that such an act shall take effect throughout the commonwealth upon its acceptance by a majority vote of the voters of the whole commonwealth, including women specially authorized to register and to vote on this question alone?"

take effect" "on" a day named, without any negative clause, the act was held to have been enacted by the legislature itself, and the proposed submission to the people was inoperative.

In State v. Hayes, 61 N. H. 284, the power of the legislature to refer to the people of the state the adoption or ratification of a statute as to corporate elections is denied on a very elaborate review of the authorities on the question.

In addition to these decisions there are some other local option cases and some dicta to the same effect.

Thus in Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 17 Am. Rep. 425, the general doctrine is declared that the "power to make laws conferred on the legislature cannot be delegated by the legislature to the people of the state, or to any portion of the people." But the case was one as to local option, which was held unconstitutional and in this respect the case is in conflict with a large majority of modern decisions on the subject.

So in Geebrick v. State, 5 Iowa, 491, local option in the form of a vote to repeal a statute as to the sale of liquors, so far as it applied to the county in which the vote was taken, was held unconstitutional and seems to have been regarded as governed by the principle decided in Santo v. State, supra.

So in State v. Weir, 33 Iowa, 134, 11 Am. Rep. 115, local option was held unconstitutional, either as to the adoption or repeal of a statute.

Another case which held that local option was unconstitutional was that of Maize v. State, 4 Ind. 342, in which the court seemed to think that the same unconstitutionality would inhere in a statute referring the question to the people of the whole state.

To the same effect is State v. Swisher, 17 Tex. 441. In Johnson v. Martin, 75 Tex. 38, the court said: "It might not be allowed to submit a general law to the state at large," but the decision upheld a statute allowing commissioners in their discretion to call a local election to choose public weighers.

In People v. Stout, 28 Barb. 849, a law amending the charter of the state of New York was held unconstitutional, where it attempted to make its adoption depend on a vote of the electors of the city and county. This decision is based on Barto v. Himrod, but it does not seem possible to reconcile it with the numerous decisions in which the

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

In reply to your order of the 2d inst., a copy of which is annexed, we, the undersigned, four of the justices of the supreme judicial court, respectfully submit the following opinion:

The questions all impliedly assume that the legislature can constitutionally pass an act granting to women the right to vote in town and city elections, and we proceed to answer the questions on this assumption.

The constitution of Massachusetts was framed after much public discussion, and after nine of the original thirteen states had established constitutions. The opinions of some of the men engaged in framing these constitutions are well known. John Adams took a principal part in framing the constitution of Massachusetts, and his opinions upon government, both before and after its adoption, are found in his published works. The characteristic feature of all these constitutions is that they establish a government by representatives of the people, and not a government directly by the people. This was the kind of government to which the people were accustomed. All hereditary offices having been abolished, so far as they ever existed in any of the colonies, and appointments to office by the British crown having ceased at the time of the Revolution, the chief executive officers and the members of both branches of the legislature, where there were two branches, were to be elected by the adoption of municipal charters by vote of the people of the respective municipalities has been upheld.

In Bradshaw v. Lankford, 11 L. R. A. 533, 73 Md. 423, it is said to be "a well-settled principle of constitutional law that the power thus delegated (to the legislature) cannot be redelegated to the people themselves," but the case really decided was one as to the submission to the voters of a county of the question of taking oysters by scoop or dredge, and this was held to be unlawful because the oyster beds do not belong to the county but to the state.

In State v. Wilcox, 45 Mo. 456, it is said that undoubtedly the legislature cannot refer the passage of a law to their constituents, but that they may pass a law to take effect on an emergency. The point actually decided in the case was that a statute might authorize the vote of a city to organize for school purposes.

Similar expressions have been used in other cases which really decided nothing on the question.

In State v. Copeland, 3 R. I. 83, the decision was merely that a vote against the repeal of a statute was not effectual for any purpose, where it was taken under a statute submitting the question of repeal to the people. As to what effect a vote in favor of repeal would have there was no decision.

In People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 343, the court was equally divided as to the constitutionality of a statute to take effect on a vote of the people in its favor.

It was said by Green, Ch. J., in that case that the principle was recognised by the constitutional convention of 1850, which expressly required the submission to the people of a banking law.

In State v. Young, 29 Minn. 474, a statute providing that no tax for the payment of certain bonds should be made without a vote of the people was held void on the ground that it impaired the obligation of the contract with the bondholders, and also that certain provisions constituted an unlawful delegation of legislative power to judges, but there was no decision as to the constitutionality of the delegation of power to the people.

On the other side of the question there are also some decisions and dicta.

In State v. Parker, 26 Vt. 367, the submission to the people of the state of the question whether a statute should go into effect at the time named by the legislature or at a later date, which was in this case in the same year, was held constitutional, and the opinion by Redfield, Ch. J., is clearly in favor of the constitutionality of submitting a statute to the people for their approval.

So in Smith v. Janesville, 26 Wis. 291, it is held to be constitutional to submit to the vote of the whole state the question of whether or not the statute should take effect.

In Bull v. Read, 13 Gratt. 78, although the question decided, was the validity of a statute allowing a vote as to the organization of a school district, the opinion argues in favor of the validity of laws to take effect on such contingencies.

So the supreme court of Georgia in Caldwell v. Barrett, 73 Ga. 604, although the case was one of local option, expressed the opinion "that when the wishes of the people as to whether a proposed act should become a law can be clearly ascertained by an election, this mode would be consonant with the genius and form of our government."

It will be seen from the above cases that the judicial opinion in this country has been divided in about the same ratio that is shown in the opinions of the justices of Massachusetts in the above case. But since the early cases started out with the denial of the right of the legislature to pass local option laws, which are now almost everywhere held valid, and these local option cases have been largely relied on as authority for the general doctrine that the legislature cannot refer to a vote of the people the question of the approval of a law, these general expressions, found by way of recital in various cases, cannot be regarded as of very great weight. Excluding these "the tendency of judicial decision," which seems to Mr. Justice Holmes to be against his own in the above case, is not very strongly against him. And when the question of authority is narrowed down to those cases in which the reference of a law to the people of the whole state is involved, the weight of authority is not very unequally divided. In the language of Judge Cooley: "If it is not unconstitutional to delegate to a single locality the power to decide whether it will be governed by a particular charter, must it not quite as clearly be within the power of the legislature to refer to the people at large, from whom the power is derived, the decision upon any proposed statute affecting the whole state?" Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 120. And, as he further inquires: "Can that be called a delegation of power which consists only in the agent or trustee referring back to the principal the final decision in a case where the principal is the party concerned?" Ibid.

While the eminent author considers the weight of authority up to the time of his writing to be against him, he declares that the decision in Smith v. Janesville, supra, appears entirely sound and reasonable. The question is therefore entirely unsettled, with the weight of authority somewhat against the delegation or reference to the people, but with almost equal authority on the other side.

For note on the subject of the right of women to vote, see Coffin v. Thompson (Mich.) 21 L. R. A. 662.

people. But the model adopted was in other respects the English form of government. While a purely democratic form of government existed in the towns of New England, few if any persons seem to have been in favor of such a form of government for the state.

By the constitution of Massachusetts, as originally adopted, not only were the powers of the representatives of the people limited, but the powers of the people themselves were limited. The people limited their right to vote by requiring for the electors of state officers certain qualifications, among which was a low property qualification. They required in the persons to be voted for, higher qualifications. They provided that the judges should be appointed by the governor and council, and should hold their offices during good behavior, subject to removal only by impeachment or by address. They provided that "the department of legislation shall be formed by two branches, senate and house of representatives; each of which shall have a negative on the other." Part 2, chap. 1, § 1, art. 1. They gave to the governor a qualified veto over the acts of the legislature. They provided for annual elections, and they declared that "the people of this commonwealth are not controllable by any other laws than those to which their constitutional representative body have given their consent" (part 1, art. 10); that "the people have a right, in an orderly and peaceable manner, to assemble to consult upon the common good; give instructions to their representatives, and to request of the legislative body, by the way of addresses, petitions, or remonstrances, redress of the wrongs done them, and of the grievances they suffer" (Id. art. 19); and that "the legislature ought frequently to assemble for the redress of grievances," etc. (Id. art. 23). But there is nothing in any part of the constitution which tends to show that the people desired that any law should ever be submitted to them for approval or rejection. The only expression of this kind relates to the manner of collecting the sentiments of the people in the year 1795, "on the necessity or expediency of revising the constitution, in order to amendments," found in part 2, chap. 6, art. 10. They indeed declared that "all power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them" (part 1, art. 5); but they provided for no appeal to themselves from any legislative, executive, or judicial act. They apparently relied upon frequent elections, when the officers were elective; upon the right of meeting and consulting upon the common good; upon the right to petition and of instructing their representatives; upon impeachment; and upon the right of reforming, altering, and totally changing the form of government, when the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people required it. Part 1, art. 7. Apparently, it was thought that the persons selected for the executive, legislative, and judicial offices, in the manner prescribed in the constitution, would be men of good character and intelligence, of some experience in affairs, and of some independence of judgment, and would have a better opportunity of obtaining information, taking part in discussion, and carefully considering conflicting opinions, than the people themselves; and the people therefore put the responsibility of carrying on the government upon their representatives. In the legislative department they were particularly careful. They declared for the "freedom of deliberation, speech, and debate, in either house of the legislature" (part 1, art. 21), and they secured deliberation in legislation by establishing two branches of the legislature, and by requiring a submission of every legislative act to the governor; but they reserved to themselves no direct power of supervision.

The constitutions of the different states resemble each other in many of their principal provisions, and it generally has been held, whenever the subject has come before the courts, that legislative power cannot be delegated by the legislature to any other body or authority, and that the people themselves have not retained this power, except where they have expressly provided for it. It is true that a general law can be passed by the legislature, to take effect upon the happening of a subsequent event. Whether this subsequent event can be the adoption of the law by a vote of the people has occasioned some differences of opinion, but the weight of authority is that a general law cannot be made to take effect in this manner. Whether such legislation is submitted to the people as a proposal for a law, to be voted upon by them, and to become a law if they approve it, or, as a law, to take effect if they vote to approve it, the substance of the transaction is that the legislative department declines to take the responsibility of passing the law; but the law has force, if at all, in consequence of the votes of the people. They, ultimately, are the legislators. It seems to us that by the constitution the senate and the house of representatives have been made the legislative department of the government, and that there has not been reserved to the people any direct part in legislation. The various amendments made to the constitution since its adoption have not changed its character in this respect. By article 2 and article 9 of the Amendments, an act constituting a town or towns a city government can be passed only with the consent of the inhabitants of such town or towns; and specific amendments to the constitution, proposed by the general court, must be submitted to the qualified voters of the commonwealth. A city charter resembles a state constitution in this: that the government of the town is made by the charter a representative government; and it was originally declared that the people alone have a right to institute government, and to change it. Part 1, art. 7. These amendments, as well as the other amendments, to the constitution, indicate no intention of having laws submitted to the people for adoption or rejection.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the first question should be answered in the negative.

The second question requires additional consideration. There have been laws, from the earliest times, which delegated legislative powers to the inhabitants of towns, or permitted legislative powers to be exercised by such inhabitants over subjects which were declared proper for municipal control. Laws conferring additional powers on towns or cities have been passed, and made to take effect in any town or city upon acceptance by the qualified voters of the town or city, or of the city council. Some examples are found in Pub. Stat. chap. 27, §§ 13, 27, 65, 74. Special laws have been passed, conferring special powers on particular towns or cities, and general laws have been passed which relate to towns and cities having a certain population; and the consent of the inhabitants of a city or town, sometimes, has been required, before certain special powers can be used. See Pub. Stat. chap. 44, §§ 2, 7; Id. chap. 54, § 18; Stat. 1887, chap. 411, § 92; Stat. 1891, chap. 870. These statutes, in general, relate to local affairs, or to what has been called "police regulations." In Stone v. Charlestown, 114 Mass. 214, it was decided that a statute was constitutional which united two municipalities, and provided that the act should not take effect unless accepted by the voters of the respective municipalities. It was said: "Amid all the diversity of opinion upon the much-vexed question how far statutes may be made contingent upon being accepted by popular vote, without violating the principle that legislative power cannot be delegated, there is a complete harmony of adjudication in favor of the authority of the legislature, unless controlled by a special constitutional provision upon the subject, to submit statutes dividing or uniting counties or towns, or establishing or enlarging a city, to a vote of the inhabitants of the territory immediately affected." There has been some conflict of authority upon the constitutionality of what are called "local option laws," which have been principally laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, but they have been held to be constitutional by a majority of the courts which have considered them. They have been held to be constitutional in this commonwealth. Com. v. Bennett, 108 Mass. 27, 11 Am. Rep. 804. In that case it is said: "It has been argued in other cases, which have been brought before the court since the argument of the present case, that these statutes are unconstitutional because they delegate to cities and towns a part of the legislative power. But we can see no ground for such a position. Many successive statutes of the commonwealth have made the lawfulness of sales of intoxicating liquors to depend upon licenses from the selectmen of towns or commissioners of counties, and such statutes have been held to be constitutional. 7 Dane, Abr. 43, 44; Com. v. Blackington, 24 Pick. 352.

"It is equally within the power of the legislature to authorize a town, by vote of the inhabitants, or a city, by vote of the city council, to determine whether the sale of particular kinds of liquors within its limits shall be permitted or prohibited. This subject, although not embraced within the ordinary power to make by-laws and ordinances, falls within the class of police regulations, which may be intrusted by the legislature, by express enactment, to municipal authority." Certainly, it is a difficult question to determine how far the principle of local option can be carried, and to what subjects it can be applied. An act granting to women the right to vote in town and city elections does not relate to the powers of towns and cities, which in some respects may well be different in different towns and cities, on account of the number, wealth, and pursuits of the inhabitants. Such an act relates solely to the persons who should be invested with a share of political power. Whether women should be permitted to vote in town and city elections seems to us a matter of general, and not of local, concern. There is nothing in the history of Massachusetts which tends to show that the right to vote in towns and cities on town and city affairs has ever been regarded as a matter of police regulation, or of merely local interest, or as a right which might be granted or withheld by a licensing board. It always has been determined by the legislature by a general law, in force uniformly throughout the commonwealth. Article 9 of the Declaration of Rights declares that "all elections ought to be free; and all the inhabitants of this commonwealth, having such qualifications as they shall establish by their frame of government, have an equal right to elect officers, and to be elected, for public employments." This, in terms, is confined to elections in which the qualifications of the electors and of the persons to be elected are established by the frame of government; but the principle declared, up to the present time, always has been adopted by the legislature, in passing laws relating to the right to vote in the election of town and city officers. The qualified voters in towns in this commonwealth, and their representatives in cities, are possessed of a large measure of political power. They have the taxing power for all municipal purposes, and it is well known that the amount of the city or town tax of any person usually exceeds that of his state and county tax. The tax is imposed on all the inhabitants in the town or city liable to be taxed, and on all the real property situated within the town or city, whether owned by residents or nonresidents. The power of taxation is one of the essential and fundamental powers of government. It certainly would constitute an anomaly heretofore never known in this commonwealth, if, in some cities and towns, women were permitted to vote on questions which concern taxation, and in other cities and towns were not permitted. The question, we think, comes to this: Whether the legislature, constitutionally, can delegate to the qualified voters of the inhabitants of a city or town the power of granting or refusing to grant to women who are inhabitants the right to vote in city and town affairs. We are not aware that, in any of the states where statutes have been passed conferring suffrage or municipal suffrage upon women, the principle of local option has been adopted in such statutes. The language of the constitution, from which the legislature derives the power of prescribing the qualifications of the electors of town and city officers, was taken from the province charter; and it is, in effect, that the general court shall have full power and authority to make all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, not repugnant to the constitution, which they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth, and "to name and settle annually, or provide by fixed laws, for the naming and settling all civil officers within the said commonwealth, the election and constitution of whom are not hereafter in this form of government otherwise provided for." Considering the nature of the power intended to be conferred, the history of legislation on the subject from the earliest times, and the language of the constitution, we are of opinion that, if a law is to be enacted such as the question contemplates, it must operate uniformly throughout the commonwealth, and that the second question should be answered in the negative.

For the reasons hereinbefore given, without considering others which might be suggested, the third question should be answered in the negative.

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In reply to your order, I respectfully submit the following answer:

If the questions proposed to the justices came before us as a court, and I found myself unable to agree with my brethren, I should defer to their opinion, without any intimation of dissent. But the understanding always has been that questions like the present are addressed to us as individuals, and require an individual answer.

It is assumed in the questions that the legislature has power to grant women the right to vote in town and city elections. I see no reason to doubt that it has that power.

1. I admit that the constitution establishes a representative government, not a pure democracy. It establishes a general court, which is to be the law-making power. But the question is whether it puts a limit upon the power of that body to make laws. In my opinion, the legislature has the whole law-making power, except so far as the words of the constitution, expressly or impliedly, withhold it; and I think that, in construing the constitution, we should remember that it is a frame of government for men of opposite opinions, and for the future, and therefore not hastily impart into it our own views, or unexpressed limitations derived merely from the practice of the past. I ask myself, as the only question, what words express or imply that a power to pass a law subject to rejection by the people is withheld? I find none which do so. The question is not whether the people of their own motion could pass a law without any act of the legislature. That, no doubt, whether valid or not, would be outside the constitution. So, perhaps, might be a statute purporting to confer the power of making laws upon them. But the question, put in a form to raise the fewest technical objections, is whether an act of the legislature is made unconstitutional by a proviso that, if rejected by the people, it shall not go into effect. If it does go into effect, it does so by the express enactment of the representative body. I see no evidence in the instrument that this question ever occurred to the framers of the constitution. It is but a short step further to say that the constitution does not forbid such a law. I agree that the discretion of the legislature is intended to be exercised. I agree that confidence is put in it as an agent. But I think that so much confidence is put in it that it is allowed to exercise its discretion by taking the opinion of its principal, if it thinks that course to be wise. It has been asked whether the legislature could pass an act subject to the approval of a single man. I am not clear that it could not. The objection, if sound, would seem to have equal force against all forms of local option. But I will consider the question when it arises. The difference is plain between that case and one where the approval required is that of the sovereign body. The contrary view seems to me an echo of Hobbes' theory that the surrender of sovereignty by the people was final. I notice that the case from which most of the reasoning against the power of the legislature has been taken by later decisions states that theory in language which almost is borrowed from the Leviathan. Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr. (Del.) 479, 488. Hobbes urged his motion in the interest of the absolute power of King Charles I., and one of the objects of the constitution of Massachusetts was to deny it. I answer the first question, "Yes." I may add that, while the tendency of judicial decision seems to be in the other direction, such able judges as Chief Justice Parker, of Massachusetts, Dixon, of Wisconsin, Redfield, of Vermont, and Cooley, of Michigan, have expressed opinions like mine.

2. If the foregoing view of the power of the legislature is right, I am of opinion that the second question also should be answered, "Yes." I find nothing which forbids the legislature to establish a local option upon this point, any more than with regard to the liquor laws. Under the circumstances, I do not argue this or the following question at length.

3. The act suggested by the third question is open to the seeming objection that it might take a part of their power out of the hands of the present possessors, without their assent, except as given by their representatives. But if, as I believe, the legislature could give to women the right to vote, if they accepted it by a preliminary vote, and could impose as a second condition that the grant should not be rejected by the voters of the commonwealth, I do not see why it might not combine the two conditions into one, although, as a result, the grant might become a law against the will of a majority of the male voters. I answer this question, also, "Yes."

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.
To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I have carefully considered the questions submitted to the justices of the supreme judicial court by the honorable house of representatives on February 2, 1894, and am of opinion that the first and third should be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

In adopting the constitution, the people of the commonwealth established a representative government, consisting of three departments,—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. In these all the power originally residing in the people was vested, and through them all the functions of the government are to be performed. The framers of the constitution did not seek to establish a pure democracy, but they preferred a system in which all power should be vested in officers chosen by the people. The execution of the laws is intrusted to the governor and his associates in his department; the enactment of laws, to the legislature, subject, qualifiedly, to the approval of the governor; and the interpretation of the laws, to the justices appointed for that purpose. The members of each of these departments of the government are charged with the duty of doing that which belongs to their department. They cannot delegate their official power to others. The governor is not a mere agent of the people, who can refuse to assume the responsibility of action in matters within his department, and put upon the electors, as his principals, the duty of deciding for him whether his actions shall be of one kind or another. He is for the time the repository of all the power of the people in those matters which belong to his office. He must do his official duty, and there is no way in which he can shift the burden of the executive business from his shoulders to those of the people of the commonwealth. If an application for the pardon of a criminal is made to him, he cannot relieve himself of responsibility by entering an order that the pardon shall be granted if the people of the state, at a meeting called for the purpose, vote in favor of it. A judge, who, under the constitution, derives all his power from the people, cannot refer back to the people the cases which he is called upon to decide. He cannot enter a decree that this case shall be decided for the plaintiff, or this law shall be declared unconstitutional, if a majority of the people so decide upon the submission of the question to them at their next election. The sole power to grant pardons is in the governor, and the sole power to decide judicial controversies is in the judges. By the bestowal of this power in the adoption of their constitution, the people were divested of that which was bestowed; and it can be restored to them by nobody, so long as the constitution remains unchanged. Nor was it any more contemplated by the framers of the constitution that the department of the government which is charged with the duty of enacting laws should fail to do its whole duty, and should merely propose to the people laws which shall or shall not take effect as the people vote. The legislature is the law-making body. The people's representatives, acting together after due deliberation, are to complete the work of making such laws as seem to them good. The people deliberately put away from themselves, into the hands of this body, all authority touching this subject; and, until there is a change of the constitution, neither they nor the legislature can put it, or any part of it, back. Their supreme power may find full exercise from time to time in choosing those who represent them, and in amending the constitution or adopting a new one. Under our frame of government, to call in the people to vote directly upon the enactment of a law is, in my opinion, as much an attempt to delegate legislative power as the submission of such a question to any other tribunal. The reasons which induced our forefathers to adopt such a system might be considered at great length, but we are not now so much concerned with the reasons for their action, as with the nature and effect of it. The important fact is that their scheme of government was intended to cover the whole field, and it leaves no place for the people in the enactment of laws, except as they speak through their representatives. In the interpretation of similar constitutions in other states, there is a great weight of judicial authority in favor of this view. Decisions in accordance with it have been made by the courts of last resort in New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, California, and Texas.

This is the rule in regard to what is strictly legislation,—that is to say, the enactment of general laws for the people of a state,—but it is very generally held that a legislature may submit to the voters of towns and cities questions which are local in their nature, or which have in them a local element, such as make it proper that they should be dealt with differently in different places. This rule prevails in Massachusetts. A familiar example of the application of it is the so-called "local option" provision of our law in regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors. In Massachusetts, from the earliest times, the towns have been, in a great degree, intrusted with the management of their own affairs. For a time after the separation from England, previously to the adoption of our constitution, they would seem to have been independent democracies. Since that time they have been allowed large liberty in the transaction of their business. The systems which the legislature has provided for them have been elastic, so that they might be adapted to the different wants of the people of different municipalities. Towns are allowed to adopt by-laws on a great variety of subjects. Pub. Stat. chap. 27, §§ 15-23. To a large degree, cities and towns may determine for themselves the machinery, as well as the methods, by which they will manage their affairs. Within certain limits towns may determine the number of their selectment, of their assessors, and their school committee, and the length of their respective terms of office. Id. chap. 27, §§ 64, 65; Id. chap. 44, § 21. They may determine whether they will elect road commissioners (Id. chap. 27, § 74); whether they will establish fire districts (Id. § 87); and whether they will adopt the Australian method of voting in town elections (Stat. 1890, chap. 886). These are only a few of the matters which are left to their option. Statutes are passed nearly every year to take effect only in such cities or towns as choose to act under them. Stat. 1871, chap. 882; 1873, chap. 95; 1867, chap. 247; 1882, chaps. 154, 255; 1883, chap. 203; 1886, chap. 295; 1888, chaps. 304, 481; 1890, chaps. 264, 319; 1891, chap. 870. The doctrine on which these statutes are founded is not that the legislature may delegate legislative authority,—that is, authority to enact laws for all the people of the commonwealth,—but that it may submit to the voters of a city or town the right to vote on any question which may affect their interests differently from the interests of those in other parts of the commonwealth. In doing this, the legislature recognizes the principle of local self-government, which has always been a distinctive feature of our New England system.

Voting, in city and town elections, is simply a part of the management of the city's or town's business. It can in no way affect the state at large. The legislature may give cities and towns as large liberty as it chooses in regard to any question which is local. If the education, or experience in business, or wealth, of women, as compared with that of men, or the relative number of women and men, differs materially in different municipalities, so as to make the considerations properly to be regarded in favor of allowing women to vote in town elections much stronger in one town than in another, the legislature may leave to the voters of the town the question whether they will extend municipal suffrage to women. I think the legislature may find great differences in different parts of the commonwealth in regard to the desirability of the proposed change, and that the question to be considered is, in part at least, a local one. May there not be seaport towns where there are many widows of men lost at sea, and wives of seamen who, by reason of their occupation, are unable to be present at town meetings, and who are accustomed to be represented by their wives in the management of their business, and where a large part of the taxable property could not be represented at town meetings, except by women? And may there not be other cities or towns in the commonwealth where the relative number of men and women, and their respective occupations, and their connections with the management of property, would be very different, and where the legitimate arguments which could be adduced in favor of municipal suffrage for women would not be the same? If citizens of Boston should petition for an amendment of the charter of that city, giving women the right to vote at city elections, it would seem that the legislature might enact such an amendment to be adopted by the city or not, as the voters should determine. I think that a town may as well be permitted to decide whether, in conducting its government, it will invite women to the polls, as whether it will adopt the Australian ballot, or whether it will act alone instead of being merged in another city or town by annexation. It seems to me that the legislature has constitutional authority to pass a law allowing women to vote at city and town elections in such cities and towns as shall determine in favor of giving them the ballot.

Marcus P. Knowlton.

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In compliance with your order of February 2, 1894, I herewith respectfully submit my opinion upon the questions of law therein stated:

I assume that an act granting to women the right to vote in town and city elections is constitutional. I see no reason why such an act may not properly be made to take effect in particular towns and cities only, as well as in all. The right of the general court to grant to the inhabitants of a particular place powers and privileges necessary or expedient for its regulation or government is plain and unquestioned. I find nothing in the constitution to require uniformity throughout the commonwealth in the selection of the inhabitants to whom the local government of a town or city shall be committed. In my opinion, under our constitution, the general court may provide that any act of the legislature shall take effect upon acceptance by some body of voters designated in the act. This practice has been not infrequent here, from an early date, both in local statutes and statutes concerning corporations, and has been held constitutional by decisions of the supreme judicial court. See Wales v. Belcher, 8 Pick. 508, 510; Stone v. Charlestown, 114 Mass. 214, 221. It is true that the act under consideration in Wales v. Belcher may find special justification under the provisions of article 2 of the articles of amendment; but the act dealt with in Stone v. Charlestown, though local, was not within the letter of that amendment, and in both of those decisions the judgment of the court was put on broad grounds. In the former, Chief Justice Parker said: "Why may not the legislature make the existence of any act depend upon the happening of any future event?" And in the latter Chief Justice Gray held that the legislature did not in any sense delegate its constitutional authority, in passing the act in that form. In respect to this question, I am unable to see any sound distinction between general and local acts. If the power resides in the legislature at all, it may be exercised in its discretion. The provision of the Constitution, in part 1, art. 10, that "the people of this commonwealth are not controllable by any other laws than those to which their constitutional representative body have given their consent," impliedly sanctions the power. The constitutional representative body "give their consent" to every such law in the most formal manner. Nor is it, to my mind, an objection to the validity of a law so framed that the body whose further assent is required is composed in part of inhabitants other than qualified voters. In case of acts of incorporation the members of the voting body need not be even inhabitants, and yet without their assent the act is not law, and with their assent it is law. For the reasons stated, I am of opinion that each of the three questions set forth in the order should be answered in the affirmative.

In the absence of all circumstances tending to show the contrary, the inference is that the act being for the debtor's benefit was done with his consent, or if without his knowledge at the time that it was ratified by him afterwards, and such a payment would bar any subsequent action by the creditor. Leavitt v. Morrow, supra.

Such payment extinguishes the debt and all rights under the judgment and execution. Wilson v. Brown, supra.

The acceptance is not only an extinguishment of the debt but creates an estoppel. Leavitt v. Morrow. Pelton v. Knapp, Kimball v. Noyes, and Putney v. Farnham, supra.

An obligation may be discharged by a third person in no way concerned in it, provided he act in the name and for the discharge of the debtor, or that if he act in his own name he be not subrogated to the creditor's rights under article 2130 of the Louisiana Civ. Code (old). State v. Pillsbury, 29 La. Ann. 787.

The money must be accepted in payment. Martin v. Quinn, 37 Cal. 55; Leavitt v. Morrow, 6 Ohio St. 71, 67 Am. Dec. 334.

The payment must be made in full. Swann v. Patterson, 7 Md. 164.

As between the person who paid it and him for whose benefit it was intended, a question might arise whether it were purely voluntary or not, which would depend on the circumstances of previous requests or of subsequent assent, either expressed or implied. Harrison v. Hicks, 1 Port. (Ala.) 423, 27 Am. Dec. 638.

It is for the party alleging extinguishment of payment of a debt, to prove the same. Gernon v. McCan, 23 La. Ann. 84.

In Dusenbury v. Callaghan, 8 Hun, 541, the money was paid by the stranger for his specific purpose and not with an intention of relieving the defendant from any liability. The court held that in order to make such payment effectual, it must be made by the third party as agent for and on account of the debtor, and with the prior authority of subsequent ratification.

Where payment by a third party, by delivery of property, was pleaded in defense between the

that is, that if the debtor do not ratify such payment the debt may be enforced in his favor, as its equitable assignee, or, if so ratified, that he be decreed repayment of the amount paid for the use of the debtor.

4. The stranger, when he pays the debt of another, may take an assignment of it from the creditor, and enforce the debt against the debtor; and if, when he pays, the creditor agrees to assign him the debt, though no assignment in writing be made, the stranger will be, in equity, regarded as the equitable assignee of the debt, and the transaction will be regarded equivalent to a purchase of the debt.

debtor and creditor, the creditor denying the same and alleging his own personal independent purchase of the property, the court held that the jury should be instructed that if they found from the evidence an implied agreement to that effect, a verdict for defendant was correct. Griffin v. Petty, 101 N. C. 380.

A debt may be paid or extinguished by a third person becoming responsible to the creditor with the concurrence of the debtor. Logan v. Williamson, 3 Ark. 216, following Tatlock v. Harris, 3 T. R. 180; Wilson v. Coupland, 5 Barn. & Ald. 228.

A third party delivering chattels in satisfaction of a debt, after inducing the creditor to accept them in payment, is estopped from alleging the voidability of the contract and claiming the price of such goods, such delivery working a satisfaction of the debt. Fowler v. Moller, 10 Bosw. 374.

The payment of a note by anticipation extinguishes a mortgage securing it, being an accessory to the contract. Hoyle v. Cazabat, 25 La. Ann. 438.

After such a payment, a purchaser at an execution sale acquires no title to the property sold. Terry v. O'Neal, 71 Tex. 592.

Under article 2131 of the Louisiana Code a third party may put the obligee in default by offering to perform for the debtor even without the latter's knowledge, if it be shown that it was for his advantage, and not merely for the purpose of changing the creditor. State v. Pillsbury, 20 La. Ann. 787.

In Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191, 22 L. J. C. P. 24, 17 Jur. 67, it is stated that if a stranger, in the name of a mortgagor or of his heir, with his consent or privity, tender the debt to the mortgagee and the latter accept it, the debt is satisfied.

Where the plaintiff agreed with a third party to accept a sum in discharge of a debt, the advance of such amount by such third party was held a satisfaction of the debt. Welby v. Drake, 1 Car. & P. 557.

Such a payment was held to be a discharge of the debt and a defense to an action for the price of goods sold. Gray v. Herman, 6 L. R. A. 691, 75 Wis. 453.

Payment may be made by an arrangement whereby a creditor is given other funds supplied by a third party to the creditor at the instance of the debtor, the arrangement being carried into actual effect. First Nat. Bank of Nashville v. McClung, 7 Lea. 462, 40 Am. Rep. 66; 2 Parsons, Cont. 137.

In Hun v. Van Dyck, 26 Hun. 537, the defendants were allowed to plead payment by another in discharge of their illegal acts in the purchase of bonds, the principal and interest of which had been reimbursed by the obligors.

The payment must be deliberate and intentional on the third party's part, payment being performance of the obligation or there is no extinguishment of the debt. Gernon v. McCan, 23 La. Ann. 84.

If the debtor repudiates the payment made by the stranger, the payment will not operate as a discharge of the debt. Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, 23 L. R. A.

It has been held that to be available as a defense to an action by the original creditor, such payment must be made by the third party either as agent for and on account of the debtor or with his authority. Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, 81 Am. Rep. 491; Atlantic Dock Co. v. New York, 53 N. Y. 69; Bleakley v. White, 4 Paige, 654, 3 L. ed. 598; Tilton v. Alcott, 16 Barb. 598.

So it must be proved to have been made and received in discharge of the debt and so as to extinguish it. Breck v. Blanford, 23 N. H. 302, 51 Am. Dec. 522.

Under article 2150 of the Civil Code of Louisiana, the obligation may be discharged by a third party in no way concerned in it, provided he acts in the name and for the discharge of the debtor, or that if he act in his own name he is not subrogated to the rights of the creditor. Gernon v. McCan, supra.

It is not a contract but the discharge of a contract in which the party of the first part has a right to demand payment, and the party of the second part has a right to make payment. Binford v. Adams, 104 Ind. 41.

A previous request must in such cases be both alleged and proved. To the same effect are the cases of Kaye v. Dutton, 7 Mann. & G. 807; Victoria v. Davies, 12 Mees. & W. 758.

Payment must be shown to be for the debtor's benefit. James v. Isaacs, 12 C. B. 791, 22 L. J. C. P. 73, 17 Jur. 69.

II. Contrary doctrine.

But the above view is disapproved of in other cases.

In Whiting v. Independent Mut. Ins. Co., 15 Md. 297, 314, the payment of a debt by a stranger without the consent or knowledge of the debtor was held not necessarily to discharge the debtor, and that such payment would not be taken advantage of by him without showing by an acquittance or other means that it was intended by the payor and receiver to operate as a discharge.

The payment or satisfaction by a stranger cannot, even at law, be pleaded in bar of a debt or covenant which the defendant was legally bound to pay or perform himself. Bleakley v. White, 4 Paige, 654, 3 L. ed. 598; Clow v. Borst, 6 Johns. 37; Edgcombe v. Rod, 1 Smith, 515.

Neither could such payment avail defendant where there was not even a pretense of equity in the defense set up. Bleakley v. White, supra; Blum v. Hartman, 3 Daly, 49; Daniels v. Hallenbeck, 19 Wend. 409; Grymes v. Blofield, Cro. Eliz. 541; Atlantic Dock Co. v. New York, 53 N. Y. 67.

In First Nat. Bank of Pueblo v. Newton, 10 Colo. 161, 171, it was held that the giving of the check of a third person to meet an antecedent indebtedness was prima facie not a payment of discharge of such indebtedness even though a receipt in full was given at the same time, but such note was accepted by a creditor, the same being construed to be upon the condition that the note should be rendered, in the absence of any by-law or resolution of the directors allowing compensation. Nor can one who is treasurer and secretary of the corporation, and a stockholder and director, recover on a quantum meruit for his official services without such by-law or resolution. The law of that state raises no promise on the part of the corporation in such cases, and the question whether, in such cases, there is an implied promise, depends on the law of that state.

9. The obligation of a supposed contract made and to be performed in another state is tested by its law.

APPPEAL by intervenors from a decree of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County rejecting their claims to a fund which had arisen in a suit by Crumlish's Administrator against the Central Improvement Company for distribution among the creditors and stockholders of the corporation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Barton & Boyd, U. L. Boyce, Wm. M. Stewart, Jr., and George Baylor for appellants.

Mr. Frank P. Clark for appellee.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In a suit in equity in the circuit court of Jefferson county of H. H. Crumlish's Administrator v. The Central Improvement Company there was a fund for payment of creditors of that company, and then for division among paid at maturity, in such cases the burden being upon the debtor to prove that such note was taken as payment of the original indebtedness.

The mere fact that the party pays as agent for the parties and for the payor who was desirous of purchasing the notes, with the belief that he was so doing, will not constitute such payment an extinguishment of the notes, even though the creditor received it in payment. Gerson v. McCan, 23 La. Anst. 84.

Voluntary payment to a creditor of the United States is no defense to a suit on an official bond. United States v. Keebler, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 83, 19 L. ed. 574, a case of action of debt upon an official bond as postmaster.

The English case of Grymes v. Blofield, Cro. Eliz. 541, declared that the payment of a debt by a stranger was no satisfaction.

This case, however, has been much criticised and materially limited by the subsequent English cases of Jones v. Broadhurst, 9 C. B. 173, and Simpson v. Eggington, 10 Exch. 845, 24 L. J. Exch. 812.

In Simpson v. Eggington, supra, it was held that payment was no discharge, unless made by a third party as agent for and on account of the debt, and with his prior authority or subsequent ratification.

To the same effect, Jones v. Broadhurst, 9 C. B. 173; Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191, 22 L. J. C. P. 24, 17 Jur. 67; James v. Isaacs, 22 L. J. C. P. 73, 12 C. B. 791, 17 Jur. 66; Kemp v. Balls, 10 Exch. 607, 24 L. J. Exch. 47; Lucas v. Wilkinson, 1 Hurlst. & N. 420, 26 L. J. Exch. 18; Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, 37 Am. Rep. 741; Lipscomb v. Winston, 1 Hen. & M. 458.

In Wellington v. Kelly, 84 N. Y. 543, the question was commented upon by the court but not finally decided.

In Stark v. Thompson, 3 T. B. Mon. 206, the court followed the doctrine as declared in Grymes v. Blofield, supra, and Clow v. Borst, 6 Johns. 37.

In Hawkshaw v. Rawlings, 1 Strange, 24, it is said that there could be no payment in satisfaction without an acceptance in satisfaction, and that although payment by a stranger was no legal discharge, yet acceptance in satisfaction worked its discharge.

III. Necessity of ratification.

A stranger who pays the debt of another without his knowledge or authority cannot sue the debtor for money paid for his use unless the debtor has ratified the act of the stranger by promising to repay him the amount or in some other manner. Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, 37 Am. Rep. 794; Beach v. Vandenberg, 10 Johns. 361; Jones v. Wilson, 3 Johns. 434; Menderback v. Hopkins, 8 Johns. 436; Walkill Poor Overseers v. Mamakating Poor Overseers, 14 Johns. 87; Lipscomb v. Winston, 1 Hen. & M. 458; Harrison v. Hicks, 1 Port. (Ala.) 423, 27 Am. Dec. 638; Carter v. Black, 20 N. C. 425.

Where, however, the consideration is beneficial to the party sought to be charged, and is actually adopted or taken advantage of by him, the person executing the consideration becomes the agent of the promisor by the adoption of his act by the latter; Omnia ratihabito retrotrahitur et mandato equiparatur. Roundtree v. Holloway, 18 Ala. 357; Kenan v. Holloway, 16 Ala. 53, 50 Am. Dec. 162.

So the payment of a mere stranger without the request or assent or subsequent ratification thereof by the debtor, confers no right of subrogation. The Jersey City, 43 Fed. Rep. 166, 167.

Where one party paid the debt of another without any previous request, and the original debtor upon being informed thereof merely asked why such payment was made, the court held that such interrogatory did not ratify the act of payment so as to render the debtor liable for reimbursements. Winsor v. Savage, 9 Met. 248.

An unauthorized payment may be ratified, such ratification being equivalent to an original request. Ibid.

Payment by a stranger considered to be for a debtor and on his account, and afterwards ratified by him is a good payment. Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191, 22 L. J. C. P. 24, 17 Jur. 67.

But payment by a stranger, without the authority, prior or subsequent, of the debtor, is not. James v. Isaacs, 12 C. B. 791, 22 L. J. C. P. 73, 17 Jur. 66; Cook v. Lister, 13 C. B. N. S. 543, 32 L. J. C. P. 121, 9 Jur. N. S. 823, 7 L. T. N. S. 712.

The ratification in such case may be after the commencement of the action, as where the defendant adopts the payment of the stranger by pleading it as a payment to the plaintiff. Simpson v. Eggington, 10 Exch. 845, 24 L. J. Exch. 812; Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191, 22 L. J. C. P. 24, 17 Jur. 67.

A plea of payment will be a sufficient ratification. Walter v. James, L. R. 6 Exch. 124, 40 L. J. Exch. 104, 24 L. T. N. S. 183, 19 Week. Rep. 472.

A party making payment may, however, withdraw such payment before ratification by the debtor, where such payment is not intended as a gift. Ibid.

Where an indorsee of a bill of exchange sued the acceptor, who pleaded an accommodation bill indorsed with other bills to the plaintiff as security for repayment of money advanced by him to the drawer, and satisfaction by payment to the plaintiff by the acceptor of one of the other bills of the money so advanced, the court held, that the plea was no bar to the further maintenance of the action, the payment having been made by a stranger, not ratified by the plaintiff. Kemp v. Balls, 10 Exch. 607, 24 L. J. Exch. 47.

When a creditor accepts payment of a debt from a stranger without the authority of the debtor, it is competent to the creditor, on discovering the want of authority and before any ratification of the payment by the debtor, to cancel the payment by returning the money to the stranger; and the stockholders. A commissioner was directed to ascertain the debts having a right to be paid out of the fund. Various demands were presented before the commissioner for audit as debts; and among them was a judgment in favor of B. K. Jamison & Co. against the Central Improvement Company, an account in favor of R. D. Barclay against same company, and an account in favor of John P. Green against same, which three demands having been disallowed by the commissioner and court, Jamison & Co. and Barclay and Green united in this appeal.

The Jamison Judgment.

A judgment was rendered in 1877 in the court of common pleas, No. 8, of the county of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of B. K. Jamison & Co. against the Central Improvement Company for $25,168.85 and costs, and afterwards, in 1890, upon a writ of scire facias upon this judgment, another judgment was rendered by the same court for $26,978.08 and costs. Jamison & Co. and U. L. Boyce and the Fidelity Insurance Trust & Safe-Deposit Company each claimed the right to said judgment before the commissioner; and the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, being a large owner of stock in the Central Improvement Company, pleaded payment. Jamison & Co. and Boyce having excepted to the report, and appealed, what we have to decide is whether they have any cause to complain of the refusal to allow them the judgment.

Jamison & Co., by process on said first debtor cannot in such a case ratify the payment by placing a plea of payment on the record in an action brought against him for the amount by the creditor. Walter v. James, supra.

When a payment is made, not by way of gift for the benefit of the debtor, but by an agent who intended to be reimbursed by the debtor, but who had not the debtor's authority to make it, it is competent to the creditor, as the party paying, to rescind the transaction at any time before the debtor has affirmed the payment, and to repay the money, when the payment of the debt will be at an end, and the original debtor will be again responsible. Ibid.

In Sargeant v. Sunderland, 21 Vt. 234, the payment by a town treasurer was presumed to be with the approbation of the town.

IV. Question of intention.

In Coe v. New Jersey Midland R. Co., 31 N. J. Eq. 105, it was held that the real question in all cases of subrogation is, whether the payment made by the stranger was a loan to the debtor through a mere desire to aid him, or whether it was made with the expectation of being substituted in the place of the creditor, and that in the former case he would not be entitled to subrogation, while in the latter he would.

The question whether a payment made by a guarantor or surety or generally by any one not liable or primarily liable for the debt on account of which the payment is made, operates as a payment and extinguishment, or as a purchase of the debt, must depend upon the intention of the party at the time the payment is made. Kinley v. Hill, 4 Watts & S. 422; Elkinton v. Newman, 20 Pa. 281; Morris v. Oakford, 9 Pa. 491; Low v. Blodgett, 21 N. H. 121; Carter v. Jones, 40 N. C. 196, 49 Am. Dec. 426; Mathews v. Alkin, 1 N. Y. 505.

In Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, 37 Am. Rep. 794, the court stated the true basis of the decisions to be, that a stranger might purchase the debt of a creditor without the knowledge or consent of the debtor; that the debt might be expressly assigned to such stranger, and that if the design of the stranger was to purchase the debt and the money was received by the creditor with that intention, it would operate as a purchase and as an equitable transfer of the debt; but where there was simply a payment of the debt, the presumption was that the stranger merely expected the debtor to repay the money advanced and there was no implication of an express or implied agreement for a transfer of the securities.

And in such case the stranger would be entitled as the equitable owner of the debt, and suit could be brought at law in the name of the original creditor for his use. Neely v. Jones, supra.

Whether a transaction between the holder of a promissory note and the person who pays the money is of such a character as to constitute a payment that will operate to extinguish the debt, is generally a question of fact. Binford v. Adams, 104 Ind. 41; Dougherty v. Deeney, 45 Iowa, 443; Moran v. Abbey, 63 Cal. 56; Jones v. Bobbitt, 90 N. C. 391; Balohradsky v. Carlisle, 14 Ill. App. 289.

Whether the payment of a note by a stranger is a purchase or a payment thereof, must depend upon the facts of the case. Wilcoxon v. Logan, 91 N. C. 449.

It is a contract which does not extinguish a bill or note, but continues it in circulation as a valid security against all parties. Binford v. Adams, supra.

Where payment is made of an execution by a third party, who takes an assignment, he is a purchaser of the creditor's rights which are not satisfied by such payment. Carter v. Sheriff of Halifax, 8 N. C. 433.

In Stokes v. Lewis, 1 T. R. 20, it was held that in order to ground assumpsit for money paid, it must be shown to have been paid upon an express or implied promise or contract.

V. Right of action.

It is a well-settled rule of law that the payment of the debt of another raises no assumpsit against the person whose debt is paid, and no action lies by reason of such payment, unless a request, either expressed or implied, to make such payment, is proved. South Scituate v. Hanover, 9 Gray, 420.

A mere voluntary payment of another's debt imposes no duty upon the debtor to repay. Wheatfield Twp. v. Brush Valley Twp., 25 Pa. 112; Hehn v. Hehn, 23 Pa. 415; Breneman's App. 121 Pa. 641, 643.

A party furnishing money for the payment of a debt has not the right of the creditor whose debt is paid, the legal claim only attaching to him who is bound to pay. Nolte v. Creditors, 7 Mart. N. S. 602.

The mere payment of money does not necessarily impose a liability. Kenan v. Holloway, 16 Ala. 53, 50 Am. Dec. 163.

A stranger paying the debt of another has no right of action in the payor's name. Brown v. Chesterville, 63 Me. 241.

The law does not permit the liability of a party for a debt to one person to be shifted so as to make him the debtor of another, without his consent. South Scituate v. Hanover, supra; Winsor v. Savage, 9 Met. 343.

One man cannot of his own will pay another's debt without his consent and thereby convert himself into a creditor. Kenan v. Holloway, supra; Weakley v. Brahan, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 500; Durnford v. Messiter, 5 Maule & S. 443.

A mere advance to pay a debt is no bar to an action by the original creditor, nor a defense to a suit in his name and with his consent instituted by the payor. Brown v. Chesterville, supra.

judgment, had attached $250,000 of second mortgage bonds and $175,000 of income bonds of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, held in the hands of a third party for the benefit of the Central Improvement Company. The Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company desiring to make a contract for its completion, and make another mortgage to raise money to complete it, and desiring to cancel and retire the bonds so attached, Boyce, the vice-president of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, opened negotiations with Jamison & Co. looking to securing those bonds, and Jamison & Co. expressed their willingness to take any step which would get their money advanced to the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company represented by said judgment. Boyce made an arrangement with E. W. Clark & Co., bankers,—who were financial agents of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, and wished to obtain said bonds for cancellation, out of the way of a new series,—to furnish the money. Thereupon, on July 12, 1879, Jamison & Co. and E. W. Clark & Co. made a written agreement providing that Jamison & Co. should transfer to Clark & Co. all their right, title, and interest to the bonds aforesaid, as also some others; that Jamison & Co. should proceed to get judgment upon their attachments, levy on said securities, and sell the same so as to pass title to the purchaser; that, if they

The only remedy a party making a payment at the request of the debtor has, is by action of assumpsit for money paid and not in the name of the creditor. Simmons v. Walker, 18 Ala. 664.

It has been held that a simple acknowledgment to a stranger or volunteer is not sufficient of itself to imply a promise to repay such party the money paid. Kenan v. Holloway, supra.

So where the debtor makes a promise to repay such volunteer or stranger being ignorant at the time that he is legally discharged from liability upon the original contract. Ibid.; New Hampshire Sav. Bank v. Colcord, 15 N. H. 119, 41 Am. Dec. 685.

The payment of the amount of a bond by a third party at the request of the obligor, extinguishes the debt due to the obligee who cannot bring suit thereon in his own name, even for the use of the party making the payment. Simmons v. Walker, supra.

Such a party becomes entitled, on the principles of subrogation, to the remedies to which the person to whom payment was made was entitled, or he may maintain an equitable suit as for money paid to the use of all other. Weiss v. Gurineau, 109 Ind. 438; Brice's App. 95 Pa. 145; Stiger v. Bent, 111 Ill. 828.

Such subrogation is equivalent to an expressed authority to use the plaintiff's name in suing the debtor. King v. Dwight, 3 Rob. (La.) 2.

Where an agent of an insurance company issued a policy accepted by the insured, and paid the premium which the insured had neglected to do under his contract with the company, the court held in an action brought in the company's name for the benefit of such agent, that the latter was subrogated to the company's rights, and that no assignment was necessary for the recovery of the premium. Gillett v. Insurance Co. of North America, 39 Ill. App. 284.

In a creditor's bill founded on a judgment, a plea that the judgment had been paid as a gratuity to the complainant, a police officer who had obtained the judgment for costs in an action against him for false imprisonment, was held to be bad. Bleakley v. White, 4 Paige, 654, 8 L. ed. 593.

VI. As to bills and notes.

A third party paying a note at the request of the maker to a collection agency extinguishes the note. Moran v. Abbey, 68 Cal. 55.

Such a payment extinguishes the debt of the maker. Oliver v. Bragg, 15 La. Ann. 402.

And a subsequent transfer of such note will not revive it. Moran v. Abbey, supra.

In Burr v. Smith, 21 Barb. 232, where a stranger paid the amount due upon a note after its maturity, declining to have it canceled and taking it into his own possession, nothing being said about a sale thereof, it was held that it operated as a payment and satisfaction of the note, and no action could be brought thereon by any person taking it from such stranger.

Where a third party, with knowledge of the circumstances, paid an accommodation acceptance before its maturity, without the knowledge or consent of the indorser to the prejudice of the indorser, the latter was held discharged from all liability upon the note in question. Boyd v. McDonough, 39 How. Pr. 389; La Farge v. Herter, 11 Barb. 150; Wood v. Jefferson County Bank, 9 Cow. 206; Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. 123, 1 L. ed. 733, 8 Am. Dec. 554.

In Conkling v. King, 10 N. Y. 440, the creditor had taken a third party's note upon the understanding that if the same were paid at maturity it should be a satisfaction of the debt. The court held that the fact of the creditor's receiving payment of the note when overdue discharged the debtor, as the same was a waiver of the condition attached to the note.

A party giving the maker of a note money to pay the same and purchase it for him is not entitled thereto, where the maker makes such payment without making a statement to that effect. Cason v. Heath, 96 Ga. 438.

Where a third party paid an installment note for purchase money, upon an agreement that he should be substituted to the vendor's rights "to the extent that he should have their lien pro tanto upon the said land for the money thus advanced," it was held that he was entitled, the purchaser's assets being insufficient to pay all the notes, to share in the proceeds in proportion of the note paid to the amount of all the notes. Owen v. Cook, 3 Tenn. Ch. 78.

In Francis v. Del Banco, 2 Duer, 133, the question whether or not an existing debt was satisfied by the delivery to the creditor of the promissory note of a third party indorsed by him, was not fully determined, but it was held that where such a note was transferred and received in payment by the understanding and agreement of the parties, the debtor's prior liability was extinguished and that he was only liable as an indorser.

In St. John v. Purdy, 1 Sandf. 9, it was held that the acceptance of a stranger's note was a satisfaction of the debt and a discharge of the debtor.

VII. Subrogation.

a. General doctrine.

The right of subrogation or of equitable assignment is not founded upon contract nor upon the absence of contract, but is founded upon the facts and circumstances of a particular case and upon principles of natural justice, and generally where it is equitable that a person furnishing money to pay a debt should be substituted for the creditor or in the place of a creditor, such person will be so substituted. Crippen v. Chappel, 35 Kan. 495, 57 Am. Rep. 122; Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. 120, 1 L. ed. 739, 8 Am. Dec. 554; Hodgson v. Shaw, 3 Myl.

should not be bid up to a figure above Jamison & Co.'s judgment, Jamison & Co. were to buy them at the sale, and transfer them to Clark & Co.; that "the said E. W. Clark & Co. are to pay B. K. Jamison & Co. the amount of their judgment against the Central Improvement Company, with interest and costs, the amount of said judgment being $25,168.85, with interest from July 10, 1877, the said payment to be made as follows: $10,000 in cash, and the balance in the notes of E. W. Clark & Co., drawn in equal amounts," etc. The said bonds were sold to Jamison & Co. under said attachments at $11,000, which was credited on the judgment, and Jamison & Co. transferred the bonds to Clark & Co., and received from them the $10,000 cash, and their notes in full payment of the amount of said judgment. By reason of said agreement the commissioner reports the judgment as paid "so far as claimant is concerned," that is, Jamison & Co. The object of Jamison & Co. being only to get their money, and the language of the writing being, "the said E. W. Clark & Co. are to pay [note the word 'pay'] B. K. Jamison & Co. the amount of their judgment," these facts lead me to the conclusion that the parties contemplated it as a payment, so far as Jamison & Co. were concerned. But this payment was made by a stranger, without request or ratification by the debtor, so far as appears.

& K. 183; Hart v. Western R. Co. 13 Met. 99, 46 Am. Dec. 719; Amory v. Lowell, 1 Allen, 504; Wall v. Mason, 102 Mass. 813; Snppiger v. Garrels, 20 Ill. App. 625; DeConcillo v. Brownrigg (N. J. Eq.) Nov. 25, 1892; Brewer v. Naab, 16 B. L. 458; Stevens v. King, 84 Me. 291; Blackburn Bldg. Soc. v. Cunliffe, 1 R. 22 Ch. Div. 61, 31 Week. Rep. 96; Skinner v. Tirrell, 21 L. R. A. 673, 159 Mass. 474.

The doctrine of subrogation, being one of mere equity and benevolence, will not be enforced at the expense of a legal right. Barnes v. Dickey, 181 Pa. 36.

It comprehends all parties who are obliged to pay to protect their own interests. Bayles v. Husted, 40 Hun. 376.

Subrogation is a pure unmixed equity. Gadsden v. Brown, 1 Speers, Eq. 40, a case of payment of a mortgage by a stranger at the request of the mortgagor.

The general principles of equity are the foundations of the right. Pease v. Eagan, 131 N. Y. 292; Cottrell's App. 23 Pa. 294.

Legal subrogation only exists in favor of those who are bound to pay the debt. Harrison v. Bland, 5 Rob. (La.) 204.

The doctrine is only to be applied where it will promote justice. Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 395.

A party who has covenanted or promised must perform the engagement himself in all its legal consequences. Muller v. Eno, 14 N. Y. 597, 606.

Where a person is in no manner bound, and on his own motion in the absence of a contract, or expectation that he will be substituted in the place of the creditor, pays the debt of another, he will be regarded as an intermeddler and not entitled to subrogation. Wormer v. Waterloo Agr. Works, 42 Iowa, 699; Shinn v. Budd, 14 N. J. Eq. 234; Coe v. New Jersey Midland R. Co. 31 N. J. Eq. 105; Tradeemen's Bldg. & Loan Asso. v. Thompson, 32 N. J. Eq. 138; Kitchell v. Mudgett, 37 Mich. 81; Gilbert v. Gilbert, 39 Iowa, 657; Barber v. Lyon, 15 Iowa, 87.

The same doctrine is held in Bedington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 49; Wilson v. Fridenberg, 21 Fla. 386; Rough v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 57 Ill. 818, 11 Am. Rep. 18; Young v. Morgan, 30 Ill. 199; Bayard v. McGraw, 1 Ill. App. 134; Crippen v. Chappel, 35 Kan. 465, 37 Am. Rep. 122; Stevens v. King, 84 Me. 291; Swann v. Patterson, 7 Md. 164; *Smith v. v. Miller, 37 Gratt. 740; Enders v. Brune, 4 Band. (Va.) 436.

The doctrine could never, from its nature, have been intended for the relief of those who were in any condition in which they were at liberty to elect whether they would or would not be bound, and has never been so applied. Gadsden v. Brown, Speers, Eq. 38, 41.

The voluntary performance of a service or expenditure of money for another will not create the position of debtor and creditor. There must at the least be an implied request. Webb v. Cole, 20 N. H. 490.

No one can make himself the creditor of another without his consent or against his will. Dawson v. Lea, Lee v. Hill, 38 Ky. 49.

Voluntary payment without consent does not place the payor in the creditor's position or entitle him to sue the debtor, the law not permitting one officiously and without solicitation to intermeddle with another's affairs. Winder v. Diffenderfer, 2 Bland, Ch. 199; McGee v. San José, 68 Cal. 91.

To the same effect, Slaton v. Alcorn, 51 Miss. 75; Truesdell v. Callaway, 6 Mo. 605; Douglass v. Fagg, 8 Leigh, 401; Johnson v. Credit Lyonnais Co. L. R. 8 C. P. 43.

The same conclusions were reached in Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. 31 U. S. 17 Wall. 153, 21 L. ed. 622, a petition to quiet title.

No man is allowed to intrude himself as another's surety. Winder v. Diffenderfer, supra.

The right is never accorded in equity to one who is a mere volunteer in paying a debt of one person to another. Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Middleport, 124 U. S. 534, 31 L. ed. 537.

The doctrine has been exclusively directed to the relief of those who were already bound, or who could not but choose to abide the penalty. Gadsden v. Brown, Speers, Eq. 37, 41.

In Bank of United States v. Winston, 2 Brook. 254, the doctrine of subrogation or substitution was confined to sureties and held not applicable to a mere volunteer.

The payment by one having no obligation to pay nor interest in the contract personally will not entitle such payor to subrogation or substitution. Moody v. Moody, 68 Me. 155.

It does not exist where there is no duty or obligation to pay, either moral or otherwise. Hoover v. Epler, 52 Pa. 522.

The same doctrine was declared in Childress v. Allen, 3 La. 477, a case of a purchaser at a forced sale.

A mere stranger is not entitled to subrogation. Wormer v. Waterloo Agr. Works, 42 Iowa, 699, where money was furnished for the purpose of redeeming property from a judicial sale, the court holding that the party advancing the money for such redemption was not entitled to be placed in the position of the purchaser at the sale.

A volunteer never could claim the benefit of the

Does it satisfy the judgment? As it seems to me, the answer depends upon whether you mean as to the creditor or debtor. It remains a correct legal proposition, to the present, that one man who is under no obligation to pay the debt of another cannot, without his request, officiously pay that other's debt, and charge him with it. If he ratify such payment, the debt is discharged, and he becomes liable to the stranger for money paid to his use. If he refuse to ratify it, he disclaims the payment, and the debt stands unpaid as to him (the debtor). In the one case the stranger would, at law, sue the debtor for money paid to his use; in the other, enforce the debt in the creditor's name for his use.

If his payment is not ratified, he may go into equity, praying that if the debtor ratify it he may be decreed to repay him, or, if he do not ratify the payment, that the debt be treated as unpaid, as between him and the debtor, and that it be enforced in his favor, as an equitable assignee. Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, 87 Am. Rep. 794; Moore v. Ligon, 22 W. Va. 292; Beard v. Artuckle, 19 W. Va. 185.

But how as to the creditor? When a stranger pays him the debt of a third party, without request of such third party, as in this case, can the creditor say the debt is yet unsolved, and enforce it against the debtor, as is attempted to be done by Jamison & Co.? Can law of subrogation. So held in Fay v. Fay, 43 N. J. Eq. 438, where an administrator of an intestate's estate paid the funeral expenses of a minor entitled to an undivided interest in the intestate's estate, taking no assignment of the debt.

The case of Skinner v. Tirrell, 21 L. R. A. 873, 159 Mass. 474, further exemplifies these principles of subrogation and holds that they do not apply to the case of a volunteer supplying money to a married woman. In that case the court pointed out an additional reason for refusing such relief, namely, that a special remedy was afforded to the wife by statute.

Where a party paid a debt of another under the impression that he was legally compellable to do so, the court held he was a mere stranger or volunteer not entitled to the creditor's rights against the principal. Dawson v. Lee, Lee v. Hill, 83 Ky. 49.

One who advances money to pay off a deed of trust at the instance of a life tenant, taking a new deed of trust from the latter in the belief that he has an absolute title, is a mere volunteer as against parties in interest, excepting the life tenant, and not entitled to subrogation. Kleimann v. Geiselmann, 45 Mo. App. 497.

There is no subrogation in the case of payment of a privileged debt. Shaw v. Grant, 13 La. Ann. 52.

So one cannot acquire a lien upon property purchased by another, by the mere voluntary payment of the purchase money. Truesdell v. Callaway, 6 Mo. 605.

Where a party makes such payment as a mere volunteer, under a mistake of law, he will not be entitled to relief in equity upon the ground of subrogation. Norton v. Highleyman, 88 Mo. 621; Price v. Estill, 87 Mo. 373.

A legatee voluntarily paying a debt for which he is not personally liable, and which is no charge upon his property, is not entitled to be subrogated to a lien which the creditor had upon the deceased's estate. Wilkes v. Harper, 1 N. Y. 593.

Where an administrator made a voluntary payment of a debt of the deceased, upon the mistaken belief that the assets were sufficient to reimburse him, the court held he was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor under the trustee. Evans v. Halleck, 88 Mo. 376.

Such payment was a misappropriation of the funds, and it being voluntarily made, the fact of his being mistaken in the supposition that he had funds of the estate sufficient to justify him in so doing, did not entitle him to the relief asked, and he made the payment at his peril. Id.; Dullard v. Hardy, 47 Mo. 404; Garesche v. Priest, 78 Mo. 127; Brown v. Fagan, 71 Mo. 563.

Equity will not relieve by enforcing a volunteer's rights to pay off another's mortgage. Smith v. Austin, 9 Mich. 465.

The mere fact that a party lent money to pay the purchase money upon land, does not entitle him to 23 L. R. A.

be substituted to the vendor's rights. Durant v. Davis, 10 Heisk. 522.

The payment of purchase money due to the vendor of real estate by a mere volunteer or stranger creates no subrogation as to the vendor's lien. Nichol v. Dunn, 25 Ark. 123.

One with no title to or interest in land cannot redeem at a tax sale, so as to deprive the defendant of his lien or interest acquired by tax sales certificates. Eaton v. North, 25 Wis. 514.

In Muller v. Eno, 14 N. Y. 597, it was held that if a third person, without the authority of the plaintiff and not in privity with him, paid to the defendants in money a full satisfaction for the breach of a warranty, such payment and satisfaction was no defense to an action on the warranty, and no answer to the defendant's right of recoupment.

A stranger lending money to pay the wages of a seaman is not subrogated to the statutory attachment lien of such seaman. Steamboat "P. H. White" v. Levy, 10 Ark. 411.

A party making a payment without a request of the debtor is not entitled to charge the latter. McGee v. San José, 68 Cal. 91.

Third parties having no rights or interest cannot divest a purchaser at a tax sale by redemption of the property. Byington v. Bookwalter, 7 Iowa, 512, 74 Am. Dec. 279.

In Penn v. Clemans, 19 Iowa, 372, the court held that a party having no interest in property could not redeem it from a tax sale, and that such redemption did not divest the title of a tax purchaser or inure to the benefit of the real owner.

Where taxes which should have been paid by the defendants were paid by a third party without the former's request or assent, the court held that the taxpayer's refusal or neglect of such payment did not authorize contestants of his title to make him their debtor, by voluntarily stepping in and paying such taxes. Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. 81 U. S. 17 Wall. 153, 21 L. ed. 622.

A payment by a party not interested in a note does not entitle him to a conventional subrogation. Oliver v. Bragg, 15 La. Ann. 402.

A party agreeing to pay the debt of another in installments is not entitled to subrogation until interest is paid. Soulie v. Brown, 13 La. Ann. 531.

Where one borrowed money to pay a note with the intention of discharging the same, and subrogating the mortgagee's rights, the court held, the mortgagee not being a party to the subrogation, that the same was without authority and no subrogation existed. Hoyle v. Cambat, 26 La. Ann. 438.

Where a stockholder in a foreign corporation paid corporate debts, the court held, there being no proof that he was legally liable therefor, that his payment was voluntary. Eastman v. Crosby, 8 Allen, 208.

he accept such payment, and say, because it was made by a stranger, it is no payment? Is his acceptance not an estoppel by conduct in pais, as to him? There has been a difference of opinion in this matter. The old English case of Grymes v. Blofield, Cro. Eliz. 541 (decided in Elizabeth's reign), is the parent of the cases holding that even the creditor accepting payment from a stranger may repudiate, and still enforce his demand as unpaid. That case is said to have decided that a plea of accord and satisfaction by a stranger is not good, while Rolfe, Abr. 471 (condition F), says it was decided just the other way. Denman, Oh. J., questioned its authority in Thurman v. Wild, 11 Ad. & El.

453. Opposite holding has been made in England in Haukshaw v. Rawlings, 1 Strange, 24. Its authority is questioned at the close of the opinion by Cresswell, J., in Jones v. Broadhurst, 9 C. B. 173, as contrary to an ancient decision in 36 Hen. VI., and against reason and justice. Parke, B., seemed to think it law in Simpson v. Eggington, 10 Exch. 845. It was followed in Edgecombe v. Rodd, 5 East, 294, and Stark v. Thompson, 8 T. B. Mon. 296. Lord Coke held the satisfaction good. Co. Litt. 206b, 207a. See 5 Rob. Pr. (new,) 884; 7 Rob. Pr. (new,) 548.

The cases of Goodwin v. Cremer, 18 Q. B. 757, and Kemp v. Balls, 28 Eng. L. & Eq. 498, seem to hold that payment must be made

Where a town made a voluntary payment of commissioner's fees appointed by the legislative resolve, providing for the payment of such fees by the towns, the court held that the town making such payment could not recover from the other town any portion of the amount paid. South Scituate v. Hanover, 9 Gray, 420.

In Van Winkle v. Williams, 38 N. J. Eq. 105, where money was advanced to a party for the purpose of loan to another person by equitable mortgage, the court held there was no right to subrogation.

In the course of the construction of a railroad, the superintendent of the workman who was not legally bound to do so, voluntarily and believing the principals solvent, as a friendly act to the workmen, advanced moneys for the payment of wages without taking an assignment of the claims, or making any agreement for the benefit of their liens. The court held, upon the subsequent insolvency of the principals, that such superintendent was not entitled by subrogation to the statutory liens of the workmen. North River Constr. Co's Case, 38 N. J. Eq. 433.

Voluntary payment by surety upon a void note or obligation does not entitle him to contribution from other sureties. Russell v. Tallor, 1 Ohio St. 227, 59 Am. Dec. 631.

The cession of action cannot be compelled by a stranger who pays a debt for which he is not liable. Douglass v. Fagg, 8 Leigh, 601.

The voluntary payment of a debt constituting a lien upon land does not entitle the party paying to be substituted to the lien of the judgment creditor. Janney v. Stephens, 2 Patton & Heath (Va.) 11.

The mere loan of money is not sufficient. Watson v. Wilcox, 39 Wis. 650, 20 Am. Rep. 63; Downer v. Miller, 15 Wis. 612; Pelton v. Knapp, 21 Wis. 63.

Where a trustee of a deceased partner paid a debt of the dissolved firm out of his own money, it was held voluntary, and being the act of a stranger, did not entitle him to the rights of the creditor unless such payment were made at the request of the partner. Conrad v. Buck, 21 W. Va. 360.

Actual payment is a discharge at law, but where justice requires it the debt will be kept on foot for the payor's benefit. Cottrell's App. 23 Pa. 294.

b. Payment for protection.

Generally, where it is equitable that a person furnishing money to pay a debt should be substituted for the creditor or in the place of the creditor, such person will be so substituted. Yaple v. Stephens, 26 Kan. 680.

A party seeking to take advantage of the equitable doctrine of subrogation must show that he paid the debt, before he can be substituted to the creditor's rights, and also that he acted, not as a mere volunteer, but on compulsion to save himself from loss by reason of a superior lien or claim on the part of the person to whom he paid the debt, as 23 I. R. A.

in cases of sureties, prior mortgagees, etc. Benja L. Ins. Co. v. Middleport, 124 U. S. 534, 31 L. ed. 537.

It is only in cases where a payment has been made under a legitimate and fair effort to protect the ascertained interests of the party paying, and when intervening rights are not legally jeopardized or defeated, that the doctrine of subrogation applies. Mosier's App. 56 Pa. 76, 93 Am. Dec. 763.

Yet the payment by a stranger of a debt for the protection of his own property entitles him, upon the principles of subrogation, to the creditor's remedies. Cockrum v. West, 122 Ind. 372; Weiss v. Guerin, 109 Ind. 438; Lowrey v. Byers, 80 Ind. 443; Edinburg American Land Mortg. Co. v. Latham, 88 Ind. 88.

As in the case of payment, by a vendee of an incumbered estate, of a charge upon land which would cause him loss of interest thereon. Arnold v. Green, 116 N. Y. 536; Johnson v. Zink, 51 N. Y. 333; Cole v. Malcolm, 66 N. Y. 363; Twombly v. Cassidy, 33 N. Y. 155; Gans v. Thieme, 93 N. Y. 225, 232; Averill v. Taylor, 8 N. Y. 44, 51.

Or that of a junior incumbrancer. Jenkins v. Continental Ins. Co. 12 How. Pr. 66.

In Weiss v. Guerin, 109 Ind. 438, the court held that in the ordinary case of one person paying a debt for which another was personally and primarily liable, in order to protect his own property, the person so paying is entitled to recover from one whose default has imposed upon him the burden of paying a debt, for which he was neither legally nor equitably liable, following Dunning v. Seward, 90 Ind. 63; Bunn v. Lindsay, 95 Mo. 250; Wade v. Beldmeir, 40 Mo. 498; Woodridge v. Scott, 69 Mo. 609; Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 89; Sandford v. McLean, 3 Paige, 117, 3 L. ed. 80, 23 Am. Dec. 773; Atlantio Ins. Co. v. Storow, 5 Paige, 285, 3 L. ed. 720; Slade v. Van Vechten, 11 Paige, 21, 5 L. ed. 42; Graham v. Dickinson, 8 Barb. Ch. 169, 5 L. ed. 561; Patterson v. Birdsall, 6 Hun. 632; Lidderdale v. Robinson, 2 Brock. 159; Cottrell's App. 23 Pa. 294.

Even in the absence of a contract or understanding, as where he is a juvenile lien holder and pays the senior lien. Wormer v. Waterloo Agr. Works, 62 Iowa, 699.

In Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 395, it was said that the right of subrogation may be claimed by one who pays the debt of another under some compulsion.

The payment of a debt of a co-stockholder of the corporation by a stockholder, is not a voluntary payment so as to deprive the payor of his right to subrogation. Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 48.

In Curry v. Curry, 87 Ky. 667, it was held that an agent making a payment out of his own money for the protection of his principal, was not a mere volunteer and was entitled to the equities.

c. By special agreement.

Subrogation must take place at the time of payment. Sewall v. Howard, 15 La. Ann. 400.

by a third person as agent for and on account of debtor, with his assent or ratification. In New York, old cases held this doctrine. Olow v. Borst, 6 Johns. 37; Bleakley v. White, 4 Paige, 654, 3 L. ed. 598. But later, in Wellington v. Kelly, 84 N. Y. 543, Andrews, J., said that the old cases were doubtful, but had not been overruled, but it was not necessary in that case to say whether it should longer be regarded as law, and the syllabus makes a quære on the point. It was held in Harrison v. Hicks, 1 Port. (Ala.) 423, 27 Am. Dec. 688, that "payment of a debt, though made by one not a party to the contract, and though the assent of the debtor to the payment does not appear, is still the extinguishment of the demand." The opinion says that, as between the person paying and him for whose benefit it was paid, a question might arise whether it was voluntary, which would depend on circumstances of previous request, or subsequent, express or implied. This doctrine is sustained by Martin v. Quinn, 87 Cal. 55; Gray v. Herman, 75 Wis. 453, 6 L. R. A. 691; Cain v. Bryant, 12 Helsk. 45; Leavitt v. Morrow, 6 Ohio St. 71, 67 Am. Dec. 884; Webster v. Wyser, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 184; Harvey v. Tama County, 53 Iowa, 228. Bishop, Cont. § 211, holds that, if payment "be accepted by creditor in discharge of debt, it has that effect." See 2 Whart. Cont. § 1008.

A mere unexecuted intention of the parties is not sufficient. Harrison v. Bisland, 5 Rob. (La.) 204.

But there may be an expressed subrogation which must be made at the time of payment. Ibid. An agreement to subrogate before payment or an actual subrogation after payment is not enough. Gernon v. McCan, 23 La. Ann. 84.

There must be a new consideration for the promise. New Hampshire Sav. Bank v. Colcord, 15 N. H. 119, 41 Am. Dec. 685.

A prior agreement to subrogate may be gathered from a previous request by a subsequent assent. Rodman v. Sanders, 44 Ark. 504.

In Sandford v. McLean, 3 Paige, 122, 3 L. ed. 83, 23 Am. Dec. 773, it was said it was only where the person advancing money to pay the debt of a third person stands in the situation of a surety, or is compelled to pay to protect his own rights, that a court of equity will substitute him in the place of the creditor as a matter of course, without any agreement to that effect.

To entitle a third party, being merely a volunteer or stranger, to subrogation, the payment must be made upon an express agreement entered into at the time of payment. Swann v. Patterson, 7 Md. 164; Brice v. Watkins, 30 La. Ann. 21; Bank of United States v. Winston, 2 Brock. 264; Virgin's Succession, 18 La. Ann. 42; Burr v. Smith, 21 Barb. 233; National Bank of Royalton v. Cushing, 53 Vt. 326; Mosier's App. 56 Pa. 74, 36 Am. Dec. 733; Dillon v. Kauffman, 58 Tex. 696; Clark v. Moore, 76 Va. 263; Kling v. Dwight, 3 Rob. (La.) 2; Baltimore v. Hughes, 1 Gill & J. 480, 19 Am. Dec. 243; Oury v. Saunders, 77 Tex. 275.

Subrogation can be accomplished by payment in accordance with an express understanding between the debtor and creditor and a third party, to the effect, that if such third party pays the debt, he may hold the security for his reimbursement. Dillon v. Kauffman, supra; Flanagan v. Cushman, 48 Tex. 241; Fievel v. Zuber, 67 Tex. 275.

If a third party pays the entire debt pursuant to an agreement between himself and the debtor, that upon his doing so he shall be subrogated to the creditor's rights, the agreement will be effectual and the third party will stand in the place of the creditor as to all interested in the property or security. Fievel v. Zuber, supra; Fuller v. Hollis, 57 Ala. 436; Owen v. Cook, 3 Tenn. Ch. 78; Mitchell v. Butt, 45 Ga. 162; New Jersey Midland R. Co. v. Wortendyke, 27 N. J. Eq. 668; Morgan v. Hammett, 23 Wis. 30; Caudle v. Murphy, 89 Ill. 352; Oury v. Saunders, supra.

The debt must be paid at the instance of the debtor, or the person paying it must be liable as surety or otherwise for its payment in order to entitle the payor to subrogation, the principle not extending to a case of a mere volunteer. Wilson v. Brown, 13 N. J. Eq. 377.

A stranger, who by the authority and consent of the debtor, and on his agreement that he shall be subrogated to the rights of the creditor, makes payment for the debtor, will be subrogated if the payment is made with the expressed declaration of the subrogation in the release made by the creditor. Shreve v. Hankinson, 84 N. J. Eq. 76, 81, where a brother of a mortgagor made a payment of the first mortgage after the execution of the second mortgage upon such understanding.

So payment upon a like agreement between a stranger and a creditor will entitle the former to subrogation. Fievel v. Zuber, supra.

So where a party who has agreed to advance money for the payment of a debt applies the same in payment, and discharge of the debt himself, he is not to be regarded as a volunteer, and may be subrogated to the creditor's rights. Tradesmen's Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Thompson, 32 N. J. Eq. 133; Payne v. Hathaway, 3 Vt. 212.

It is not sufficient that a person paying the debt of another should do so, merely with the understanding on his part that he should be subrogated to the rights of the creditor, conventional subrogation only resulting from an express agreement, either with the debtor or creditor. New Jersey Midland R. Co. v. Wortendyke, 27 N. J. Eq. 668; Sandford v. McLean, 3 Paige, 117, 3 L. ed. 80, 23 Am. Dec. 773; Shinn v. Budd, 14 N. J. Eq. 234.

Conventional subrogation exists upon an attorney's statement that the payment and the acts of subrogation were made at the same time. Nugent v. Potter, 21 La. Ann. 746.

It must be shown that the payment was upon request or as surety or under compulsion. Aocr v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 895.

Under clause 2, article 2160, Rev. Civ. Code of Louisiana, a debtor borrowing money and intending to subrogate the lender to the creditor's rights, must borrow and execute the receipt in the presence of a notary and two witnesses, and declare that the loan was for the payment and that the same was made with the money advanced, in order to subrogate the payor to the creditor's rights independently of the creditor's will. Durac v. Ferrari, 23 La. Ann. 114.

In Louisiana the law is governed by article 2156 of the Civil Code, which shows the rule of law in that state to be contrary to the doctrine established elsewhere. Harrison v. Bisland, 5 Rob. (La.) 204; Hoyle v. Casabat, 26 La. Ann. 433; Brice v. Watkins, 30 La. Ann. 21.

But it is otherwise if reliance is expressly placed upon the debtor's promise to pay and the debt will be extinguished. Fievel v. Zuber, 67 Tex. 275.

Where a party showed that the money furnished by him to an infant was expended for necessities, or in paying debts incurred therefor, he was subrogated to the rights of the party furnishing such necessities. Price v. Sanders, 60 Ind. 310.

Where money was paid out to satisfy a debt which an infant owed for necessities, at his re-

It seems utterly unjust, and repugnant to reason, that a creditor accepting payment from a stranger, of the third person's debt, should be allowed to maintain an action against the debtor pleading and thereby ratifying such payment, on the technical theory that he is a stranger to the contract. He has himself, for this purpose, allowed him to make himself a quasi party. He consents to treat him so, so far as payment is concerned. To regard the debt paid, so far as he is concerned, is but to hold him to the result of his own act. Shall he collect the debt again? Then, can the stranger recover back? What matters it to the creditor who pays? As the supreme courts of Wisconsin and Ohio, in cases above cited, said, this doctrine is against common sense and justice. It does not at all infringe the rule that one cannot at law make another his debtor, without request to allow such payment to satisfy the debt as to the creditor; and this court, while recognizing the rule that one cannot officiously pay the debt of another, and sue him at law, unless he has ratified it, by allowing the stranger to go into equity and get repayment, makes the payment, in the eyes of a court of equity, operate to satisfy the debtor, and render the stranger a creditor of the debtor. Neely v. Jones, supra. I know that in Neely v. Jones, 18 W. Va. 625, 37 Am. Rep. 794, it is held that, "if a payment by a quest, the court held the infant liable. Randall v. Sweet, 1 Denio, 480.

Where a third party, at the instance of one of several partners, paid a debt upon the property of the firm, it was held that he should be reimbursed the amount paid by him, and have a lien upon the common property of the firm to secure him. Stebbins v. Willard, 58 Vt. 665.

Where there was an agreement to apply assets held by the promisor belonging to the debtor for the benefit of his creditor, the court held that the same was invalid and not enforceable by the creditor against such promisor unless it was shown that the debtor had authorized or consented to the assets being so applied. Bowman v. Ainslie, 1 Idaho, 644.

The mere fact of the loan of money to be applied in part satisfaction of a judgment debt will not create a transfer of the lien, although there be an understanding to that effect. Unger v. Leiter, 82 Ohio St. 310.

d. Fraud.

A party who has paid a debt at the request of a debtor, under circumstances which would operate as a fraud upon him, if the debtor were afterwards allowed to insist that the security of the debt was discharged by his payment, may be subrogated to the security as to the debtor. Stevens v. King, 84 Me. 291.

He is not entitled to subrogation, although induced to do so by fraud practiced upon him by the latter's agent. McCleary v. Savage (Pa.) 20 W. N. C. 547.

A mere stranger who pays off a mortgage without an assignment cannot subsequently come into equity in the absence of fraud, mistake, or accident and ask to be placed in the mortgagee's position. Guy v. Du Oprey, 18 Cal. 195, 78 Am. Dec. 518.

VIII. As against executors, etc.

The courts have held that a mere volunteer who pays the funeral expenses of a deceased cannot rely upon an implied promise of repayment by the personal representatives. Re Miller, 4 Redf. 308; Ward v. Jones, 44 N. C. 127; Foley v. Bushway, 71 Ill. 388; Gregory v. Hooker, 8 N. C. 394, 9 Am. Dec. 442; Lerch v. Emmett, 44 Ind. 331.

An executor or administrator having assets is liable to a third party who pays the funeral expenses of the deceased. Rappelyea v. Russell, 1 Day, 214; Tugwell v. Hayman, 3 Campb. 298; Rogers v. Price, 3 Younge & J. 28; Corner v. Shew, 3 Mees. & W. 350; Brice v. Wilson, 8 Ad. & El. 348; Hapgood v. Houghton, 10 Pick. 154.

In Re Hill, 17 Abb. N. C. 273, the same doctrine was followed, although in that case the party ordering was held personally liable having assumed the entire charge and showed a personal intention of discharging the costs.

Where the wife's executor was held entitled to recover against the husband it was stated that the law implies a promise on the part of an administrator with assets to pay the party furnishing the funeral expenses of the deceased. Re Miller, supra. To the same effect, McCue v. Garvey, 14 Hun, 562.

One voluntarily incurring expense for which there is no necessity, before the appointment of an administrator, does so at his own risk and cannot recover from the administrator when appointed. Samuel v. Thomas, 51 Wis. 549.

A voluntary payment by a plaintiff, although made under a mistake or misapprehension as to his legal liability, constitutes no debt against an intestate's estate. Bancroft v. Abbott, 3 Allen, 624.

Such a debt can arise only where a payment of money, in accordance with the written contract into which the plaintiff entered, was at the request of and as surety for a deceased. Idid.

Where a widow advanced money in payment of her husband's debts she was subrogated to the rights of the creditor, such act being beneficial to the estate. Brown v. Forst, 95 Ind. 218.

In France's Estate, 75 Pa. 220, the assent of an executor to the payment by a widow of the funeral expenses of the deceased husband was presumed, and she was held entitled to recover the same from the estate, even though she had stated that she did so voluntarily out of respect for deceased.

But in Hyneman's Estate, 11 Phila. 135, the widow having received moneys from benevolent societies was limited in her claim for funeral expenses to the amount over and above that received from such societies.

And in Green v. Weaver, 78 Ind. 494, the widow was held personally liable, she having expended or procured the entire estate of the deceased which was less than $500.

In Coleby v. Coleby, 12 Jur. N. S. 496, 14 L. T. N. S. 607, the heir voluntarily paying the funeral expenses of his testator was held not to be entitled to reimbursements out of the estate.

Where a husband paid the wife's funeral expenses and claimed the same from her executor, his claim was allowed in Gregory v. Lookyer, 8 Madd. 90. To the same effect, Lightbown v. McMyen, L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 575, 55 L. J. Ch. 545, 55 L. T. N. S. 834, 35 Week. Rep. 179; Freeman v. Coit, 27 Hun, 447, 96 N. Y. 63.

In Jenkins v. Tucker, 1 H. Bl. 90, a third person, voluntarily paying the funeral expenses of a wife suitable to the rank and fortune of the husband was entitled to recover the same from the husband, even though such payments were made without the latter's knowledge. To the same effect, Bertie v. Lord Chesterfield, 9 Mod. 81.

These principles were followed in Darmody's Estate, 13 Phila. 207.

Where a third party, before the appointment of an administrator of a deceased's estate, incurred expenses for a tombstone, curbing of the grave, and memorial cards, the court refused an order stranger is neither ratified nor authorized by the debtor, it will not be held to be a discharge of the debt;" but, though this point is general, that was a case of the stranger seeking to make the debtor repay, and the case and opinion intended to lay down the rule at law only as between the stranger paying and the debtor, not as between the creditor and debtor. So I hold that, when Jamison & Co. received the money for this judgment, it operated as a discharge as to them.

But it is said that such payment, though a payment, is inoperative, because, after it was made, a writ of scire facias issued to revive the judgment, and a judgment was rendered thereon that the plaintiffs recover their debt, and thus such payment amounts to nothing. This judgment is not, as with us, according to common law, a simple award of execution, but a judgment quod recuperet, as in an original action. Such a judgment would be void here by some authorities. Barton, Law Pr. 1081; Lovell v. McCurdy, 77 Va. 763. I have entertained doubts whether it would be void, as distinguished from voidable, though I have not fully examined the subject. But in Pennsylvania a scire facias is a substitute for an action of debt, and the judgment is properly quod recuperet. Duff v. Wynkoop, 74 Pa. 800; 1 Black, Judgm. § 499. We must, under the United States compelling the administrator to repay the same. Samuel v. Thomas, 51 Wis. 549.

Payment by a party by mistake as surety upon an administration bond entitles such party to subrogation to the rights of the next of kin, who are also mistaken, against the real surety for the insolvent administrator. Capheart v. Mhoon, 58 N. C. 178.

It has been held that a county is not liable to a volunteer who pays the funeral expenses of a pauper. Handlin v. Morgan County, 57 Mo. 114; Duval v. Laclede County, 21 Mo. 896.

The lender of money to an executor carrying on the testator's business has no rights against the estate not connected with the business. Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 369.

IX. Judgment debt.

A person not a party to an execution may advance the money upon it, and agree to have it assigned to him and keep it in force, but payment by such party in whole or in part without an agreement that it is not to operate as a discharge, or without an assignment, satisfies the execution pro tanto, and it cannot be afterwards enforced. Morris v. Lake, 9 Smedes & M. 521, 48 Am. Dec. 724; Reed v. Pruyn, 7 Johns. 426, 5 Am. Dec. 287; Sherman v. Boyce, 15 Johns. 443; Harwell v. Worsham, 3 Humph. 525, 37 Am. Dec. 572.

In St. Francis Mill Co. v. Sugg, 88 Mo. 476, it was held that the voluntary payment by a third party of a judgment debt, if made unconditional and without any reservation of the right to keep the judgment alive, was an entire satisfaction of the writ, no matter by whom the payment was made. Weston v. Clark, 37 Mo. 569, to the same effect.

The same doctrine was adopted in Terry v. O'Neal, 71 Tex. 562, except it could be shown that there was an agreement for its continuance in course for such party's benefit.

A legal subrogation exists upon payment by a third party of a judgment debt to an attorney of the judgment creditor, taking an order of the court subrogating the payor to the creditor's rights. Nugent v. Potter, 21 La. Ann. 746.

The advance of a portion of the money to pay a judgment in ejectment does not entitle the lender to possession upon an assignment of the judgment to him. Riffie's App. 8 Brewst. (Pa.) 94.

In Clevinger v. Miller, 27 Gratt. 740, it was held that the sheriff paying off an execution without taking an assignment of the judgment or of the debt, was not entitled to subrogation of the creditor's lien, as against other creditors having liens by judgment or otherwise. To the same effect, Feamster v. Withrow, 12 W. Va. 658.

Where the payment of an execution by an assignee of one of several debtors was intended as a purchase, it was held that the correction of the sheriff's indorsement was allowable, otherwise if it was intended as a payment of the debt. Kuhn v. North, 10 Serg. & R. 399.

In Cain v. Bryant, 12 Helsk. 45, money paid by a third party to the constable having charge of judgments was held a good payment, although the money was not paid over by the constable in proceedings to supersede and quash the levy of the execution.

In Beard v. Arbutuckle, 19 W. Va. 135, a sheriff paying an execution was held entitled to enforce payment as against the debtor, no matter whether he took an assignment of the judgment or not, there being no intention on his part to extinguish the debt.

X. Purchase money lien.

The equitable doctrine of subrogation is strictly confined to those third parties who advance money in such a manner as to lead to the presumption that they have either paid it or caused it to be paid to the purchaser. Carey v. Boyle, 53 Wis. 574.

But if the money is in the nature of a general loan to be used by the purchaser to pay the consideration of his purchase, or for any other purpose at his pleasure, the simple fact that the money can be traced to his hands or into the land, will give such third party no right of subrogation. Ibid.

The mere advance of money by way of loan to pay purchase-money notes gives the party paying the same no right to enforce any lien upon property. Jones v. Lockard, 89 Ala. 575.

A mere lender of money which is applied by the borrower in part payment of purchase money, is not entitled as a mere matter of right to substitution to the rights and remedies of the vendor. Rodman v. Sanders, 44 Ark. 504; Griffin v. Proctor, 14 Bush, 571.

A payment by a stranger of a debt due to the vendor of real estate extinguishes the debt and the lien also. Rodman v. Sanders, supra, following Nichol v. Dunn, 25 Ark. 129.

The lender is not subrogated to the lienholder's rights by virtue of a mere loan of money to discharge a land lien. Kline v. Ragland, 47 Ark. 111, following Rodman v. Sanders, supra; Mather v. Jenswold, 72 Iowa, 550.

If, however, such party becomes the transferee of such notes by purchase, whether verbal or in writing, he acquires such right. Jones v. Lockard, supra; Pettus v. McKinney, 74 Ala. 108; Weaver v. Brown, 87 Ala. 538; Code 1886, § 1764.

A part payment of a debt at the instance of the debtor does not constitute the party making the payment a mere volunteer, and if when such party makes the payment he manifests an intention to keep the prior lien alive for his protection, he will be deemed in equity a purchaser of the incumbrance. Rodman v. Sanders, supra.

In Price v. Courtney, 87 Mo. 387, 56 Am. Rep. 453, it was held that a party advancing money for the Constitution, give it the same faith and credit here which it has there. Black v. Smith, 18 W. Va. 780; Gilchrist v. West Virginia Oil & Oil Land Co. 21 W. Va. 115, 45 Am. Rep. 555; Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167. If it were a valid judgment, it would nullify the payment above spoken of, on familiar principles. Such would be its effect in Pennsylvania, and it is to its effect there that we look. Custer v. Dettlerer, 8 Watts & S. 28; McVeagh v. Little, 7 Pa. 279; Potter v. Hartnett, 149 Pa. 15; Mills v. Duryee, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 481, 3 L. ed. 411.

But while a judgment of a sister state, if valid, is given here the same effect it has there, yet, consistently with this rule, we can look into its record to see whether it had jurisdiction of the defendant; and, looking into the record of this judgment, we find no service whatever of the scire facias, personal or by return of nihil, or any appearance, and therefore the judgment is void, as would be a judgment here, for that cause. Gilchrist v. West Virginia Oil & Oil Land Co. 21 W. Va. 115, 45 Am. Rep. 555; Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 52 U. S. 11 How. 185, 13 L. ed. 648; Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897; Knowles v. Logansport Gas-Light & Coke Co. 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 58, 22 L. ed. 70; Guthrie v. Lowry, 84 Pa. 583; Steel v. Smith, 7 Watts & S. 447; Noble v. Thompson Oil Co.

purpose of removing a lien upon real estate was not subrogated to the rights of the lienor.

The mere fact that money borrowed by a debtor has been used to discharge a homestead lien will not entitle the lender, in the absence of an agreement, to the benefit of the lien. White v. Curd, 88 Ky. 191.

Where a party advanced money for the purchase of land, the court held he could not be subrogated to the rights of the vendor, if the latter's lien would be defeated thereby. Brower v. Witmeyer, 121 Ind. 83.

The mere loan of part of the purchase money will not entitle the lender to subrogation, where no agreement to substitute or to hold the property for his benefit is shown. Griffin v. Proctor, supra.

In Mitchell v. Butt, 45 Ga. 163, however, it was held that a party paying the purchase money at the instance of a purchaser was entitled to the vendor's lien.

A party lending money for the payment of a land purchase upon the understanding that he shall have the vendor's remedies, is substituted to his rights. Warhumund v. Merritt, 60 Tex. 24.

Where the intervenor advanced money for the purpose of redeeming property from a judicial sale, the court held that he was not entitled to the rights of a purchaser at that sale, he being a mere volunteer. Wormer v. Waterloo Agr. Works, 62 Iowa, 669.

Where property was conveyed with a condition attached, and subsequently sold for nonpayment of taxes, a deed being made to the city, and afterwards an entry was made for breach of the condition, and the two years had elapsed for redemption from the tax sale, the court held, the property being sold by private treaty, the consideration being the payment of the taxes for which the property was originally sold with intervening taxes and charges, the purchaser taking a quitclaim deed, that even though the deed was invalid the payment made by the purchaser inured for the benefit of the original owner and extinguished the city's title. Langley v. Chapin, 184 Mass. 83.

Under Mansf. (Ark.) Dig., § 474, providing that a lien of the vendor, when expressed on the face of the conveyance, shall inure to the benefit of the assignee of the note or obligation to secure payment of the purchase price, the lien will not pass by assignment of the debt where the vendor conveys the title by an absolute deed. Croesland v. Powers (Ark.) April 19, 1890.

In Moore v. Ligon, 23 W. Va. 282, a married woman purchasing land under order of the court contracted with a third party for the payment of the unpaid purchase money substituting him as the purchaser, except as to a specified portion, the third party paying all the consideration money and the wife refusing to carry out the contract. It was held that such third party was entitled to have the purchase money treated as an unauthorized payment and it was therefore no discharge of the debt due from her under the original contract, and to have the same enforced for his benefit.

XI. Mortgage debt.

A junior mortgagee or judgment creditor has a right to protect his lien or interest by paying a prior mortgage due and payable, and if he does pay it, he succeeds by subrogation, on settled principles of equity, to the rights and interests of such prior mortgagee in the lands, as security for the amount so paid, without any assignment or act of transfer, by or on the part of the prior mortgagee. Brainard v. Cooper, 10 N. Y. 358; Silver Lake Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. 370, 1 L. ed. 871; Dale v. McEvlers, 2 Cow. 118; McLean v. Towle, 8 Sandf. Ch. 119, 7 L. ed. 733; Burnet v. Denniston, 5 Johns. Ch. 36, 1 L. ed. 999; Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 96.

Where he could not protect himself without paying the antecedent mortgage, his right to be subrogated was perfect and complete. Nor does it matter that the motion was made after instead of before judgment, if the mortgage is an existing lien upon the property mortgaged. Twombly v. Cassidy, 22 N. Y. 159; Johnson v. Zink, 51 N. Y. 338; McLean v. Tompkins, 18 Abb. Pr. 24; Marsh v. Pike, 10 Paige, 565, 4 L. ed. 1104; Averill v. Taylor, 8 N. Y. 44; Sanford v. McLean, 8 Paige, 117, 3 L. ed. 80, 23 Am. Dec. 773.

It is necessary for one paying a mortgage debt to show a payment at the mortgagee's instigation, or for the purpose of protecting his own interest, before he can be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee. Norton v. Highleyman, 88 Mo. 621; Wolff v. Walter, 56 Mo. 233.

Where a mortgage was paid off with money provided by a third person with the intention of purchasing the security for the party making such payment, the court held that the mortgage would not be considered satisfied. Denton v. Cole, 30 N. J. Eq. 244.

It would be otherwise if such payment were made with the mortgagee's money, even though with the intention of remortgaging. Ibid.

The payment by a creditor of a mortgage debt in foreclosure proceedings is not a voluntary payment. Payne v. Hathaway, 3 Vt. 212, where the creditor could otherwise receive no benefit from his debtor's estate.

Before a third party making payment of a debt secured by mortgage can be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, he must show either that he made the payment at the request of the mortgagor, or to protect some interest he has of his own at the time of the payment. Norton v. Highleyman and Wolff v. Walter, supra; Evans v. Halleck, 88 Mo. 376.

The payment of the mortgage debt by a third party at the request of the mortgagor with an arrangement to have the mortgage lien and a new mortgage, entitles the party paying to be subro-

79 Pa. 354, 21 Am. Rep. 66; Story, Const. § 1297; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 548. This is a good reason for disallowing the judgment.

Argument is made that, in Pennsylvania, judgment upon two returns of nilhil habet is good, and as effective as a return of scire facias. As I find no return whatever of the scire facias, I have not so closely examined this question as otherwise I would have done. There seems some authority for the proposition that two returns of nilhil will sustain a judgment in personam. Compher v. Anawalt, 2 Watts, 490. The cases cited by counsel (Warder v. Tainter, 4 Watts, 274; Taylor v. Young, 71 Pa. 85; Colley v. Latimer, 5 Serg. & R. 211; Edmonson v. Nichols, 23 Pa. 74; Chambers v. Carson, 2 Whart. 9; Hartman v. Ogborn, 54 Pa. 120, 93 Am. Dec. 679; Allison v. Rankin, 7 Serg. & R. 269) were cases of scire facias sur mortgage, as to which the rule of judgment of foreclosure upon two nilhils seems established in Pennsylvania. The practice of taking judgment on two returns of nilhil is properly, perhaps, confined to scire facias upon a mortgage. The case of Compher v. Anawalt, supra, says, in the opinion, that it is liable to abuse; and I notice, in the case of Ouster v. Dotterer, 8 Watts & S. 28 (decided only seven years after the former case), the opinion says that, as a judgment on scire facias is a new judgment, two returns of nilhil will not do. I should gated to the rights of the first mortgagee, if such new mortgage be void. Crippen v. Chappel, 35 Kan. 495, 57 Am. Rep. 192.

Where a party paid off an execution from a judgment on a mortgage bond with money raised upon his own note and the mortgagor's securities, and had the same marked to his credit, the court held him entitled to the judgment, and also to an assignment of the mortgage. Borland v. Meurer, 139 Pa. 518.

Where one at the request of another advances his money to redeem or even pay off a security in which that other has an interest, or to the discharge of which he is bound, in the absence of an express agreement one would be implied, if necessary that it shall subsist for his use and it will be so enforced. Gans v. Thieme, 98 N. Y. 232.

Where a third party obtained, at the request of a mortgagor, an absolute assignment of the mortgage after possession taken for foreclosure purposes and paid the amount of the mortgage, the court held that such party did not postpone the foreclosure or make himself a trustee for the mortgagor by an oral agreement, but held the mortgage as security for the defense, and the estate for the use and benefit of the mortgagor, permitting the latter to sell paying the proceeds to the party so discharging the mortgage, until reimbursed with permission for the mortgagor to redeem at any time. Capen v. Richardson, 7 Gray, 364.

Where the friend of a mortgagor paid part of a debt pending foreclosure proceedings with the approval of the mortgagee, upon an agreement for a lien pro tanto, it was held that such party was an assignee in equity, so that junior incumbrancers could not treat the same as a partial payment in an action for account between the mortgagee and such junior incumbrancers. McMillan v. Gordon, 4 Ala. 715.

In Silver Lake Bank v. North, supra, a mortgagee was subrogated to the rights of an execution creditor upon paying off the judgment.

Such a payment in discharge of a mortgage of a partnership property will not extinguish the mortgage, it being the payment by the partner himself in effect. Stebbins v. Willard, 53 Vt. 685.

Where the payment of another's bid at a sheriff's sale of mortgaged property was made without consent or knowledge of the bidder, upon the mistaken notion that such payment would vest the title in him, the court held it a mistake of law, and that such payment as a mere volunteer gave the payor no such rights. Ibid.; Norton v. Higleyman, 88 Mo. 621.

Where a party, at the request of a mortgagor in foreclosure proceedings, took the mortgagor's note for usurious interest secured by a mortgage and collateral security, the court held, such party not being otherwise connected with the proceedings, that he was not entitled, as against intervening incumbrancers, to be subrogated to the rights of a first mortgagee, as it was not in his interest or duty to make such payment. Downer v. Wilson, 83 Vt. 1.

Where a mortgage by husband and wife upon the latter's furniture was paid off by the husband's father, who received the papers, and an assignment thereof without the wife's concurrence, the court held such payment created no right to subrogation or substitution, and that the wife held her property free from the mortgage debt. Moody v. Moody, 68 Me. 155.

Payment of a note secured by mortgage by one not bound for it, and who had no interest in discharging it, will not subrogate him to the rights of the party to whom he paid. Well v. Enterprise Ginney & Mfg. Co. 42 La. Ann. 492.

The payment of a mortgage debt by a third person was held not to exempt the property from an execution, such payment alone not vesting an interest in either the debt or property in such party. Woods v. Gilson, 17 Ill. 218.

A party paying a note and mortgage at the request of the mortgagor upon an understanding that he is to have a new mortgage and note which are never executed is entitled to enforce the old mortgage. Lockwood v. Marsh, 3 Nev. 133.

A party taking an assignment of the equity of redemption and paying the mortgage note upon the understanding that he held the same in the same manner as the mortgagee has a lien. Morrow v. United States Mortg. Co. 96 Ind. 21.

XII. Creditor of wife.

In Kenyon v. Farris, 47 Conn. 510, 36 Am. Rep. 83, the defendant was sued for money furnished to his wife and expended by her in the purchase of necessities. The court held that the same could be recovered from the husband in equity although not at law.

The husband is only chargeable at law for necessities supplied to his wife at her request and not with moneys lent or advanced to her, yet where such money has been applied to the payment of necessities furnished to her equity will put the party lending in the place of the party supplying the necessities. Walker v. Simpson, 7 Watts & S. 83, 42 Am. Dec. 216.

The two preceding cases are commented upon and dissented from in Skinner v. Tirrell, 21 L. R. A. 678, 159 Mass. 474, as are also the English authorities upon which they are based. In that case, however, the court mainly based its refusal of relief upon the ground that the wife had a statutory right of action against the husband refusing or neglecting to support her.

The English cases held the husband liable for necessities supplied under such circumstances. Harris v. Lee, 2 P. Wms. 482; Deare v. Soutten, L. R. 9 Eq. 151; Jenner v. Morris, 3 DeG. F. & J. 45, 30 L. J. Ch. 361, 7 Jur. N. S. 373, 3 L. T. N. S. 871, 9 Week. Rep. 391. E. W.

doubt as to personal judgments. But though such a judgment would be good in Pennsylvania, it does not follow that it would be good here, for the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Steel v. Smith, 7 Watts & S. 447, in an opinion delivered by the eminent Chief Justice Gibson, held that a judgment of Louisiana on attachment of property and summons served on one of the joint owners, which by the Louisiana law was good as to all defendants, was a nullity in the courts of Pennsylvania as to parties not served. The only Pennsylvania statute to which I have access provides that service of process on a corporation shall be on its president or other chief officer, cashier, treasurer, secretary, or chief clerk. No service of any kind appears here. For this reason the judgment was properly disallowed. No plea of nul tiel record was necessary. It is a chancery suit, and concerns the audit of debts, on a reference before a master; and when the judgment creditors presented the judgment, adverse interests could contest it on any legal ground without formal plea. I remark that it was not this scire facias judgment which was considered on the appeal reported in Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Co. v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. 83 W. Va. 761, but the original one. But let us suppose that the judgments were valid, and that, treating Clark & Co.'s payment simply as a payment, it would be cut off by the judgment so the payment could not now be pleaded. What then? Jamison & Co. are no longer its owners, but Clark & Co. are assignees of it, and they are not asking its allowance, but Jamison & Co. are claiming for their own use. When Clark & Co. paid it, the law implied that Jamison & Co. would assign it to them, and, without assignment actual, a court of equity treats them as its equitable owners. The case of Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625, in point 4, clearly supports this position. Boyce's evidence, uncontradicted, is that Jamison & Co., in the agreement they made with him promised to assign the judgment to him, and their attorney did transmit him a copy of the judgment. Now, if this evidence is not forbidden from consideration by the execution of the writing between Clark & Co. and Jamison & Co., then either Clark & Co. or Boyce have an express agreement to assign, tantamount to an assignment, and, though no actual assignment be made, equity regards it as an equitable assignment; and this is the letter of point 5 in Neely v. Jones, supra, and Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 185. It may be with some force said that, as between Jamison & Co. and Boyce, the assignment should go to Boyce, and then there would be no ground for saying that the oral agreement to assign would be excluded by the writing. In fact, Jamison & Co. admit in their petition for the appeal that they assigned it to Boyce; so this court ought not to decree it to them. Thus, I think, law excludes the allowance of this judgment to Jamison & Co., and this conclusion accords with the real justice of the case. Jamison & Co. only wanted the amount they advanced to the Central Improvement Company. They got it. They do not deny, but admit, they received all the company owed

And now as to U. L. Boyce's claim to said Jamison & Co.'s judgment. He has no title to it, to his own use. Any shadow of interest that may be vested in him was for other use than his own: First, He negotiated for the acquirement of it from Jamison & Co. for Clark & Co. as financial agents of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, whose vice-president Boyce was at that very time, and in whose service and interest he acted touching this judgment. Clark & Co. paid for the judgment, and took the contract in their name. Boyce explicitly says as a witness, and in a letter to Doran, that he was to get assignment of it, and transfer it to the parties furnishing the money, and that Clark & Co. furnished the money. Never was a resulting trust more plainly established than that any show of technical right in Boyce was for the use of Clark & Co. And then, further, consider that Clark & Co. were agents of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, and Boyce its vice-president. And that he was acting for it, he does not deny, but admits; and a receipt to his company for hotel bill on the trip to acquire the judgment confirms it.

Thus we conclude that neither Jamison & Co. nor Boyce have right to this judgment. It is urged by counsel that the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, in a certain answer, stated that a balance was due on this judgment, treating it thus as not paid. If it belonged to the Fidelity Company, under its mortgage, could the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company, by this admission, prejudice the right of that company? It could not. But, if the Shenandoah Valley Railroad Company owned it, it could say, with entire consistency with the fact that Clark & Co. had paid it as regards Jamison & Co., that a balance was due on it from the Central Improvement Company, as it had never paid it. As assignee, it could say that the Central Improvement Company yet owed a balance.

Barclay's and Green's Demands.

Barclay filed before the commissioner, and asked payment out of the fund, an account for $10,000, for services for four years and one month as president of the Central Improvement Company, and Green filed an account for $6,250 for two and one-half years' services as treasurer and secretary. Both these gentlemen were stockholders and directors of the company. The commissioner rejected the claims. The Central Improvement Company is a Pennsylvania corporation, having its habitat and chief office there, and there the services were performed and were to be paid for, if at all; and, if any contract were implied by law to pay compensation for service of those officers of the corporation, it would be a Pennsylvania contract. Hence, the law of that state operates upon the case specially. We must therefore see whether the law of Pennsylvania would raise an implied contract to pay for such service. Klinck v. Price, 4 W. Va. 4, 6 Am. Rep. 268; Stevens v. Brown, 20 W. Va. 450; Heffebauer v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16. There was no express contract to pay for such services, and, if there can be any recovery therefor, it must be on the theory that the law raises an implied promise to pay for the service. I think the case of Kilpatrick v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co., 49 Pa. 118, 88 Am. Dec. 497, uncontrollably decides against the allowance of these accounts. It holds that "corporations are not liable on a quantum meruit for services performed by their officers. There must be an express contract for compensation, or there can be no recovery." In that case, Sersill claimed for service as president, and Kilpatrick as treasurer, as in this case, and the court held that they could not recover. The court said: "The salary or compensation of corporate officers is usually fixed by a by-law or by a resolution either of the directors or stockholders, but, where no salary has been fixed, none can be recovered. Corporate offices are usually filled by the chief promoters of the corporation, whose interests in the stock or in other incidental advantages is supposed to be a motive for executing the duties of the office without compensation, and this presumption prevails until overcome by an express prearrangement of salary. Hence, we held in Accommodation Loan & Sav. Fund Assn. v. Stonemetz, 29 Pa. 534, as a general principle, that a director of a corporation, elected to serve without compensation, could not recover in an action against the company for services rendered in that capacity, though a subsequent resolution of the board, agreeing to pay him for past services, was shown. . . . And the rule is just as applicable to presidents and treasurers and other officers as to directors. . . . It is well the law is so. Corporate officers have ample opportunities to adjust and fix their compensation before they render service, and no great mischief is likely to result from compelling them to do so. But if, on the other hand, actions are to be maintained by corporate officers for services, which, however faithful and valuable, were not rendered on the foot of an express contract, there would be no limitation to corporate liabilities, and stockholders would be devoured by officers." In the later case of Martindale v. Wilson-Cass Co., 134 Pa. 348, it is held: "The general rule on the subject of compensation to the directors of a private corporation is that they are not entitled to compensation for official services unless it is provided for in the corporate charter or by-laws. In the absence of such provision, a director or president of such corporation cannot recover pay for official services, when no agreement for compensation preceded them, no presumption of such agreement arising from their performance." A by-law of the Central Improvement Company provided that the directors "shall have power to appoint all other officers or agents of the company, and fix the compensation and define the duties of all their officers or agents," but the directors never fixed any compensation. This was a mere power, given to be exercised or not, as the directors might choose, and does not itself give compensation, and the very fact that the directors, having this power, never exercised it, negatives the idea that any compensation was intended. Re Bolt & Iron Co., 14 Ont. Rep. 211. So it is clear that, under the Pennsylvania law, these officers can recover nothing.

Though not necessary to go further, my examination has led me to the conclusion that the decisions in Pennsylvania reflect the true rule applicable nearly everywhere, in denying pay without express provision or contract, not only to the president, but a treasurer or secretary, when stockholders or directors. The authorities have led my mind to the conclusion that the law raises no implied promise to pay compensation to directors, president, or vice-president of a private corporation, in the absence of provision in by-law or order of the directors. They are trustees charged with the funds, and cannot recover on a quantum meruit. Gridley v. Lafayette, B. & M. R. Co. 71 Ill. 200; Cheaney v. Lafayette, B. & M. R. Co. 68 Ill. 570, 18 Am. Rep. 584; Santa Clara Min. Assn. v. Meredith, 49 Md. 889, 38 Am. Rep. 264; Citizens Nat. Bank v. Elliott, 55 Iowa, 104, 39 Am. Rep. 167; Swayer v. Farmers Bank, 6 Allen, 207; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Ketchum, 27 Conn. 180; Ogden v. Murray, 89 N. Y. 202; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 208. And that if the treasurer, secretary, or other executive officer be a stockholder or director, no such promise is raised by law in his favor; but, if not, then the law does raise such promise, and presume that pay was intended, from the fact of appointment, and he may get compensation. Smith v. Long Island E. Co. 102 N. Y. 190; Holder v. Lafayette, B. & M. R. Co. 71 Ill. 106, 109, 23 Am. Rep. 89; Cheaney v. Lafayette, B. & M. R. Co. 68 Ill. 570, 18 Am. Rep. 584; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 200; note to Grundy v. Pine Hill Coal Co. (Ky.) 28 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 616. Of course, I do not here speak of the mere employés of corporations, they being entitled to compensation.

Therefore, so much of the decree of March 2, 1891, as rejects the claim of B. K. Jamison & Co. and U. L. Boyce to said judgment, and the said accounts of R. D. Barclay and John P. Green, is affirmed.

George M. COTE

Hugh MURPHY et al., Appts.

1. Greed of profit or malice toward others is an essential element to an unlawful conspiracy at common law to restrain trade.
2. A combination of employers to resist an advance in wages determined upon by an association of employees, by refusing to sell to any persons who concede such advance, is not an unlawful conspiracy, since the passage of the Pennsylvania statute making it lawful for employes to combine to raise wages, and to persuade by all lawful means others from working for a less sum, as such combination is not to lower the price of wages as regulated by supply and demand, but to resist an artificial price made by a combination which by statute is lawful.
3. That one whose business is injured by a combination of employers to resist a demand of workmen for an increase of wages is not a workman nor a member of a workmen's union will not entitle him to recover his damages from the members of the combine if the combination was lawful as to the workmen and he had undertaken to aid their cause.
4. Sending notices to wholesalers that members of an employers' organization formed to resist a demand by workmen for an increase in wages will withdraw their patronage if sales are made to persons acquiescing in the workmen's demand is not such coercion or threat as will render the combination unlawful.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused to plaintiff by reason of a conspiracy between defendants to damage plaintiff in his business. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.
Messrs. J. McF. Carpenter, J. S. Ferguson and E. G. Ferguson, for appellants:

All that can be claimed by the plaintiff is that the defendants in effect declared to Woods, Jenks & Co., Loeb, and others, that they would not buy from them if they sold to Cote while he was employing strikers and selling to persons who had acceded to their demands, and that they, believing that the trade of the defendants was more valuable to them than that of Cote, saw fit for the time being to discontinue dealing with him. They were free in every sense of the word to do as they pleased.

Any one of the defendants could have done any of these things without incurring any legal responsibility.

Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. 13 Lea, 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666; Haywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 227, 46 Am. Rep. 378.

If, then, each of these defendants could have lawfully done the acts complained of, why might they not all agree to do the same things?

In law a threat is a declaration of an intention or determination to injure another by the commission of some unlawful act. If the act intended to be done is not unlawful then the declaration is not a threat in law, and the effect thereof is not intimidation in a legal sense.

Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. supra.

It is absurd to say that any man is coerced to do that which he does after balancing the advantage of one course or the other to himself. The agreement of a number of men to do that which each of them could lawfully do does not make an actionable conspiracy.

NOTE.—The law of conspiracy as touching the lawfulness of combinations of employes or employers has become so important in the last few years that any new development of that branch of the law must claim attention. In the above case the lawfulness of a combination of employers to resist demands of employes is held to be implied from the statutory right of employes to make a combination which the employers are resisting, and this is we believe a new point in the law of this subject.

different partnerships and individuals composing these associations were in the business of contracting and building, and furnishing building material of all kinds. On the 1st of May, 1891, there was a strike of the carpenters, masons, and bricklayers in the building trades, bringing about, to a large extent, a stoppage of building. The men demanded an eight-hour day, with no reduction in wages theretofore paid, which the employers refused to grant. Then a strike by the unions of the different trades was declared. The plaintiff at the time, was doing business in the city of Pittsburgh, as a dealer in building materials. He was not a member of either the Planing Mill Association, or of the Builders' Exchange. There were also contractors and builders, who belonged to neither of these organizations, who conceded the demands of the workmen. They sought to secure building material from dealers, wherever they could, and thus go on with their contracts. If they succeeded in purchasing the necessary material, the result would be that at least some of the striking workmen would have employment at a higher rate of wages than the two associations were willing to pay. The tendency of this was to strengthen the cause of the strikers, for those employed were able to contribute to the support of their fellow workmen who were idle. The two associations already named sought to enlist all concerned, as contractors and builders, or as dealers in supplies, whether members of the associations or not, in the furtherance of the one object,—resistance to the demands of the workmen. The plaintiff, and six other individuals or firms engaged in the same business, refused to join them, and undertook to continue sales of building material to those builders who had conceded the eight hour day. The Planing Mill Association and Builders' Exchange tried to limit their ability to carry on work at the advance by inducing lumber dealers and others to refrain from shipping or selling them, in quantities, the lumber and other material necessary to carrying on the retail business. In several instances their efforts were successful, and the plaintiff did not succeed in purchasing lumber from certain of the wholesale dealers in Cleveland and Dubois, where he wanted to buy. The defendants were active members of one or other or both of the associations engaged in the contest with the striking workmen. The strike continued about two months. After it was at an end, the plaintiff brought suit against defendants, averring an unlawful and successful conspiracy to injure him in his business, and to interfere with the course of trade generally, to the injury of the public; that the conspiracy was carried out by a refusal to sell to him building materials, themselves, and by threats and intimidation preventing other dealers from doing so. Under the instructions of the court upon the evidence, there was a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $2,500 damages, which the court reduced to $1,500; then judgment; and from that defendants take this appeal.

The plaintiff's case is not one which appeals very strongly to a sense of justice. The mechanics of Pittsburgh, engaged in the different building trades, on the 1st of May, 1891, demanded that eight hours should be computed as a day, in payment of their wages. Their right to do this is clear. It is one of the indefeasible rights of a mechanic or a laborer, in this commonwealth, to fix such value on his services as he sees proper, and under the constitution there is no power lodged anywhere to compel him to work for less than he chooses to accept. But in this case the workmen went further. They agreed that no one of them would work for less than the demand, and by all lawful means, such as reasoning and persuasion, they would prevent other workmen from working for less. Their right to do this is also clear. At common law, this last was a conspiracy, and indictable, but under the Acts of 1869, 1872, 1876, and 1891, employees, acting together by agreement, may, with few exceptions, lawfully do all those things which the common law declared a conspiracy. They are still forbidden, in the prosecution of a strike, preventing any one of their number who may desire to labor from doing so, by force, or menace of harm to person or property; but the strike here was conducted, throughout, in a lawful, orderly manner. The employers—contractors and others engaged in building and furnishing supplies, members of the two associations already mentioned, to which these defendants belonged—refused to concede the demands of the workmen, and there then followed a prolonged and bitter contest. The members of the associations refused to furnish supplies to those engaged in the construction of any building where the contractor had conceded the eight-hour day. This, as individual dealers, they had a clear right to do. They could sell and deliver their material to whom they pleased. But they also went further. They agreed among themselves that no member of the association would furnish supplies to those who were in favor of, or had conceded, the eight-hour day, and that they would dissuade other dealers, not members of the associations, from furnishing building material to such contractors or retail dealers. To the extent of their power, this agreement was carried out. This, clearly was combination, and the acts of assembly referred to do not, in terms, embrace employers. They only include, within their express terms, workmen. Hence, it is argued by counsel for appellee, these defendants are subject to all the common-law liability of conspirators, in their attempts to resist the demands for increased wages; that is, there can be a combination among workmen to advance wages, but there can be no such combination of employers to resist the advance. That which, by statute, is permitted to the one side, the common law still denies to the other. If this position be well taken, we then have this inequality: The plaintiff, who is aiding a combination, either directly or indirectly, intentionally or unintentionally, to advance wages, sues, for damages, members of another combination, who resist the advance. Nor is there any difference in the character of the acts or means on both sides in furtherance of their purposes. The workmen will not work themselves, and they use persuasion and reason with their fellows to keep them from going to work, until the demand is conceded. The employers will not sell to contractors who concede the demand, and they do their best to persuade others engaged in the said business from doing so. Then, the element of real damage to plaintiff is absent. By far the larger number of dealers in the city and county were members of the combination which refused to sell. Only the plaintiff and six others refused to enter the combination. The result was that these seven had almost a monopoly of furnishing supplies to all builders who conceded the advance. Plaintiff admits in his own testimony that thereby his business and profits largely increased. In a few instances, he paid more to wholesale dealers, and put in more time buying, than he would have done if the associations had not interfered with those who sold him. But it is not denied that as a result of the combination he was, individually, a large gainer. True, he avers that if defendants had gone no further than to refuse to sell, themselves, he would have made a great deal more money; that is, he did not make as large a sum as he would have made if they had not dissuaded others, not members of the association, from selling to him. But that, by the fact of the combinations and strike, he was richer at the end than when they commenced, is not questioned.

We then have these facts, somewhat peculiar in the administration of justice: A plaintiff suing and recovering damages for an alleged unlawful act, of which he himself, in so far as he aided the workmen's combination, is also guilty, and both acts springing from the same source,—a contest between employers and employed as to the price of daily wages,—and then the further fact that this contest, instead of damaging him, resulted largely to his profit. We assume, so far as concerns defendants, if their agreement was unlawful, or, if lawful, it was carried out by unlawful acts, to the damage of plaintiff, the judgment should stand. All the authorities of this state go to show that, while the act of an individual may not be unlawful, yet the same act, when committed by a combination of two or more, may be unlawful, and therefore be actionable. A dictum of Lord Denman in Rex v. Seaward, 1 Ad. & El. 711, gives this definition of a "conspiracy": "It is either a combination to procure an unlawful object, or to procure a lawful object by unlawful means." This leaves still undetermined the meaning to be given the words "lawful" and "unlawful," in their connection in the antithesis. An agreement may be unlawful, in the sense that the law will not aid in its enforcement, or recognize it as binding upon those who have made it, yet not unlawful in the sense that it will punish those who are parties to it, either criminally or by a verdict in damages. Lord Denman is reported to have said afterwards in Reg. v. Peck, 9 Ad. & El. 690, that his definition was not very correct. See note to section 2291, 8 Wharton on Criminal Law. It is conceded, however, in the case in hand, 28 L. R. A.

any one of defendants, acting for himself, had a right to refuse to sell to those favoring the eight-hour day, and so, acting for himself, had the right to dissuade others from selling. If the act were unlawful at all, it was because of the combination of a number. Gibson, J., in Com. v. Carlisle, Bright. (Pa.) 40, says: "Where the act is lawful for the individual, it can be the subject of conspiracy, when done in concert, only where there is a direct intention that injury shall result from it, or where the object is to benefit the conspirators to the prejudice of the public or the oppression of individuals, and where such prejudice or oppression is the natural and necessary consequence." In the same case it is held: "A combination is criminal wherever the act to be done has a necessary tendency to prejudice the public, or to oppress individuals by unjustly subjecting them to the power of the confederacy, and giving effect to the purposes of the latter, whether of extortion or mischief. According to this view of the law, a combination of employers to depress the wages of journeymen below what they would be if there was no recurrence to artificial means on either side is criminal." This case puts the law against the combination in as strong terms, if not stronger, than any others of our own state. The significant qualification of the general principle, as mentioned in the last three lines, will be noticed: "If there was no recurrence to artificial means on either side." The prejudice to the public is the use of artificial means to affect prices, whereby the public suffers. A combination of stock-brokers, to corner a stock; of farmers, to raise the price of grain; of manufacturers, to raise the price of their product; of employers, to reduce the price of labor; of workmen, to raise the price,—were at the date of that decision, at common law, all conspiracies. The fixed theory of courts and legislators then was that the price of everything ought to be, and in the absence of combination necessarily would be, regulated by supply and demand. The first to deny the justice of this theory, and to break away from it, was labor; and this was soon followed by the legislation already noticed, relieving workmen from the penalties of what for more than a century had been declared unlawful combinations or conspiracies. Wages, it was argued, should be fixed by the fair proportion labor had contributed in production. The market price, determined by supply and demand, might or might not be fair wages,—often was not,—and as long as workmen were not free, by combination, to insist on their right to fair wages, oppression by capital, or, which is the same thing, by their employers, followed. It is not our business to pass on the soundness of the theories which prompt the enactment of statutes. One thing, however is clear: The moment the legislature relieves one, and by far the larger number, of the citizens of the commonwealth from the common-law prohibitions against combinations to raise the price of labor, and by a combination the price was raised, down went the foundation on which common-law conspiracy was based, as to that particular subject. Before any legislation on the question, it was held that a combination of workmen to raise the price of labor, or of employers to depress it, was unlawful, because such combination interfered with the price, which would otherwise be regulated by supply and demand. This interference was in restraint of trade or business, and prejudicial to the public at large. Such combination made an artificial price. Workmen, by reason of the combination, were not willing to work for what, otherwise, they would accept. Employers would not pay what, otherwise, they would consider fair wages. Supply and demand consist in the amount of labor for sale, and the needs of the employer who buys. If more men offered to sell labor than are needed, the price goes down, and the employer buys cheap. If fewer than required offer, the price goes up, and he buys dear. As every seller and buyer is free to bargain for himself, the price is regulated solely by supply and demand. On this reasoning was founded common-law conspiracy, in this class of cases. But in this case the workmen, without regard to the supply of labor, or the demand for it, agreed upon what, in their judgment, is a fair price, and then combined in a demand for payment of that price. When refused, in pursuance of the combination, they quit work, and agree not to work until the demand is conceded. Further, they agree, by lawful means, to prevent all others, not members of the combination, from going to work until the employers agree to pay the price fixed by the combination. And this, as long as no force was used, or menaces to person or property, they had a lawful right to do; and, so far as is known to us, the rise demanded by them may have been a fair one. But it is nonsense to say that this was a price fixed by supply and demand. It was fixed by a combination of workmen on their combined judgment as to its fairness; and, that the supply might not lessen it, they combined to prevent all other workmen in the market from accepting less. Then followed the combination of employers, not to lower the wages theretofore paid, but to resist the demand of a combination for an advance; not to resist an advance which would naturally follow a limited supply in the market, for the supply, so far as the workmen belonging to the combination were concerned, was, by combination, wholly withdrawn, and, as to workmen other than members, to the extent of their power, they kept them out of the market. By artificial means, the market supply was almost wholly cut off. The combination of the employers, then, was not to interfere with the price of labor, as determined by the common law theory, but to defend themselves against a demand made altogether regardless of the price, as regulated by the supply. The element of an unlawful combination to restrain trade because of greed of profit to themselves, or of malice towards plaintiff or others, is lacking, and this is the essential element on which is founded all the decisions as to common-law conspiracy in this class of cases; and, however unchanged may be the law as to combinations of employers to interfere with wages, where such combinations take the initiative, they certainly do not depress a market price, when they combine to resist a combination to artificially advance price. "The reason of the law is the life of the law," and, as given in the cases cited by appellee, irresistibly impels to the conclusion that the combination here was not unlawful; a conclusion which is clearly indicated in Com. v. Carlisle, supra,—that it would not be unlawful if there was first recurrence to artificial means by workmen to raise the market price. Here, the first step provocative of a combination by the employers was an attempt, by lawful, artificial means on part of the workmen, to control the supply of labor, preparatory to a demand for an advance. Nor does the fact that the appellee was not a workman, nor a member of any of the unions of workmen, put him in any better attitude than if he were. He undertook, for his own profit, to aid the cause of the workmen. His right so to do was unquestionable. But if the employers, by a lawful combination, could limit his ability so to do, they did not make themselves answerable in damages to him for the consequences of a lawful act.

The case of Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co., 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 169, is not in point. It was the attempt to enforce the collection of a draft given by one member of a combination formed to raise the price of coal to another, in consideration of certain stipulations in the agreement. It was held that the combination, being in restraint of trade, was unlawful, and, as the draft was given in pursuance of the unlawful contract, it, also, was tainted with the illegality, and there could be no recovery. But, if the agreement itself were not unlawful, were the methods to carry it out unlawful? If the employers' combination here had used illegal methods or means to prevent other dealers from selling supplies to plaintiff, the conspiracy might still have been found to exist. The threats referred to, although what are usually termed "threats," were not so in a legal sense. To have said they would inflict bodily harm on other dealers, or vilify them in the newspapers, or bring on them social ostracism, or similar declarations,—these the law would have deemed threats, for they may deter a man of ordinary courage from the prosecution of his business in a way which accords with his own notions. But to say—and even that is inferential from the correspondence—that if they continued to sell to plaintiff the members of the association would not buy from them, is not a threat. It does not interfere with the dealer's free choice. It may have prompted him to a somewhat sordid calculation. He may have considered which custom was most profitable, and have acted accordingly. But this was not such coercion and threats as constituted the acts of the combination unlawful. Rogers v. Dutt, 18 Moore, P. C. C. 209; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis (Minn.) 55 N. W. Rep. 1119 (not yet officially reported). On the main question the case last cited goes further than we are called upon to go, as yet, in this state. It holds that what is not unlawful when done by an individual cannot be unlawful when done by many, and therefore the combination not to deal with those who broke the rules of the association was not a conspiracy. For this a number of cases from other states, as well as from England, are cited. But the law in this state has heretofore been determined otherwise, from a very early day, by an unbroken line of decisions, which here call for no qualification; for, so far as concerns the facts of this case, the legislature has so changed the law as to render these decisions inapplicable. We concede, however, that the decisions of other courts are by no means uniform. Mr. Wright, in his work on the Law of Criminal Conspiracies and Agreements (London, 1873), says: "It is conceived that, on a review of all the decisions, there is a great preponderance of authority in favor of the proposition that as a rule an agreement or combination is not criminal, unless it be for acts or omissions, whether as ends or means, which would be criminal apart from agreement." Logically, the same rule would apply, as was held in Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, to combinations which, although not criminal, are alleged to be unlawful. But without regard to whether the general rule be settled by weight of authority, as claimed by appellants, we hold here that this combination was not unlawful, because (1) it was not made to lower the price of wages, as regulated by the supply and demand, but to resist an artificial price made by a combination which, by statute, was not unlawful; (2) the methods adopted to further the objects of the combination were not unlawful.

Another point has been most earnestly pressed upon our consideration by counsel for appellants. It is argued that, under our declaration of rights, either the Acts of Assembly of 1869, 1872, 1876, and 1891, exempting employes from the penalties of unlawful combination to fix the price of labor, are void, because, by their terms, they embrace only a particular class of citizens of the commonwealth, or their scope must be enlarged beyond the express terms of these acts, so as to include within their protection all those interested in the same subject of legislation. It is argued that it is not within the power of the legislature to declare some citizens innocent of any offense against the law, for the very same act which, when committed by some others in the same business, the law will still hold to be criminal; that what the statute declares is not conspiracy in one case cannot, under the law, be conspiracy in the other; and therefore, in every contest of this kind between workmen and employers, the statute, if not void, must at least be held to operate equally to the exemption of all citizens interested in the subject affected by the combination. If there be nothing criminal in a combination to artificially raise wages, there can be nothing criminal in an employers' combination to resist the advance, or to artificially depress them. This question is not in the case, in the view we have taken of the facts. We are at all times averse to passing on questions, the answers to which are not necessary to a decision of the case immediately before us. Much less are we inclined to discuss and decide questions involving the constitutional power of a co-ordinate branch of the government. For this reason we refrain from a consideration of the able argument of counsel for appellants on this point.

The refusal of the court below to affirm appellants' seventh prayer for instructions, that "under all the evidence the verdict must be for defendants," was error, and, being here assigned for error, the appeal is sustained, and judgment reversed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois, ex rel.
Tida BRADLEY,

v.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, etc., OF ILLINOIS STATE REFORMATORY.

1. A sentence to a state reformatory of an infant charged with crime must be regarded as a penalty and punishment for crime, where the statute authorizes sentence only after conviction of crime and requires the sentence to be "to imprisonment."

2. The maximum term of imprisonment for a crime is to be taken as that for which an infant is sentenced to a reformatory, where the statute provides that the court shall not fix the limit of duration of the term, but that it shall not exceed the maximum term provided by law for that crime and that it may be terminated by the board of managers on certain conditions.

3. A constitutional provision that "all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense" is not violated by committing infants to a reformatory with a maximum sentence for the crime, subject to be

NOTE.—The disposition and treatment of children convicted of crime has become a question of the highest practical importance and the conformity to the constitution of statutes relating to this matter is not altogether without difficulty.

In respect to general power of the state to assume the guardianship of children, see Whalen v. Olmstead (Conn.) 15 L. R. A. 598, and note.

As to commitment of minors to reformatories without conviction of crime, see State v. Brown (Mich.) 16 L. R. A. 601, and note.

When infants have actually committed crime their punishment therefor is clearly within the department of criminal law. The validity of sentences which shall be contingent on good behavior or subject in any way to the discretion of the managers of a reformatory, which is a question touched in the above case, is one that touches the vital point in respect to such institutions. As to the lawfulness of paroles or conditional pardons, see note to People v. Cummings (Mich.) 14 L. R. A. 235.

reduced on recommendation of the board of managers, while an adult convicted of the same crime has a statutory right to have the term of his imprisonment within the limits fixed by statute determined by a jury.

4. The constitutional right of trial by jury does not extend in a criminal case to the determination of the term of imprisonment by the jury.
5. Articles 5 and 8 of the Amendments to the United States Constitution have no application to the states.
6. The unconstitutionality of a section as to the transfer of incorrigible infants from a reformatory to a penitentiary does not make the whole statute as to the commitment of infants to reformatories necessarily void.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of Joseph Bradley and Harry Justice from the Illinois State Reformatory. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sands & Murphy for petitioner.

Mr. M. T. Moloney, Atty-Gen., for respondent:

This act is not designed for the purpose of punishment. It is not a penal act, either in its title, its scope, or its results.

Articles 5 and 8 of the Constitutional Amendments have no application to state governments.

Twitchell v. Pennsylvania, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 321, 19 L. ed. 223.

Have the petitioners been deprived of their liberty without due process of law? And has "the right of trial by jury" been interfered with?

Due process of law undoubtedly means in the due course of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights.

Board of Education of the State v. Bakewell, 123 Ill. 848.

These parties have not been deprived of their liberty without due process of law.

It is said it deprives the petitioners of a trial by jury, in this, that it does not permit the jury to fix the length of time the petitioners may be confined in this reformatory. There is no force in this. At common law, the jury found a person charged with crime, guilty or not guilty. They did not fix the punishment.

2 Bl. Com. bk. 4, p. 361.

The object of the adult's sentence is purely penal, while that of the minor's is entirely reformatory. The legislature, having power over both, might legislate in the way it thought most conducive to attain the best results. To send a minor to a reform school for one year may be of no lasting benefit to him, while one year may be a proper punishment for an adult in a penal institution. But this sentence is not indefinite, in any strict or proper sense.

See People v. Degnen, 54 Barb. 107, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 87.

It makes no difference to the petitioners in this case whether section 15 is constitutional or not. Even if it was unconstitutional, that would not release the petitioners, as the balance of the act could be properly and intelligently enforced and applied, if it was entirely eliminated.

Donnersberger v. Prendergast, 128 Ill. 234, and authorities there cited; People v. Nelson, 133 Ill. 565.

Baker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A writ of habeas corpus was issued herein by order of this court, upon the petition of Tida Bradley, for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the imprisonment and detention of Joseph Bradley and Harry Justice in the Illinois State Reformatory at Pontiac. The writ was directed to superintendent, board of managers, and officials in charge of the Illinois State Reformatory, and a return was made to the writ. Said Joseph Bradley and Harry Justice were indicted in the circuit court of Peoria county for burglary and larceny, were tried before a jury upon pleas of not guilty, and the jury returned a verdict finding them guilty in manner and form as charged in the indictment, and that they were each above the age of ten years, and under the age of twenty-one years, i. e. of the age of eighteen and twenty years, respectively. The jury did not, in their verdict, fix any punishment or term of imprisonment. Thereupon the circuit court ordered and adjudged that said Joseph Bradley and Harry Justice should be confined in the Illinois State Reformatory, in safe and secure custody, for and during a term of commitment to be terminated by the board of managers of said Illinois State Reformatory. A mittimus was issued by the clerk of the court, which contained a true copy of the final judgment and sentence of the court as entered of record, and was directed to the sheriff of Peoria county to execute; and the detention of said Joseph Bradley and Harry Justice in the reformatory is by virtue of said judgment, sentence, and commitment.

The trial and proceedings upon said indictment for burglary and larceny, and the judgment that was rendered by the court, were based upon the provisions of an act of the legislature of the state entitled "An Act to Establish the Illinois State Reformatory, and Making an Appropriation therefor," approved June 18, 1891. Laws 1891, p. 51. Section 9 of the Act divides the inmates sentenced to the reformatory into two divisions, the first to include males between the ages of ten and sixteen years, and the second to include males between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years. Section 10 provides, in substance, that in all criminal cases tried by jury, in which the jury shall find the defendant guilty, they shall also find by their verdict whether or not the defendant is between the ages of ten and twenty-one years, and, if between said ages, then find, as nearly as may be, the age of the defendant; and that if the defendant is found to be between said ages, and it shall not be shown in the cause that the defendant has previously been sentenced to a penitentiary, and if the offense of which the defendant is convicted is not a capital offense, then the jury shall not fix the punishment. Section 11 makes provision for the cases of boys between the ages of ten and sixteen years who are convicted of crime. Section 12 provides as follows: "Any court in this state exercising criminal jurisdiction may sentence to the said reformatory any male criminal between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years, and not shown to have been previously sentenced to a penitentiary in this or any other state or country, upon the conviction, in such court, of such male person, of a crime punishable under existing laws in a penitentiary. And the said board of managers shall receive and take into said reformatory all male prisoners of the class aforesaid who may be legally sentenced on conviction, as aforesaid; and all existing laws requiring the courts of the state to sentence to the penitentiary male prisoners convicted of any criminal offense, between the age of sixteen and twenty-one years, and not shown to have been previously sentenced to a state prison in this or any other state or country, shall be applicable to said reformatory so far as to enable courts to sentence the class of prisoners so last defined to said reformatory, and not to a penitentiary." Section 13 provides as follows: "Every sentence to the reformatory of a person hereafter convicted of a felony or other crime shall be a general sentence to imprisonment in the Illinois State Reformatory, and the courts of this state imposing such sentence shall not fix or limit the duration thereof. The term of such imprisonment of any person so convicted and sentenced shall be terminated by the board of managers of the reformatory, as authorized by this act; but such imprisonment shall not exceed the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which the prisoner was convicted and sentenced." Section 16 is as follows: "The said board of managers shall have power to establish rules and regulations under which prisoners within the reformatory may be allowed to go upon parole outside of the reformatory building and enclosure, but to remain while on parole in the legal custody and under control of the board of managers, and subject at any time to be taken back within the enclosure of said reformatory; and full power to enforce such rules and regulations to retake and reimprison any inmate so upon parole is hereby conferred upon said board, whose order, certified by its secretary and signed by its president, with the seal of the reformatory attached thereto, shall be a sufficient warrant for the officer named in it to authorize such officer to return to actual custody any conditionally released or pardoned prisoner, and it is hereby made the duty of all officers to execute said order the same as ordinary criminal process; provided that no prisoner shall be released on parole until the said board of managers shall have satisfactory evidence that arrangements have been made for his honorable and useful employment, for at least six months while upon parole, in some suitable occupation." Section 17, among other things, makes it the duty of the board of managers to adopt such rules concerning all prisoners committed to their custody as shall prevent them from returning to criminal courses, best secure their self-support, and accomplish their reformation. It also provides that, if any prisoner on parole shall violate the conditions of his parole or conditional release, he shall, by a formal order entered in the manager's proceedings, be declared a delinquent, and shall thereafter be treated as an escaped prisoner owing service to the state, and shall be liable, when arrested, to serve out the unexpired term of his maximum possible imprisonment. It is provided, in substance, in section 18, that when any prisoner has served not less than six months of his parole acceptably, and has given such evidence as is deemed reliable and trustworthy that he will remain at liberty without violating the law, and that his final release is not incompatible with the welfare of society, then the judge of the court that sentenced him to the reformatory shall enter an order for the final discharge of the prisoner from further liability under his sentence, such order to be based upon a record and recommendation made by the board of managers of the reformatory; and it is provided in said section that nothing in the act contained shall be construed as impairing the power of the governor to grant a pardon or commutation in any case. By section 21 the laws that govern the penitentiaries of the state, so far as they relate to the prevention of escapes and several other specified matters, are made applicable to, and declared to be in force in, the reformatory.

That in the enactment of this law it was the humane and benign intention of the general assembly to afford a means for the reformation of youthful criminals is manifest from the fact that the institution is devoted solely to the reception of minors between the ages of ten and twenty-one years, and from the various provisions of the act. At the same time we cannot concur in the suggestion made by the attorney-general that a sentence imposed by virtue of the act is not intended as, and is not in fact, a punishment for crime committed, but that such sentence is for the sole and only purpose of reforming the offender. Only those who have been convicted, before a court of competent jurisdiction, of felony or other crime, can be sentenced to the reformatory; and the act requires that the sentence shall be "to imprisonment," and uses the expression "term of imprisonment," and other like language, and uniformly employs the words "prisoner" and "prisoners" to designate those who have been committed to the reformatory. Without further reference to the various provisions of the act, many of which we have hereinbefore mentioned, we may say that in our opinion the statute is a criminal enactment, and that a sentence under it to the state reformatory must be regarded as a penalty and punishment for crime of which the party committed has been convicted. It is admitted by the relator that the judgment and sentence of the court was in accordance with the provisions of the statute, since the statute requires that every sentence to the reformatory of a person between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years, convicted of a felony or other crime, shall be a general sentence to imprisonment in the Illinois State Reformatory, that the courts imposing the sentence shall not fix or limit the duration thereof, and that the term of imprisonment shall be terminated by the board of managers, as authorized by the act. It is insisted, however, that as, by the judgment and warrant of commitment, the imprisonment was not for a specified time, but "to be terminated by the board of managers of the Illinois State Reformatory," the judgment and mittimus were void for uncertainty, and that the statute which makes provisions for such a judgment is unconstitutional and invalid; and in that behalf reliance is placed upon the case of People v. Pirfenbrink, 98 Ill. 68, where it was held that all judgments must be specific and certain, and must determine the rights recovered or the penalties imposed. We think that the judgment and mittimus in this case must be read and interpreted in the light of, and under the restrictions imposed by, the statute upon which they are based. That statute provides that although the sentence is a general sentence to imprisonment, yet that "such imprisonment shall not exceed the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which the prisoner was convicted and sentenced." This provision, and others of like import, being read into the judgment and mittimus, we think that it should be regarded that the judgment and commitment in this case was for twenty years, that being the maximum term provided by law for the crime of burglary. The fact that the prisoners might, in accordance with the provisions of the act, be sooner discharged by an order of court, predicated upon the recommendation of the board of managers of the reformatory, or by the pardon or commutation of the governor, would not have the effect of rendering the sentence and commitment uncertain and indefinite. It follows that it is provided by the statute, and by the judgment and commitment herein, for what period of time Joseph Bradley and Harry Justice are to be detained in the reformatory.

It is insisted that, even if this be so, yet the punishment is not proportioned to the offense committed, and that the statute is in violation of that portion of section 11 of article 2 of the Constitution of the state which declares that "all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense." In 2 Blackstone's Commentaries (bk. 4, § 12), it is said: "The method of inflicting punishment ought always to be proportioned to the particular purpose it is meant to serve, and by no means to exceed it;" and it is there also said: "The quantity of punishment can never be absolutely determined by any standing, invariable rule, but it must be left to the arbitration of the legislature to inflict such penalties as are warranted by the laws of nature and society, and such as appear to be best calculated to answer the end of prevention against future offenses." In fact, the object of punishment is the prevention of future offenses; and such object is to be attained in three ways,—by the amendment of the offender himself, by deterring others through his example, and by depriving the guilty party of the power to do further mischief. Id. pp. 11, 12; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 721. Imprisonment is not a cruel and unusual punishment for burglary or larceny, or other crime, and on that ground to be regarded as disproportioned to the nature of the offense. 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 722, and authorities cited in notes. The term of the imprisonment, if it does not extend to perpetual imprisonment, is to a great extent, if not altogether, a matter of legislative discretion. For very many years the statute of this state has been such that the punishment for burglary might extend to a term of imprisonment of twenty years, and the validity of such statute has not been, and could not successfully be, called in question. And, even if the statute fixing the punishment for burglary was such as that it imposed an absolute penalty of twenty years' imprisonment upon every conviction for such crime its validity could not, on that ground, be impeached. When the legislature has authorized a designated punishment for a specified crime, it must be regarded that its action represents the general moral ideas of the people, and the courts will not hold the punishment so authorized as either cruel and unusual or not proportioned to the nature of the offense, unless it is a cruel or degrading punishment, not known to the common law, or is a degrading punishment which had become obsolete in the state prior to the adoption of its constitution, or is so wholly disproportioned to the offense committed as to shock the moral sense of the community. See Re Bayard, 25 Hun, 546. Neither the infliction of twenty years' imprisonment for the crime of burglary, nor the infliction, for the violation of any provision of the Criminal Code, of the maximum quantity of the usual punishment for such violation, falls within either of these categories. We think that, from the fact that the statute here in question imposes the maximum term of imprisonment provided by law for the crime for which the prisoner is convicted, it does not follow that such statute is in violation of the constitutional requirement that all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense.

Nor is it true that a prisoner on trial for burglary and larceny, or for any other violation of the criminal law, has a constitutional right to have the quantity of his punishment fixed by a jury. At common law the jury either returned a special verdict, setting forth all the circumstances of the case, and praying the judgment of the court thereon, or a general verdict of guilty or not guilty. The punishment was fixed by the court, and governed by the laws in force. 2 Bl. Com. bk. 4, p. 361. And in this state, and at the present time, the penalties for violations of the Criminal Code are, in many cases, not fixed by the jury, but by the court. Rev. Stat. §§ 446, 447, p. 534, et seq. The constitutional right of trial by jury is limited to the trial of the question of guilt or innocence, and we think there can be no question of the validity of the sections of the statute to which we have made reference in this connection. In the event that a man of adult years commits the crime of burglary, he may be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term not less than one year, nor more than twenty years, and, if he pleads not guilty, then the jury say in their verdict for what length of time, within the limits fixed by the statute, he shall be confined in the penitentiary. Crim. Code, §§ 36, 444. It is provided, in substance, in sections 10, 12, and 13 of the statute now under consideration, that if a minor between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years commits such crime, and has not previously been sentenced to a penitentiary, then the jury shall not fix the punishment, but his sentence shall be a general sentence to imprisonment in the state reformatory, the effect of which shall be imprisonment in such reformatory for the maximum term provided by law for the crime, i. e. for twenty years, unless such imprisonment is sooner terminated by the board of managers of the reformatory in the manner authorized by the act. In other words, the adult has the statutory right to have the question submitted to the decision of a jury whether his term of imprisonment shall be one year, or some other space of time, to be fixed by them, and not exceeding twenty years, while for the same offense, and under like circumstances, the minor is necessarily sentenced to imprisonment for twenty years, the maximum term provided by law for the offense. Is there such inequality and injustice in this as that it can be regarded that the penalty imposed upon the minor is not proportioned to the nature of the offense of which he is convicted? There is in the law of nature, as well as in the law that governs society, a marked distinction between persons of mature age and those who are minors,—the habits and characters of the latter are presumably, to a large extent, as yet unformed and unsettled. This distinction may well be taken into consideration by the legislative power in fixing the punishment for crime, both in determining the method of inflicting punishment, and in limiting its quantity and duration. An adult convicted of burglary would be sentenced to the penitentiary, and to either solitary confinement or hard labor therein; and the statute which consigns him to such punishment must be regarded as highly penal. A minor, however, instead of being sentenced to solitary confinement or hard labor in a penitentiary, is committed to the state reformatory. The general scope and humane and benign purpose of the statute establishing the reformatory is clearly indicated by the following provisions, found in section 6: "It shall be the duty of the managers to provide for the thorough training of each and every inmate in the common branches of an English education; also in such trade or handicraft as will enable him upon his release to earn his own support.

For this purpose said managers shall establish and maintain common schools and trade-schools in said reformatory, and make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the same." And such beneficent purpose is also shown by the provision in section 8, that the general superintendent of the institution shall have charge of its inmates, and shall discipline, govern, instruct, employ, and use his best efforts to reform them; and numerous other provisions of like tendency and effect are to be found in the act, such as those for the releasing of prisoners upon parole, where arrangements have been made for honorable and useful employment in some suitable employment, and for the final discharge of prisoners from further liability under their sentences, etc. It is manifest that the sentences provided for in the statute establishing the reformatory, although to be regarded as punishments for crime, are not of so purely a penal character as those imposed upon adults convicted of like offenses; but that the primary object of the statute is the reformation and amendment of those committed to the reformatory. It follows, therefore, that the case of an adult liable to be sentenced to the penitentiary for the crime of burglary for a term of not less than one, nor more than twenty years, is not parallel to that of a minor required to be sentenced to the state reformatory for a term of twenty years for the like offense, and that no comparison can be instituted between them, and conclusion arrived at therefrom that the penalty imposed upon the minor is not proportioned to the nature of the offense of which he is convicted. Upon full consideration we find no just ground for holding that the act establishing the reformatory is in conflict with section 11 of article 2 of the Constitution of this state.

Some slight degree of reliance seems to be placed by the petitioner upon the claim that the act in question is in conflict with articles 5 and 8 of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States. Perhaps this claim has been sufficiently answered by that which has been already said; but, however this may be, it is a complete answer to say that said articles of amendment have no application to state governments but are exclusively restrictions upon federal power. Pervear v. Massachusetts, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 608; Com. v. Hitchings, 5 Gray, 482; Twitcheell v. Pennsylvania, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 321, 19 L. ed. 223; Fox v. Ohio, 45 U. S. 5 How. 484, 12 L. ed. 223.

It is urged that the Act establishing the reformatory is invalid, because section 15 of said Act empowers the board of managers of the institution to transfer to the penitentiary of the proper district any prisoner sentenced to the reformatory, who, subsequent to his committal, is shown to have been, at the time of his conviction, more than twenty-one years of age, or to have been previously convicted of crime, or who is apparently incorrigible, and whose presence, therefore, in the reformatory appears to be seriously detrimental to the well-being of the institution, and authorizes the imprisonment in such penitentiary of such prisoner at hard labor, and subject to all the rules and discipline of such penitentiary, for the full maximum term provided by law for the crime of which he was convicted. It may be difficult to say that the provisions of said section 15 are valid; but that question is not now properly before this court, for it does not appear that either Bradley or Justice has been sent, or is about to be sent, under the provisions of said section, to a penitentiary. Assuming, for the purposes of this decision, that said section 15 is unconstitutional, yet it may be eliminated from the act, and the residue of the act be readily, properly, and intelligently enforced. And the settled law is that, when constitutional and unconstitutional provisions in a statute are distinct and separable, the valid provisions may stand as though the invalid provisions had not been introduced therein. Donnerberger v. Frondergast, 128 Ill. 229, and authorities therein cited. We are unable to arrive at the conclusion that either Joseph Bradley or Harry Justice is wrongfully, illegally, or without warrant of law imprisoned and deprived of his liberty in the Illinois State Reformatory at Pontiac; and they are therefore remanded to the custody of the constituted authorities of said reformatory, and the writ of habeas corpus herein is dismissed, at the cost of the petitioner.

Writ dismissed.

SENATE OF THE HAPPY HOME CLUB

v.

Board of Supervisors of ALPENA COUNTY, Ptff. in Certiorari.

(.....Mich.....)

The Michigan Act No. 207 of the Laws of 1893, popularly known as the "Jag Cure Act," which authorizes a person convicted of drunkenness to be released on a recognizance conditioned that he will immediately take treatment for the cure of drunkenness of some corporation organized by law to make and file reports in reference thereto, and that he will obey all regulations prescribed by those administering such cure, with the further provision that he may be acquitted and discharged at the end of sixty days on proof that he has conformed to such conditions, is unconstitutional as an attempt to permit unofficial persons to prescribe rules which shall acquit persons charged with crime, while those rules may be as variable as the corporations are numerous.

(February 20, 1894.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Alpena County to review an order granting a writ of mandamus to compel the board of supervisors to allow and pay a bill for the treatment and maintenance by the senate of the Happy Home Club of America of one Richard Kelly, who had contracted the liquor habit. Reversed.

Upon the filing of the petition for the writ, an order to show cause was issued and the supervisors set up that the sole cause for refusing to pay the bill was that the act of the legislature under which it was contracted was unconstitutional. The Act in question is:—

Act No. 207, of 1893, which is entitled "An Act to authorize the courts, justices of the peace and police justices of this state to permit those charged and complained against as disorderly persons on account of drunkenness or intoxication to give a special recognizance conditioned for such persons taking the cure for such drunkenness and intoxication, and for the adjournment of such case against such person for a limited time for this purpose and to provide means for carrying out the same." The first section provides "that whenever any person shall be charged or complained against as being a disorderly person on account of drunkenness or intoxication," etc., he may give a recognizance "in the penal sum of one hundred dollars with a good and sufficient surety to be approved by such court or justice of the peace or police justice, conditioned that such person will immediately take treatment for the cure of such drunkenness or intoxication, of some corporation organized under the statutes of this state for the purpose of administering such cure and required by law to make and file reports in reference thereto; to be therein specified for the period of at least thirty days, and that such person will observe and obey all directions and regulations prescribed by those administering such cure, and that such person will not indulge in the use of intoxicating or malt liquors for the period of ninety days, and that such person will, at the end of sixty days from the date of said recognizance, appear before such court, justice of the peace or police justice, and answer the charge or complaint against such person." It is further NOTE.—Methods of punishment or reformation of criminals and children of criminal tendencies are of the greatest interest at present, in respect to the legal as well as the moral questions involved. The problem of reconciling constitutional rights of convicted persons with such discretionary action or flexible system as it seems can alone be effectual for reformatory work is not easy of solution. In Michigan where the courts deny the constitutionality of a parole or conditional pardon by a board of prison control (see 23 L. R. A.

People v. Cummings (Mich.) 14 L. R. A. 235, and note), such an alternative for imprisonment as the taking of a cure for drunkenness and obtaining the certificate of a corporation operating such a cure must be held clearly invalid, and even in other states in which the decisions are less strict in respect to paroles and conditional pardons the decision on the above case would probably be the same. The case is significant of the increasing tendency to consider the treatment of criminals with reference to their reformation.

provided that, upon giving the said recognizance, the cause shall be adjourned for sixty days, "and if at the end of said sixty days mentioned in said recognizance said person shall appear and show that he or she has conformed to the said conditions mentioned in said recognizance up to that time, then such person shall be acquitted and discharged." It is further provided that, if he fails to show that he has complied with the provisions of the recognizance, he shall be prosecuted for the original offense, or, if he fails to appear, his recognizance shall be forfeited according to law. Section 2 provides that the justice shall "make inquiry into the circumstances and financial condition of such person, and if upon such inquiry and investigation such person is found to be in indigent circumstances and unable to pay for his or her said treatment and maintenance during the time of receiving the same, then the cost and expense of administering such cure and maintaining such person shall be a county charge against the respective counties in which such recognizances are given and filed, but said charge shall not exceed seventy dollars," etc. The same section further provides for the payment, by the board of supervisors or board of county auditors, "upon the certificate of said court, justice of the peace, or police justice, that such person is in indigent circumstances and unable to pay for such cure and maintenance, and upon proof that such person has been properly treated and cured of such drunkenness or intoxication." This section further provides that the court shall furnish a certificate of indigency to the corporation at the time the recognizance is given.

Mr. A. A. Ellis, Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in certiorari:

The real object of the law is to allow a man to go to a jag cure and receive treatment in lieu of the statutory penalty provided for drunkards and tipplers: and if he takes the cure it shall be in lieu of any punishment for the offense he has committed.

If it is assumed that the taking of the cure is a punishment for the offense, the act would be in plain violation of the constitution, which provides against "unusual punishments."

Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 404.

If this is not a punishment for drunkenness or for being a drunkard, then the object of the act is not embraced in the title.

The Constitution, article 6, section 23, provides: "In every criminal prosecution the accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury."

The act under consideration expressly provides that the cause shall be continued for sixty days for the purpose of curing the person of such "drunkenness or intoxication."

The defendant could not waive the right to a trial by jury.

Hill v. People, 16 Mich. 351.

Ought a defendant who is accused of a criminal offense to be allowed to waive the clause in the Constitution which provides that he shall have a speedy trial?

United States v. Fox, 3 Mont. 517; Ex parte

Stanley, 4 Nev. 116; Klock v. People, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 676.

It is not the theory of the law, and never has been, that a man who is charged with an offense which is made a misdemeanor under the law, and which has a tendency to degrade him in the eyes of his fellow men, shall be compelled, or given the right, to excuse himself, or choose between two evils.

The law is unconstitutional because it makes the prosecution for a misdemeanor depend upon rules and regulations which are left entirely to the discretion of unofficial persons.

Whatever regulations are made must operate uniformly under the same conditions.

Re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396.

In Horn v. People, 26 Mich. 225, this court, in speaking of the regulations of navigation, said: "The regulations of navigation which he is to enforce, must be such as are valid and binding on all persons. Neither the city nor the legislature could make the rights of navigators dependent upon the private will of any one. They have a right to know their duties and responsibilities, and cannot be punished except when they violate some public statute or valid ordinance."

The legislature has not the authority to delegate to an unofficial body the right to make rules without limit, and to provide that a man may be acquitted or prosecuted conditioned upon his keeping such rules; for would not this be a delegation of legislative power without limit, and in plain violation of the constitution, which vests the legislative power of this state in the legislature?

Mr. L. G. Daffoe, Pros. Atty., also for plaintiff in certiorari.

Mr. J. D. Turnbull for defendant in certiorari.

Per Curiam:

Respondents bring to this court by certiorari the proceedings had in the circuit court for the county of Alpena upon an application for mandamus to compel respondents to audit relator's bill for the cure of one Richard Kelly of the liquor habit, under the provisions of Act No. 207 of the Laws of 1893, popularly known as the "Jag Cure Act," a copy of which is appended. The statute providing for the punishment of disorderly persons allows the justice to cause the arrest, and proceed to try the person charged; and upon conviction upon the trial, or if he pleads guilty, he may punish the offender by fine and costs, or imprisonment in the county jail or Detroit House of Correction, or he may require a recognizance for his good behavior for the period of three months. The act in question permits the justice to accept a different recognizance, viz., one conditioned that the defendant will take the cure within a time specified, and conform to the rules and regulations of the corporation administering such cure, and that he will not drink intoxicating liquor for the period of three months. It further provides that upon appearing before the justice at the end of sixty days, and showing that he has conformed to the conditions of the recognizance up to that time, he "shall be acquitted and discharged."

This, in effect, permits unofficial persons to prescribe rules which shall acquit persons charged with crime. These rules may be lax or stringent; but, whatever they are, the justice has only to acquit if they are shown to be complied with. They may be as variable as the corporations prescribing them are numerous. It is not within the province of the legislature to delegate to private corporations the power to make laws for the discharge of offenders.

The order of the Circuit Court will be reversed, with costs.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Div. 1).

W. H. HOWSMON, Appt.,
v.
TRENTON WATER CO., Respnt.

(.....Mo.....)

A water company is not liable to the owner of a house destroyed by fire because of failure to furnish water under a contract with a municipality, although a special tax was provided for in the contract to pay part of the consideration to the water company and an express provision made that the company should be liable for all damages occasioned by failure to furnish an adequate supply of water to extinguish any fire.

(December 28, 1893.)

A PPEAL by the plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Grundy County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff by reason of defendant's failure to keep its contract with the town of Trenton to furnish a water supply to extinguish fire. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harber & Knight and A. W. Mullins, for appellant:

In order to confer upon the plaintiff a right of action in the event of loss as set out in the petition, it was not essentially necessary that he should have been a party to the contract. If it were made, in part, for his benefit, in consideration of the burdens he had to bear by reason of the contract between the town and the defendant, that is sufficient. And the facts alleged in the petition and admitted by the demurrer show that the contract was made for the benefit of plaintiff and other tax-paying citizens of the town as individuals as well as for the town as a municipality, while the compensation—the consideration for the supposed benefits to accrue to the town and its citizens for the water supply and for the extinguishment of fires—was to come from the taxpayers—

Note.—Liability for loss by fire due to the lack of adequate water supply.

I. Of city or municipality. II. Of water company.

I. Liability of the city or municipality.

Municipal corporations have and can exercise only such powers as are expressly granted to them by law, and such incidental ones as are necessary to make those powers available and are essential to effectuate the purposes of the corporation, such powers being strictly construed. Mott v. Cherryvale Water & Mfg. Co. 15 L. R. A. 875, 48 Kan. 15; Albany v. Cunliff, 2 N. Y. 165; Clark v. Des Moines, 19 Iowa, 212, 87 Am. Dec. 423; McPherson v. Foster, 43 Iowa, 57, 22 Am. Rep. 215.

A city cannot assume liability for negligence in cases where the law has not already imposed a liability. Vanhorn v. Des Moines, 68 Iowa, 447, 50 Am. Rep. 750.

If a city is bound to furnish no particular facilities, there is an end of all question of liability for failure. Ibid.

The power of the city over the subject is that of a delegated quasi sovereignty, excluding responsibility to individuals for negligence or nonfeasance of any officer or agent charged with the performance of duties. Wheeler v. Cincinnati, 19 Ohio St. 19, 2 Am. Rep. 368.

The power on the part of a municipal corporation to provide for the accomplishment of certain results does not necessarily impose a liability for their imperfect accomplishment. Vanhorn v. Des Moines, supra.

The provisions which a given city should make in the matter of the extinguishment of fires is one of legislative discretion. Ibid.

The power conferred upon a city or corporation to establish a fire department is a legislative or 23 L. R. A. discretionary power which is within the discretion of the city authorities to exercise or not. Heller v. Sedalia, 58 Mo. 159, 14 Am. Rep. 444.

The injury sustained must be something more than the lack of facility or means of accomplishing an ulterior result. Vanhorn v. Des Moines, supra.

In Vanhorn v. Des Moines, supra. where the defendant was authorized by law to provide for the supply of water for the extinguishment of fires, and to levy a tax to defray the expense, a water company having contracted to indemnify them against all actions which might be brought against the city for misfeasance or neglect on the part of such company, it was held that the city was not liable for damages occasioned by the inadequate water supply.

The same doctrine is established in Brinkmeyer v. Evansville, 29 Ind. 187, where the city was sued for damages occasioned by the failure to extinguish a fire through the non-supply of water and defective fire apparatus. In the above case it is stated that a contrary decision would result in making them insurers against fire, reason and the soundest public policy forbidding such a liability being imposed.

Again, in Patch v. Covington, 17 B. Mon. 722, 66 Am. Dec. 186, where the city was sued for neglect in keeping the public water systems in repair, whereby the fire spread to plaintiff's house.

Where the city was sued for damages occasioned by reason of its neglect in maintaining a hydrant by which the fire might have been extinguished, the City Act of 1864, chapter 104, section 3, authorizing the city to make and maintain reservoirs and public hydrants in such places as may be deemed proper, to be maintained and erected by the city for the public benefit without pecuniary compensation or emolument, it was held that the city did alone. And so, the contract having been made in part for plaintiff's benefit and on his behalf, he has a right of action.

Rogers v. Gosnell, 58 Mo. 589; Meyer v. Lowdi 44 Mo. 328; Fitzgerald v. Barker, 70 Mo. 685; Bank of Missouri v. Benoit, 10 Mo. 519; Rogers v. Gosnell, 51 Mo. 586; State v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 102 Mo. 473.

One of the ordinances pleaded provided that "should said water company, from lack of water supply or any other cause, except providential or unavoidable accident, fail to furnish a reasonable or adequate supply of water to extinguish any fire, then it shall be liable for all damages occasioned by such fire or neglect." Defendant having failed to fulfill this important provision in the contract, as shown by the allegations of the petition, it became and is liable to the plaintiff for the damages he sustained by reason of defendant's failure and neglect.

Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co. 7 L. R. A. 77, 89 Ky. 840; Duncan v. Owensboro Water Co. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 35; Marshall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19 Mo. App. 80; Lampert v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 14 Mo. App. 376.

Mr. R. L. Yeager, for respondent:

The appellant was not a party to the contract sued on and sustained no relation of privity to either of the contracting parties.

Therefore he cannot maintain an action upon the contract, and the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

Froman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195; Woodland v. Newhall, 8 Fed. Rep. 434; Kansas City v. O'Connell, 99 Mo. 357.

The payment of a tax levied by the town of Trenton for the purpose of paying its hydrant rental to the water company does not create a privity of contract, so as to authorize the appellant to sue.

Becker v. Keokuk Water Works, 79 Iowa, 419.

The appellant's right of recovery upon similar contracts to the one pleaded has been denied.

Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Trenton Water Co. 42 Mo. App. 118; Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. 54 Iowa, 59, 87 Am. Rep. 185; Becker v. Keokuk Water Works, supra; Nickerson v. Bridgeport Hydraulic Co. 46 Conn. 24, 38 Am. Rep. 1; Ferris v. Carson Water Co. 16 Nev. 44, 40 Am. Rep. 485; Atkinson v. Newcastle & Gateshead Water Co. L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 441; Fowler v. Athens City Water Works Co. 83 Ga. 219.

Brace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court of Grundy county, sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, the material allegations of which are, in substance, as follows: That the plaintiff is a resident citizen and taxpayer of the town of Trenton in said county, and the owner of a large amount of valuable property within the corporate limits of said town, subject to taxation for ordinary purposes, and to a special tax of five mills on the dollar annually for the purpose of discharging the obligations of said town to the defendant on the contract not, by accepting the statute and building such works, enter into any contract with, or assume any liability to, the owners of property, to furnish means or water for the extinguishment of fires upon which an action could be maintained. Talnter v. Worcester, 123 Mass. 811, 25 Am. Rep. 90. In this case the owner of the property had failed to pay his water rates, and the water had been cut off.

In Heller v. Sedalia, 58 Mo. 159, 14 Am. Rep. 444, the defendant by ordinance, established and regulated the fire department and was sued for damages occasioned by a fire, which it was alleged might have been extinguished by proper exertion on the part of the officers of the department. The court held that it was not the intention of the legislature in conferring power on the city to establish a fire department, to render it responsible as an insurer against fire.

The doctrine of respondet superior does not apply to such a case. Heller v. Sedalia, supra.

In Wheeler v. Cincinnati, 19 Ohio St. 19, 2 Am. Rep. 268, it was held that the powers conferred by statute upon municipal corporations with respect to the establishment and organization of fire companies were legislative and governmental, and that the extent and manner of their exercise within the sphere prescribed by statute were necessarily to be determined by the judgment and discretion of the proper municipal authorities, and for any defect in the execution of such powers the corporations were not liable to individuals.

The same conclusion was reached by the court in Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Keeseville, 6 Misc. 233, the court holding that such failure did not give ground of action to either the insurer or insured.

In Grant v. Erie, 69 Pa. 420, 8 Am. Rep. 272, power was given to the city to make and establish a sufficient number of reservoirs to supply water in case of fire; the reservoirs established thereunder, having fallen into decay through want of repair, became leaky and insufficient for the purposes for which constructed. The court held in an action against the city to recover damages occasioned by a fire upon the plaintiff's premises, that the city was not liable, its powers being discretionary.

In the above case, however, the court's decision was based upon the fact of the duty imposed being discretionary, and it was intimated that if the duty were an imposed one, the negligence of the city might have constituted a good cause of action.

Where the action was against the corporation for damages occasioned by fire, by reason of the failure to keep the water pipes, hydrants, and fixtures in repair so as to furnish a sufficient supply of water for which the plaintiff paid taxes, the defendant was held not liable, the duty imposed being a discretionary one and not purely ministerial in its character. Black v. Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 45 Am. Rep. 785.

In Mendel v. Wheeling, 23 W. Va. 253, 57 Am. Rep. 665, it was stated that no duty was imposed upon the city, even though it imposed a tax for water and owned its own waterworks, public policy forbidding such an action.

The damage must be the direct or the proximate and natural consequence of the defendant's acts. Patch v. Covington, 17 B. Mon. 722, 66 Am. Dec. 186; Oil Creek & A. R. R. Co. v. Kelghron, 74 Pa. 816.

The damages must be the result of the proximate cause of the injury, and are a question for the jury, and not one of legal knowledge or science. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256.

II. Liability of the water company.

The general doctrine deducible from all opinions is, that the waterworks company is not liable for sued on herein, all of which he has regularly and promptly paid. That by a contract entered into, by ordinances, between the town of Trenton and the defendant, the said defendant (in consideration of the franchise granted it, and the privilege of collecting certain water rates from its citizens, and of the sum of $2,000 to be paid annually by the town, to be raised by an annual tax of five mills, as aforesaid, all of which the defendant has received and enjoyed) promised and agreed with said town to furnish, at all times, an adequate supply of good, clear, and wholesome water, for fire and other purposes, for public and private use, under such a pressure as to have the power to throw, at all times, six streams of water through 50 feet of 2½ inch rubber hose and 1-inch ring nozzle, 80 feet high, in the business portion of the town, and to throw at least two effective streams at any one time in any other part of the town accessible from the mains; and further agreed that, "should said water company, from lack of water supply, or any other cause except providential or unavoidable accident, fail to furnish a reasonable or adequate supply of water to extinguish any fire, then it shall be liable for all damages occasioned by such fire or neglect." That on the 24th of March, 1899, plaintiff's dwelling house in said town, with the household and kitchen furniture and wearing apparel therein contained, all of the value of $2,700, was destroyed by fire. That said house was close to the main of defendant, and situated at a place where, in the event a fire should there occur, it was the duty of defendant, under said contract, to furnish an adequate supply of water, with force and power sufficient to extinguish such fire; which the defendant, without any providential or unavoidable accident, failed to do, and by reason of such failure plaintiff's property was destroyed, to his damage in the sum of $3,700.

It is well-established law in this state, by a line of decisions extending from the year 1847 to the present date, "that a person for whose benefit an express promise is made in a valid contract between others may maintain an action upon it in his own name." Ellis v. Harrison, 104 Mo. 370; State v. Laclede Gas-Light Co. 103 Mo. 472; Fitzgerald v. Barker, 70 Mo. 685; Rogers v. Gosnell, 58 Mo. 589, 51 Mo. 486; Meyer v. Lovell, 44 Mo. 328; Robbins v. Ayres, 10 Mo. 539, 47 Am. Dec. 125; Bank of Missouri v. Benoit, 10 Mo. 521. And such is now the prevailing doctrine in America, by the great weight of authority. 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 863, note 5.

This doctrine, originally an exception to the rule that no claim can be sued upon contractually unless it is a contract between the parties to the suit, has become so general and far-reaching in its consequences as to have ceased to be simply an exception, but is recognized, within certain limitations, as an affirmative rule. The foregoing cases from this court are in harmony with the rule as laid down in Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, that "an action lies on a promise made by the inadequate supply of water for fire purposes, under a contract with a city or corporation to furnish water for the extinguishment of fire, there being no privity of contract between the company and the property owner.

This has been held to be the case, even though the water company may have agreed with the city or corporation to indemnify it against all claims made by or on behalf of any citizen or resident, and may have stipulated that the action might be brought in the property owner's own name. Mott v. Cherryvale Water & Mfg. Co. infra.

If a city is not liable to its citizens or residents, the water company is not liable to such citizens or residents upon a contract between itself and the city, the contract in such a case being between the city and the water company only. Mott v. Cherryvale Water & Mfg. Co. 15 L. R. A. 375, 48 Kan. 15.

The mere fact that the plaintiff, a stranger to the contract, may find benefit therefrom for the protection of his property in common with all other persons whose property is similarly situated, does not make him a party to the contract or create privity between himself and such company (Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. 54 Iowa, 59, 37 Am. Rep. 185); no privity or obligation or duty owing to him giving a legal or equitable claim to the promisee, or an equivalent from him personally being shown. Ferris v. Carson Water Co. 16 Nev. 44, 40 Am. Rep. 436.

Privity of contract must exist between the parties to an action upon the contract. Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. supra.

One who is not a party to a contract cannot sue in respect to a breach of duty arising out of such contract. Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, 48 N. J. L. 19.

The contracting parties control all interests and are entitled to all rights secured by the contract. Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. supra.

In order to entitle a person to an action against one performing the service or doing work under a contract made with another person, it must be shown that the duty or liability arose independent of contract. Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, supra.

There would be no certain limit to the number and character of actions, if mere strangers might enforce the contract by action. Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. supra.

The mere fact that a city levies and collects a tax to be paid to a water company does not create any privity of interest between the water company and a citizen or resident of the city. Mott v. Cherryvale Water & Mfg. Co. supra.

In making such a contract, the city discharges one of its duties for which it was created, and in raising the required money it only provides the consideration due from it by virtue of the contract. Ibid.

The law which authorizes cities to contract with individuals and companies for the building and operating of waterworks confers no powers upon a city to make a contract of indemnity for the individual benefit of a citizen or resident of the city, for the breach of which he can maintain an action in his own name. Ibid.

In Nickerson v. Bridgeport Hydraulic Co., 46 Conn. 24, 38 Am. Rep. 1, it was alleged that the defendants had contracted with the city for the supply of water for domestic use and the extinguishment of fires, and that it was therefore their duty to keep an abundant supply for such purposes, although nothing appeared showing precisely what the contract was, no terms or conditions being stated. The court held that an allegation of duty was not sufficient; facts sufficient to create the duty or obligation must be alleged and that there was no contract relation between the defendants and the plaintiffs, and consequently no duty which could the defendant upon valid consideration to a third person, although the plaintiff was not privy to the consideration. Such promise is to be deemed made to the plaintiff, if adopted by him, though he was not a party nor cognizant of it when made." Meyer v. Lovell, supra. "It is not every promise, however, made by one to another from the performance of which a benefit may ensue to a third, which gives a right of action to such third person, he being neither privy to the contract nor to the consideration. The contract must be made for his benefit as its object, and he must be the party intended to be benefited." Simon v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 355; Vrooman v. Turner (1877), 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195; Wright v. Terry, 23 Fla. 160; Austin v. Seligman, 18 Fed. Rep. 519; Burton v. Larkin, 86 Kan. 246, 59 Am. Rep. 541, and cases cited. In other words, "the rule is not so far extended as to give to a third person, who is only indirectly and incidentally benefited by the contract, the right to sue upon it." But "the name of the person to be benefited by the contract need not be given, if he is otherwise sufficiently described or designated. Indeed, he may be one of a class of persons, if the class is sufficiently described or designated." Burton v. Larkin, supra; Johannes v. Phenix Ins. Co. of Brooklyn, N. Y. 66 Wis. 50, 57 Am. Rep. 248.

In the opinion delivered by Allen J., in Vrooman v. Turner, supra, it was said: "Judges have differed as to the principle upon which Lawrence v. Fox and kindred cases rest, but, in every case in which an action has been sustained, there has been a debt or duty owing by the promisor to the party claiming to sue upon the promise. Whether the decisions rest upon the doctrine of agency, the promisee being regarded as the agent of the third party who, by bringing his action, adopts his acts, or upon the doctrine of a trust, the promisor being regarded as having secured money or other thing for the third party, is not material. In either case there must be a legal right, founded upon some obligation of the promisee, in the third party, to adopt and claim the promise as made for his benefit." An examination of very many cases decided before and since it was so held in that case satisfies us that the rule has been confined to such cases in this state, as well as elsewhere, and upon that principle when this case was before the Kansas City court of appeals in an action by another party. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Trenton Water Co. 42 Mo. App. 118. It was, in effect, held that the plaintiff had no cause of action against the water company, because the town of Trenton was under no obligation to the plaintiff to furnish an adequate supply of water and power to extinguish the fire by which the premises were consumed; and in support of its position the following additional cases were cited: Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. 54 Iowa, 59, 37 Am. Rep. 185; Nickerson v. Bridgeport Hydraulic Co. 46 Conn. 24, 33 Am. Rep. 1; Farris v. Carson Water Co. 16 Nev. 44, 40 Am. Rep. 485; Fowler v. Athens City Water Works Co. 88 be made the basis of a legal claim. In the above case, however, there was an entire absence of allegations going to show a subsisting contract of the defendants with the city, much less with the plaintiffs, out of which a duty could arise.

In Fowler v. Athens City Water Works Co., 88 Ga. 219, a contract entered into between the city and another party for the supply at all times, for valuable consideration, of all the water necessary for fire purposes, and to establish hydrants with a guarantee of sufficient pressure to throw from any of these at all times five streams of water to the height of sixty-five feet, was transferred by the contractor to the defendant who was sued for damages occasioned by a fire on plaintiff's premises, the water supply not being of sufficient pressure to extinguish it whereby the fire spread. The court held, the case not being based upon a statutory duty, but solely upon the failure to comply with the contract made with the municipality, that the defendant was not liable there being no privity between him and the plaintiff, and further that he was not liable in tort, there being no legal command by statute or express law superadded to the contract.

Where the defendant's contract to supply water to be used by the city for the extinguishment of fires, was embodied in an ordinance passed by the city authorizing the establishment of waterworks providing for compensation, the only parties to such contract being the city and the defendant, it was held in an action by the plaintiff to recover damages occasioned by a fire, the necessary supply of water not being furnished through defective machinery, and the negligence of the defendant's servants, that there was no liability, no privity of contract existing. Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co. 54 Iowa, 59, 37 Am. Rep. 185.

the same conclusion is reached, although it was contended that the case differed from that of Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co., supra, a special fund being raised by the city to pay for a sufficient supply of water for use in case of fires, to which fund plaintiff contributed, the court holding that the mere fact of the city's levying and collecting a tax to pay the defendant created no privity of interest between the defendant and the taxpayers.

Section 18 of the Ordinance in question provided "that said company shall be liable for all injuries to persons or property caused by the negligence, mismanagement, or fault of itself, or its employees, while engaged in the construction or operation of said works," and in dealing with this section, the court held that the powers of corporations were to be strictly construed, the law which authorizes them to contract for the building and operation of waterworks conferring no power to make a contract of indemnity for the individual benefit of the taxpayer, for the breach of which the latter could maintain action in his own name. Becker v. Keokuk Waterworks, supra.

In construing the above section, the court held it referred only to injuries for which the city would have been liable if caused by negligence, mismanagement, or fault on its own part. Ibid.

Where by the terms of a city ordinance it was the duty of the water company to furnish water of a certain pressure after a fire alarm, and a certain pressure during the fire, sufficient for fire protection, the pressure to be determined by the register in the engine house, and such company undertook by the terms of the ordinance to pay all damages that might accrue to any citizen of the city by reason of a failure to supply a sufficient amount of water, or a failure to supply the same at the proper time, or by reason of any negligence on its part, and the action was brought for a failure to

Ga. 219; and Atkinson v. Newcastle & Gateshead Water Co. L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 441.

The last of these cases is not in point, since the action in that case was for the breach of a public statutory duty, and the court held that the action would not lie, because the statute gave no right of action to the plaintiff. The cause of action in each of the other cases was for a breach of duty which it was alleged the defendants owed the plaintiff under a contract with the city, to which the plaintiff was not a party, whereby they agreed to furnish an adequate supply of water and power to extinguish fires in the town or city; to which it was replied in the Connecticut case (decided in 1878): "Whatever benefit the plaintiffs could have derived from the water would have come from the city, through its fire department. The most that can be said is that the defendants were under obligation to the city to supply the furnish the water of such pressure, whereby the plaintiffs sustained damage, the court held, there being no allegation that the plaintiff was a taxpayer or ever paid taxes, that there was no privity of contract between the citizens, the plaintiff, and such company, as would enable him to maintain an action for the injury sustained through the fire, and caused by the failure of the water company to perform the contract. Mott v. Cherryvale Water & Mfg. Co. 15 L. R. A. 875, 48 Kan. 15.

In Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co., 109 Mass. 277, 12 Am. Rep. 689, the defendants were sued for negligently severing a hose laid across their track, thereby cutting off the supply of water from a fire which was consuming the plaintiff's factory and causing the destruction of the building and its contents. The court held such interference tortious, the firemen having a right at common law to lay the hose over the road, and the mere fact of their being volunteers made no difference, the severance of the hose being a proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

In Eaton v. Fairbury Waterworks Co. (Neb.) 21 L. R. A. 658, where the defendants, under the provisions of the city ordinance, were to keep all fire hydrants supplied with water for instant service and in good order and efficiency, the payment being provided for by the levying of a tax, the loss by the plaintiff was alleged to be caused by their negligence and failure to so provide the hydrants with water. The court held, no mention of or reference to plaintiff, or any class of citizens or taxpayers being embodied in the contract, that the defendants were not liable by reason of the assumption of certain functions which might properly be assumed by the municipal corporation, inasmuch as the municipality itself could not be liable under the circumstances, and no privity of contract was established.

In Ferris v. Carson Water Co., 16 Nev. 44, 40 Am. Rep. 485, the defendant was held not liable to the plaintiff for the insufficiency of the water supply furnished by it under a contract with the city.

In Foster v. Lookout Waterworks Co., 3 Lea, 42, it was held that neither the company nor the city was liable for an insufficient supply of water, owing to the non-repair of pipes, no privity of contract existing with the plaintiff.

In Atkinson v. New Castle & Gateshead Water Co., L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 441, 46 L. J. Q. B. 775, 36 L. T. N. S. 761, 25 Week. Rep. 794, it was held that a mere breach of a statutory public duty against any cause of action, whether the right of action be or be not given, must depend upon the object and language of the statute.

Where the statute bound the company to maintain hydrants with water. The city owed a public duty to plaintiffs to extinguish their fire. The hydrants were not supplied with water, and so the city was unable to perform its duty. We think it is clear there was no contract relation between the defendants and the plaintiffs, and consequently no duty which can be the basis of a legal claim." In the Iowa case (decided in 1880) it was replied: "The city, in the exercise of its lawful authority to protect the property of the people, may cause water to be supplied for extinguishing fires, and for other objects demanded by the wants of the people. In the exercise of this authority it contracts with defendant to supply the water demanded for these purposes. . . . It cannot be claimed that the agents or officers of the city employed by the municipal government to supply water, improve the streets, or maintain good order are liable to a citizen for loss tain fire plugs to furnish sufficient supply of water to keep pipes charged with water of a certain pressure, for use in case of fire without compensation, and imposed a fine in case of neglect, the court held that the defendants were not liable for the insufficient supply of water at the fire. Atkinson v. New Castle & Gateshead Water Co. supra.

A contrary doctrine would seem to be held in Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co., infra, but it will be observed that in that case there was an express contract between the lumber company and the water supply company, by which, in consideration for the rent paid for the use of two hydrants upon the lumber company's own lot, the water was agreed to be furnished directly to such company.

A city having power by its charter to contract for the construction of waterworks, and operating of the same, such contract is made for the personal benefit of the inhabitants within the limits of such corporation. Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co. 7 L. R. A. 77, 89 Ky. 340.

In Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co., supra, it is stated that if the city had power to make the contract as well for the personal benefit of its several inhabitants as for purely municipal purposes, and did so make it, the plaintiff being the real party in interest because owner of the property destroyed, had the right to prosecute in its own name if maintainable at all, and that the city was not a necessary party its interest or injury being distinct if not remote. Section 18 of the Kentucky Civil Code provides that the action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.

Where the contract to supply the city with water provided that the contractor should be exempt from damages occasioned by the temporary shutting off of the water in case of repairs, it was held that no excuse being provided they were still liable for damages by fire, occasioned by the non-supply of the necessary amount of water; and the insertion of a provision relieving the city from liability for rent was no release so far as the contractor was concerned. Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co. supra.

In such cases the inquiry is whether, considering the purpose, character, and capacity of the works, and the attending circumstances and agencies, the fire could and would have been prevented or extinguished if such company had performed its contract. Ibid.

In Duncan v. Owensboro Water Co. decided in the court of appeals of Kentucky, December 10, 1899, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 85, the doctrine established in the last preceding case was followed. E. W.

or damage sustained by reason of the failure to perform their duties and obligations in this respect. They are employed by the city, and responsible alone to the city. The people must trust to the municipal government to enforce the discharge of duties and obligations by the officers and agents of that government."

In the Nevada case (decided in 1881), after citing 69 N. Y., supra, with approval, and quoting therefrom, it was replied: "The board of the trustees of the town, in the exercise of a discretionary power conferred upon them by the legislature, contracted for a supply of water for the extinguishment of fires. The plaintiff, in common with the other residents of the town, enjoyed the advantages of this contract. He had an indirect interest in the performance of the contract by the water company, as had all of the property holders of the town; but such an interest is not sufficient to constitute the privity, either directly or by substitution, which must exist to give him a right of action upon the contract." In the Georgia case (decided in 1889), in an opinion by Bleckley, Ch. J., it was replied: "The present case is not based upon the breach of a statutory duty, but solely upon a failure to comply with a contract made with the municipal government of Athens. To that contract the plaintiff was no party, and the action must fail for the want of the requisite privity between the parties before the court. There being no ground for recovery treating the action as one ex contractu, is it better founded treating it as one ex delicto? We think not. The violation of a contract entered into with the public, the breach being by mere omission or nonfeasance, is no tort, direct or indirect, to the private property of an individual, though he be a member of the community and a taxpayer to the government. Unless made so by the statute, a city is not liable for failing to protect the inhabitants against the destruction of property by fire. Wright v. Augusta, 78 Ga. 241; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 997 et seq."

The case in hand is on the contract made by the water company with the town of Trenton, and the only feature that it presents that can take it out of the principle laid down in these cases is that provision was made in this contract for a special tax to be raised to provide part of the consideration the water company was to, and did, receive, to which the plaintiff contributed, and an express promise contained in the contract that "should said water company, from lack of water supply, or any other cause except providential or unavoidable accident, fail to furnish a reasonable or adequate supply of water to extinguish any fire, then it shall be liable for all damages occasioned by such fire or neglect;" the argument being that here is an express promise of indemnity in a contract, in which the plaintiff is privy to the consideration at least. This argument was met by the supreme court of Iowa in Becker v. Keokuk Water Works, 79 Iowa, 419 (decided in 1890; probably not published when this question was before the Kansas City court of appeals), in the following manner: "(1)

The chief question raised by the demurrer was considered in Davis v. Clinton Water Works Co., 54 Iowa, 59, 87 Am. Rep. 185, and decided adversely to the claim now made by plaintiff. But he contends that this case differs from that in several material particulars. In this case a special fund was raised by the city to pay for a sufficient supply of water for use in case of fires and to that fund plaintiff contributed. It is said in making the contract, and in levying and collecting the taxes required by its provisions, the city acted as a mere agent. We do not think the fact that the city levies and collects a tax to be paid to defendant creates any privity of interest between defendant and the taxpayers. In making the contract the city discharged one of the duties for which it was created, and in raising the required money it only provided the consideration due from it by virtue of the contract. It would hardly be claimed that the defendant would proceed against a taxpayer in the first instance for any unpaid money due under the contract from the city. . . . (2) It was decided in Vanhorn v. Des Moines, 63 Iowa, 448, 50 Am. Rep. 750, that the city was not liable for the failure of the waterworks company to furnish the water required by the contract to extinguish fires, even though the city had taken a contract from the company to protect it from liability which might arise for malfeasance or neglect on the part of the company. . . . Much stress is placed by appellant upon that part of section 18 which provides 'that said company shall be liable for all injury to persons or property caused by the negligence, mismanagement, or fault of itself or its employes while engaged in the construction or operation of its works.' Municipal corporations have and can exercise only such powers as are expressly granted to them by law, and such incidental ones as are necessary to make those powers available, and are essential to effectuate the purposes of the corporation; and those powers are strictly construed. Clark v. Des Moines, 19 Iowa, 212, 87 Am. Dec. 423; McPherson v. Foster, 43 Iowa, 57, 23 Am. Rep. 215. The law which authorizes cities to contract with individuals and companies for the building and operating of waterworks confers no power upon a city to make a contract of indemnity for the individual benefit of a taxpayer for a breach of which he could maintain an action in his own name."

The town of Trenton, under its charter, had power to pass ordinances "to prevent and extinguish fires" (Laws 1856, p. 353), and, as incident thereto, power to contract for a supply of water for that purpose. But it would seem, under the authorities cited, the plaintiff cannot maintain this action, for cogent reasons, which have been, and may be, put in several ways: First. Although it was within the power of the town, by contract, to supply water for the purpose of extinguishing fires, it did not owe the duty of extinguishing fires to plaintiff. Heller v. Sedalia, 53 Mo. 159, 14 Am. Rep. 444. Consequently, the case is not brought within the line of adjudicated cases which maintain an exception to the rule that suit upon a contract must be brought by a party to the contract in cases where the promisee owed a duty to the third party, which the promisor undertook to perform. Second. A municipal corporation, in making contracts for the benefit of its citizens, acts for them collectively, and for all of them, in every act, and the relation of privity is not, and cannot be, introduced into such contracts by reason of taxpaying or the discharge of any civic duty by any individual citizen. Third. The benefit to be conferred upon the individual citizen by the contract is incidental to the contract, the primary object of which is the benefit of all the citizens in their corporate capacity. Fourth. It does not clearly appear that the benefit was intended for the citizens in their individual capacity, but may have been intended for the protection of the municipality, and, in the absence of express power in the municipality to make contracts for the indemnity of its individual citizens, should be so construed. City of Kansas v. O'Connell, 99 Mo. 357. Fifth. The relation that the contractor sustained to the town was that of its agent or servant to carry out the obligations of the contract upon its part for the benefit of all the citizens of the municipality; and for the enforcement of the terms thereof the citizens must look to the authorities of the city, and cannot individually maintain an action for a breach of the contract. Sixth. The town had no authority to make a contract to indemnify the plaintiff for the loss of his property by fire resulting from the neglect of its agents or servants to furnish an adequate supply of water to put it out, and therefore could not make such a contract that would be binding on another. The appellant is, however, not without authority to sustain his position. In a recent case in Kentucky (decided in 1889) the supreme court of that state held "that when a water company has contracted with a city to furnish, at all times, a supply of water sufficient for the protection of the inhabitants and property of the city against fire, the company must answer in damages for loss by fire resulting from its failure or refusal to perform its contract." Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co. 89 Ky. 340, 7 L. R. A. 77, and 89 Ky. 853, 7 L. R. A. 80. The authority for this proposition is not therein cited, and the reasoning upon which the position is rested does not seem to us entirely satisfactory. The plaintiff's contention also receives some support from the reasoning of Judge Thompson in Lampert v. Laclede Gas-Light Co., 14 Mo. App. 376, according to whose views it would seem that the contract declared upon here should raise, on the part of the defendant, a public duty to be performed for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town distributively, and for the negligent nonperformance of that duty an action would lie by the town, "suing upon the contract, or by an individual specially damaged thereby, proceeding as for the nonperformance of a public duty, and setting up the contract by way of inducement." As before stated, the suit here is upon the contract, and not against the water company for the negligent nonperformance of a public duty, and these views have simply persuasive force. At all events, the position of the Kansas City court of appeals, and the ruling of the court below in this case, are sustained by the weight of authority, and the judgment herein will be affirmed.

A. M. ODOM and Wife

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN R. CO.,

(45 La. Ann. —.)

A passenger on a railroad train, when it stops at the station where he is to get off, when he attempts to do so, and is on the steps of the car, and the train moves ahead when he is in this situation, is compelled to adopt a perilous alternative,—to run the risk of being thrown from the train when its speed is accelerated, or to leave the train with less speed. In trying to escape imminent danger brought about by defendant's negligence, he is not guilty of contributory negligence, and the defendant corporation is responsible for its negligence.

leans in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alexander & Blanchard and Sam. H. West, for appellant:

In an action for damages for personal injuries, where the plaintiff has, by his own imprudence or negligence, contributed to his own injury, he cannot recover, even though defendant be in fault.

Messrs. A. J. Murff and J. A. Snider, for appellates:

In Lehman v. Louisiana Western R. Co., 37 La. Ann. 707, this court said: "Nothing is better settled than that carriers owe to their passengers the duty of exercising a very high degree of diligence, care, skill, and foresight in order to carry them safely. They are bound to the diligentia diligentis patrisfamilias—the diligence which a good specialist in that particular line of business would exercise, including all the care, caution, and skill, which common experience shows to be proper in order to secure safety."

In Turner v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co., 37 La. Ann. 648, 55 Am. Rep. 514, is the following language: "We have no hesitation in holding that a railroad company which affords no greater facilities to passengers in boarding their trains than the alternative to step down to the ground from a platform, and thence to climb up the car steps into the proper passenger coach, or to step into a baggage car and thence to walk to the rear, crossing over car platforms while the train is in motion, is guilty of gross negligence."

It is not proper management in a railroad company to require passengers to go through a series of coaches, and to pass over several platforms, in order to reach the particular coach they may desire to occupy.

Moses v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 39 La. Ann. 653. See also Hutchinson, Carr. pp. 417, 418; Thomp. Carr. p. 108; Wardle v. New Orleans City R. Co. 35 La. Ann. 204; Beach, Contrib. Neg. p. 174; Peniston v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 780, 44 Am. Rep. 444.

Contributory negligence, in its legal signification, is such an act or omission on the part of a plaintiff, amounting to a want of ordinary care, as, concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant, is a proximate cause or occasion of the injury complained of.

Beach, Contrib. Neg. p. 8.

If plaintiff jumped at all it was involuntary and done to save herself and child from being crushed under the wheels of the moving cars. A jump prompted by such motives, when one is placed in such circumstances by defendant's negligence, is not contributory negligence.

McEnery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued the defendant company for $5,000 damages for personal injuries to his wife, alleged to have been received at Mitchells' Mills, in Bossier parish, on July 4, 1892. The petition alleges that the plaintiff "had alighted from the car, and Mrs. Odom, his said wife, was in the act of alighting therefrom; that, when she had reached about the second or third step of defendant company's car, the said train, under the control and management of said company's regular employees, gave a sudden and violent jerk, and began to move off; that, owing to said sudden jerk and violent movement, Emma L. Odom, one of your petitioners, with her infant child, whom she carried in her arms, were violently thrown from said car, her clothing was disarranged, her person exposed, and her body considerably bruised; that she received from said fall a hurt on her thigh, which lasted for several days, and gave her much pain; that in addition to this she received serious internal injuries from said fall, from the effects of which she has not fully recovered, and from which she suffers, and may suffer for an indefinite time; that the shock to her nervous system, resulting from the dangers to which her infant child and herself were exposed, was of such extent as to render her unconscious for a few moments, and to greatly impair her health." The defendant's answer is a general denial, and an averment of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,000.

It is now well settled that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is a bar to a recovery, although the defendant be in fault. Fleytas v. Pontchartrain R. Co. 13 La. 339, 36 Am. Dec. 658; Damont v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. 9 La. 441, 61 Am. Dec. 214; Laicher v. New Orleans & G. N. R. Co. 28 La. Ann. 320; Schwartz v. Crescent City R. Co. 30 La. Ann. 15; Murray v. Pontchartrain R. Co. 31 La. Ann. 490; Weeks v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. 32 La. Ann. 615; Childs v. New York City R. Co. 33 La. Ann. 154; Woods v. Jones, 34 La. Ann. 1086; Houston v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 35 La. Ann. 796; Walker v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 795, 7 L. R. A. 111; White v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 990; Olivier v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 804; Herliach v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 280.

And it is equally well established that when a passenger on a railroad train, in order to avoid being carried beyond his destination, jumps from a moving train, and sustains an injury, he cannot recover. Damont v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 9 La. Ann. 441, 61 Am. Dec. 214; Walker v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 795, 7 L. R. A. 111; Olivier v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 804.

It is therefore important to ascertain whether or not Mrs. Odom contributed to her own injury, and whether she voluntarily jumped from the train, while in motion, in order to avoid being taken beyond her destination. It is alleged that she was on the steps of the car, in the act of leaving the car, when it moved ahead in its regular course, and she was thrown from the car. It is immaterial whether she jumped off or was thrown off, if she was in the act of leaving the car when it had stopped, and the train moved ahead when she was in the act of getting off. Some of the witnesses place her on the platform of the car, and testify that she jumped or stepped from the car platform to the small platform at Mitchell's Mills, which is a flag station. Others place her on the steps, and say that, as she was in the act of getting off, she was thrown to the ground by the movement of the train. On this particular point the evidence is conflicting, and seemingly irreconcilable. We are therefore disposed to apply the rule so often announced by us,—that on questions of fact, when the evidence is conflicting, and the witnesses of credibility, and the testimony almost equally balanced, we will not disturb the verdict of the jury. In this case this rule can be applied with propriety, for, without calling to our aid extraneous circumstances and physical facts, it would be the exercise of intuitive tact and wisdom to unthread the mass of tangled testimony in the record. There is no evidence that Odom and his wife unnecessarily delayed their efforts to leave the train. They had to go some distance, where they could conveniently get to the platform at the depot. The train had signaled for a stop, and when it slowed up they moved forward to get off. This fact is established, and also the fact that Odom got off the train when it had stopped, and had placed his bundles, and turned around to assist his wife. Here the conflict of testimony begins; plaintiff's witnesses placing Mrs. Odom on the steps of the car, and defendant's witnesses on the platform of the car, from which, while the car was in motion, she stepped to the depot platform, two steps, and went beyond it to the ground. Odom says, as he turned to assist his wife from the train, it moved off, separating him from her, and she was carried to the end of the platform, thrown from the steps against the side of the car, and to the ground. We think his testimony is corroborated as to his wife being on the step of the car when it moved off. Sentebl, defendant's witness, places her ten feet beyond the north end of the platform, on the ground, when he saw her. All the witnesses place her north of the platform. This platform faces north and south, and, the car being parallel with it, it is difficult to understand how she stepped to the platform, and was thrown this distance to the north of it. Defendant's witnesses were not, we think, in a position to see any movement of Mrs. Odom; and, when they testify they saw her on the platform, they may have spoken the truth, and at the instant thereafter she may have descended to the step. The witness of defendant nearest to her, in immediate proximity to her, and on whose testimony defendant places great reliance, is confused in his testimony, and makes two separate and distinct statements in the direct and cross-examination. We are of the opinion that the jury were correct in finding the defendant corporation negligent in moving its train when Mrs. Odom was on the car step, in the act of leaving the train. She was placed in a situation, by the company, where she had no time for deliberation, and had to choose between two modes of escape, both of which were dangerous. Error in judgment on the part of plaintiff in trying to escape imminent danger brought about by defendant's negligence does not constitute contributory negligence, even though the accident might not have happened, had the act not been done. Lehman v. Louisiana Western R. Co. 37 La. Ann. 705. She was on the steps of the car by defendant's invitation to her to leave the train. In this situation, with an infant in her arms, the perilous alternative was presented to her, to remain there, and run the risk of being thrown from the train when it accelerated its speed, or to step from the train before it increased its motion. It would have been dangerous for her to attempt to reach the car platform with an infant in her arms. Under these circumstances, we are inclined to the opinion that she chose the less dangerous mode of escape. The defendant corporation is responsible for the consequences of the placing of Mrs. Odom in this situation.

The evidence fails to sustain the allegations in plaintiff's petition as to the personal injury of his wife. The evidence is unsatisfactory, and at the time of the injury there was no examination made by the family physician to ascertain the condition of Mrs. Odom, owing to her modesty, rather, we think, than from any desire to deceive. The examination was therefore superficial, and the family physician only visited her once. Medical experts were appointed by the court to make a personal examination of Mrs. Odom. No objection was made to this unusual application for medical experts to examine the person of the plaintiff. We will not, therefore, comment upon it. Objection was made, and a bill was reserved, to taxing the expense of the expert examination as costs to the defendant. It will not be necessary to discuss this, as the defendant will have to pay the costs. The expert testimony, as it was not objected to by defendants, may be referred to. It shows that there is "no evidence of disease existing, that could not reasonably be assigned to other causes." One of these experts is the physician who first visited Mrs. Odom. Mrs. Odom was undoubtedly injured, however, to some extent.

The judgment appealed from will be amended, and the damages fixed at $500. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by reducing the damages to the sum of $500, and in other respects it be affirmed.

Response to petition for rehearing:

Without granting a rehearing in this case, we will add to the decree that the plaintiff and appellee pay costs of appeal, although this is unnecessary, as the costs followed the judgment. The amendment to the judgment necessarily cast the costs of appeal on the appellee.

Rehearing refused.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

W. C. JONES, Appt.,
v.
R. W. MILLSAPS et al.

(.....Miss.....)

1. An implied covenant of a lessor of the lower part of a building to make such repairs on the upper portion not leased as may be necessary for the protection of the enjoyment of the lessees of the lower portion cannot be raised by the fact that the lessee expressly covenants to make certain extraordinary repairs and alterations in the portion leased for the accommodation of his business.
3. The lessor of the lower story of a building, retaining the upper story in his own possession and use, is not bound by an implied covenant to make any repairs on the upper portion of the building, in the absence of deceit, misrepresentation, or fraud.

(October 30, 1893.)

NOTE.—Liability of landlord as to condition of part of premises not controlled by tenant.

The opinion in the main case of JONES v. MILLSAPS fails to clearly show the nature of the repairs sought, or cause of action for damages, and therefore will not be as valuable an authority on particular repairs that are essential and requisite, as if the matters in dispute and the elements of damages claimed had been disclosed and discussed.

Elevators.

A landlord operating and controlling the elevator is liable to a tenant or to a stranger for injuries caused by the door of the elevator well being left open and unprotected. Gordon v. Cummings, 9 L. R. A. 640, 152 Mass. 513; Totten v. Phipps, 52 N. Y. 354; Fisher v. Jansen, 30 Ill. App. 91, 123 Ill. 549.

And the statute requiring a railing protection was properly received in evidence. Dawson v. Sloan, 17 Jones & S. 304, 100 N. Y. 620.

And where there was no protecting rail as required by N. Y. Laws 1882, chap. 410, and the hatch was open, the question of negligence was properly submitted to the jury. Atkinson v. Abraham, 45 Hun, 238.

And it was properly submitted to the jury whether the landlord had failed to take reasonable precaution, where a boy apparently in charge of the elevator had left the door open. Tousey v. Roberts, 21 Jones & S. 446, 1 N. Y. S. R. 780; People's Bank of Baltimore v. Morgolofski, 73 Md. 423; Dawson v. Sloan, supra.

And the question of negligence was properly submitted to the jury, where the boy in charge opened the door when the cage was not at the landing. Fisher v. Cook, 23 Ill. App. 621, affirmed, 125 Ill. 230.

But the landlord is not liable if the elevator is kept locked and the key in proper place and a tenant improperly procures another key and leaves it open without consent or knowledge of landlord. Handyside v. Powers, 145 Mass. 123.

And Mass. Stat. 1882, chap. 208, requiring safeguards does not impose liability unless the act is accepted by the city.

He is liable to a person delivering beer on an elevator, who was injured by the bottles falling on him as the elevator rose, where the elevator was out of repair. Ritterman v. Ropes, 19 Jones & S. 33.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hines County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages caused to plaintiffs as tenants of defendants' property by reason of defendants' failure to make necessary repairs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. E. Baldwin for appellant.

Messrs. Brame & Alexander for appellees.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While the declaration, in some of its allegations, is somewhat indefinite or uncertain, yet we do not think it so indefinite or uncertain, as a whole, as that the precise nature of the complaint is not apparent. While parts of the language employed are involved or obscure, the pleading does nevertheless contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary language. Our statutes are designed to obviate the necessity for, and the use of, all

And a landlord is liable for death of a boy delivering goods to a tenant, caused by a defective rope on dumb waiter, that would have been easily discovered on inspection. Krey v. Schlusser, 16 N. Y. Supp. 695.

And it is a question for the jury whether the landlord had used reasonable care in splicing a defective rope, instead of using a new one. Blake v. Fox, 43 N. Y. S. R. 537.

But the landlord is not liable for injuries caused by the rope breaking, if he had no notice of any defects. Turnier v. Lathers, 36 N. Y. S. R. 821.

There was no evidence as to the condition of the rope or why it broke in this case.

And a landlord is not liable for injury to a servant of his tenant, who attempted to ride on an elevator knowing that it was for freight only, and not for persons. McCarthy v. Foster, 155 Mass. 511.

Nor is he liable for the death of a visitor of a tenant's servant, riding on the servant's elevator, who was killed by sliding through a opening in the wire guard of the cage, while overcome by vertigo, fainting, or loss of consciousness. Egan v. Berkshire Apartment Assn. 31 N. Y. S. R. 545.

A landlord is liable to a tenant or person properly on his premises for injuries caused at common entrances, by openings or excavations left unguarded, or obstructions, which are under the landlord's control. *Camp v. Or dangerous awning in a defective condition over a common doorway. Milford v. Holbrook, 9 Allen, 17, 85 Am. Dec. 735.

And is liable for defective platform at entrance controlled by landlord for common use of all the occupants. Readman v. Conway, 126 Mass. 374; Leydecker v. Brintnall, 155 Mass. 232.

And a landlord is liable for injury to a tenant caused by ice on piazza and steps used in common, technicalities in all pleadings, and to enable every litigant to have his complaint entertained and heard on his stating the facts constituting his cause of action in ordinary and concise language. If irrelevant or redundant matter is inserted in the pleading, the opposite party should move to strike out such matter. If the allegations of the pleading are so indefinite or uncertain that the precise nature of the complaint is not apparent, on motion of the opposite party the court will cause the same to be made definite and certain, or, this failing, will strike the pleading from the files. Code 1893, § 704. On this branch of the case, and beyond these general observations, we think it proper only to add two particularizations, viz.: (1) The first special cause of demurrer is not well taken. On examination of the written contract we find that the lessee (the plaintiff below) covenants to make certain specific repairs and alterations in and upon the leased storeroom, and for other repairs that may be necessary, or charges which he may deem requisite. That all the repairs and alterations covenanted for on the lessee's part are limited to the leased storeroom is quite manifest. (2) The eight special grounds of demurrer are not maintainable. Reference to the transcript before us shows that it is the "cost and carriage and value of the goods,"—damages which the schedule filed with the declaration contains. But this schedule was unnecessary, and this part of the declaration may be treated as surplusage. With this useless matter discarded, we still find a distinct averment of the pleading that the plaintiff is injured and damaged to the value of $400.

We come now to the consideration of the real contention between the parties, presented in the last special cause of demurrer, and that is, to state it fairly and fully: Can the lessor, in this particular case of the leasing of the lower story to the plaintiff, with retention of the upper story in his own possession and use, be held liable for necessary repairs, in the absence of any covenants to keep in repair imposed upon him by the written contract of lease, and in the absence which results from defective pipe controlled by the landlord. Watkins v. Goodall, 138 Mass. 533.

Or for dangerous condition of wall on common passway where he had notice, and a child of the tenant was injured. Schilling v. Abernethy, 112 Pa. 437.

For other walks, see infra, that heading.

So he is liable for injury to a child falling in an open-air shaft in the yard, where a heavy iron cover was removed, but he is not liable to the same boy who also had fallen in the cellar through an open door, as it did not appear to be negligence in having it open. Canavan v. Stuyvesant, 7 Misc. 113.

But it was held in Burns v. Luckett (Ohio) 8 Cln. L. Bull. 517, that a landlord of two tenement houses that were rented was not liable for the death of a child of one tenant, caused by falling in a vault in the center of the lot used in common by both houses. The question of common use was not discussed and the case seems to have been determined on the ground that the landlord had parted with all control and was not liable for defective condition, and he is not liable to a tenant on account of construction of steps, being made of rough, unheaven granite with no railing, and ice accumulating thereon—as he is not bound to change the construction after renting. He would be liable to strangers for defective construction. Woods v. Naumkeag Steam Cotton Co. 184 Mass. 357, 45 Am. Rep. 344.

And is not liable to a tenant for injury from construction of floor of passage made of loose boards, where the tenant rents knowing that it was constructed in that way—as the landlord is not bound to change the mode of construction. Quinn v. Perham, 151 Mass. 163.

And a tenant of part of a business house cannot have his lease canceled on account of license to pass through the other part having been denied him, the lease not providing for the same, and he having other access to his part. Ward v. Robertson, 77 Iowa, 159.

And it was held in Williams v. Hayward, 1 El. & El. 1040, 23 L. J. Q. R. 574, in an action for rent for lease of mining privilege with the privilege of using a railroad of the landlord, that an obstruction of such railroad easement is not an eviction; and the court says that "the rent issued out of the thing demised, that is the mines and minerals, and could not have issued out of the easement to use the railway in common with others on the land, 23 L. R. A.

not parcel of the demise; and we think that the preventing the defendant from using or obstructing him in the enjoyment is not such an eviction from the thing demised or any part of it as will amount to an answer to the claim of rent."

Halls and stairways.

A landlord is liable to a tenant or person rightfully using the premises, who is injured by reason of defective covering on the stairs used in common, and over which the landlord has exclusive control. Henkel v. Murr, 81 Hun. 28; Evers v. Weil, 43 N. Y. S. R. 836; Gillron v. Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 26; Neyer v. Miller, 19 Jones & S. 516; Monteth v. Finkbeiner, 50 N. Y. S. R. 458; McGuire v. Joslyn, 81 N. Y. S. R. 990; Pell v. Reinhardt, 12 L. R. A. 843, 127 N. Y. 381.

And is liable under New York Consolidation Act, § 652, requiring stairs in tenement houses to be kept in repair. Brennan v. Lachat, 14 Daly, 197.

And a landlord retaining control of a stairway used in common is generally liable to a tenant or party properly thereon, who is injured by reason of the same being dangerous from negligence of the landlord to keep in safe condition. Marwedel v. Cook, 154 Mass. 235; O'Sullivan v. Norwood, 14 Daly, 238; Walton v. Kane, 4 Misc. 236; Brady v. Valentine, 3 Misc. 20; Sawyer v. McGillicuddy, 3 L. R. A. 458, 81 Me. 81; Englert v. Kruse, 14 Daly, 247; McMartin v. Hannay, 10 Sess. Cas. 8d Series, 411; Looney v. McLean, 123 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295; O'Neill v. Kinken, 8 N. Y. Supp. 554.

In Donohue v. Kendall, 18 Jones & S. 386, affirmed, 98 N. Y. 635, mem. the executors of a landlord of a tenement house were held liable for not keeping in repair a common stairway to a cellar used by several families occupying the building. The court said the executors were not bound to go into control of the property but if they did so they must fulfill duties and obligations grounded on their power of management.

But it was held in Halpin v. Townsend, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 417, affirmed, 107 N. Y. 683, that a visitor of a tenant injured on a common stairway where there was no rail or light, could not recover from the landlord, as the landlord did not light the hall and was not obliged to do so, and the visitor was guilty of contributory negligence.

The same was held in Hildebrand v. Schenck, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 249.

And Purcell v. English, 86 Ind. 34, 44 Am. Rep. 255, holds that a landlord is not liable to a tenant of deceit, misrepresentation, or fraud? The general rule that a landlord, in the absence of express covenants in the contract of lease, and in the absence of deceit or misrepresentation, cannot be held liable on any implied warranty on his part for repairs, is not called in controversy by counsel for appellant, as we understand his argument. The correctness and the universality of the rule as stated are admitted; but the lease of a lower story by a landlord retaining the other parts of the building in his own possession and use presents a case exceptional to the general rule, it is contended. This position rests, as it appears to us, upon one of two grounds: (1) Either upon an implied covenant for repairs on the lessor's part, springing out of the written contract itself; or (2) upon the relationship of the parties to each other and to the leased premises. The subject is not free from difficulty, nor is there wanting eminent authority for both of the grounds just mentioned, of fixing liability upon the lessor. Let us examine these in order, and in the light of the authorities cited in support of them.

The first proposition is to fix liability for repairs upon the lessor, in the absence of any express covenants in the written contract of lease, on an implied covenant growing out of the lessee's express covenants to repair the leased storeroom. In the case at bar there are two ready answers to the contention: (1) The repairs and alterations covenanted for by the lessee are not to be supposed to refer to repairs of ordinary wear and tear. These were imposed by law, and needed no sanctions of covenant. They are, as is plainly to be seen in the contract, covenants for extraordinary repairs or alterations, to be made for the peculiar accommodation of the lessees' business. And (2) conclusively, to raise this implied covenant to repair by the lessor would be to introduce into the written contract of the parties a most important condition which they did not incorporate in it themselves when they reduced their agreement to writing. It would amount to an essential injured by reason of ice and snow being left on a common stairs where the tenant had knowledge of danger, distinguishing Looney v. McLean, supra; as in that case the unsafe condition was permanent and this temporary, and in that case it was not connected directly with plaintiff. Here it was not defective construction or unsafe condition when leased—and the court claims that this stairway by the lease was under control of the tenant as he had the right to use it.

And a landlord was not liable to a tenant injured to using an outside stairway where the evidence tended to show that the injury was caused by a horse pulling it down that was hitched to the same. Platt v. Farney, 16 Ill. App. 216.

And a person not entitled to enter the premises, having no business there, cannot recover for injuries caused by defective condition of steps. Hart v. Cole, 16 L. R. A. 557, 156 Mass. 475; Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 423.

So the landlord is not liable to a subtenant, injured by a hole in the common hall, where the landlord had no notice, and the tenant's lease prohibited subletting. Cole v. McKey, 66 Wis. 500, 87 Am. Rep. 293.

And is not liable for injuries to a child of a third-floor tenant, caused by a dark hall, where the child's mother was accustomed to light the hall. Muller v. Minken, 5 Misc. 444.

A landlord is not liable to a party injured by reason of opening a wrong door by mistake and falling down stairs at the door. Kaiser v. Hirth, 46 How. Pr. 161, 4 Jones & S. 344; Hilsenbeck v. Guhring, 131 N. Y. 974.

And the same was held where a tenant had agreed to light the hall and failed to do so. Jucht v. Behrens, 23 N. Y. S. R. 690.

And in Barker v. Baker, 7 N. Y. S. R. 584, it was held that a landlord of a business block was not liable for injury received by a party falling on a landing between two flights, where the only light was through the glass doors and transoms of the offices, and the day was dark.

And Humphrey v. Walt, 22 U. C. C. P. 580, holds that a landlord is not liable to a tenant having knowledge of the construction of the hall with a pipe hole in the floor, injured in attempting to move her goods across the hall to another room.

The court also placed the decision on the ground that as no liability existed if tenant had leased a whole house, still less would there be if he rented only part; but this proposition is not generally accepted as applicable to a tenement or apartment houses, for repairs in common halls.

Fire escape.

A landlord failing to provide a fire escape required by statute, will be liable for damages caused thereby. Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 310, 84 Am. Rep. 536; McLaughlin v. Arnfield, 58 Hun. 376.

So where a statute requires all buildings over two stories high to be furnished with fire escapes, or the owner will be liable for damages, he is not relieved although the tenant injured was in the second story. Rose v. King, 15 L. R. A. 160, 49 Ohio St. 213.

But he is not liable for injury to a child of a tenant caused by using fire escape platform as a balcony, although the hinge was defective and trap door gave way. McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 26 Am. Rep. 555.

Sidewalk.

A landlord having control is liable to the party injured in falling down unprotected openings on the street. Stevenson v. Joy, 152 Mass. 45; Jennings v. Van Schaick, 108 N. Y. 530; Tomie v. Hampton, 129 Ill. 379.

In the case of Tomie v. Hampton, supra, the opening existed before renting.

And a landlord is liable for injuries received by a person falling in a defective and unprotected coal-hole in the sidewalk although the premises are occupied by a monthly tenant. Day v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38.

But a landlord employing a watchman is not liable for injuries caused by an open coal hole, where the covering is removed while the watchman's back is turned. Martin v. Pettit, 5 L. R. A. 794, 117 N. Y. 118, reversing Wason v. Pettit, 49 Hun. 163.

And a landlord occupying one room as a boarder is not liable for neglect to remove snow on sidewalk under a city ordinance requiring it to be "removed by the tenant occupant and in case of no tenant by the owner." Com. v. Watson, 97 Mass. 562.

Landlords would be liable to strangers for defects of buildings having control of entrance, and doors in common; but under Mass. Stat. 1850 the city is liable for defects in sidewalks and injuries from snow and ice, and this remedy is exclusive. Kirby v. Boylston Market Assn. 14 Gray, 249, 74 Am. Dec. 682.

Walls.

A landlord is liable for injury to a tenant in attempting to raise a building. Butler v. Cushing, 48 modification by parol of a written contract. It would be, not the explanation by parol of an obscurity on the face of the contract, but the substitution of one contract for another,—a contract by parol for the written one made by the parties. The case of Bissell v. Lloyd, 100 Ill. 214, affords distinct support to the contention of appellant as to the implied covenant of the lessor to repair the portion of the building whose possession he retained, in order that the comfort or security of the tenant of the leased room might be maintained. But there is no attempt to fortify this conclusion of the supreme court of Illinois by reason or authority. It is the naked, dogmatic assertion of a court of last resort, and we decline to yield our assent to it.

The other ground of contention, viz., the liability for repairs on the part of the lessor in cases where a part, only, of the premises are leased, and the remainder retained by the landlord, because of the relationship of the parties to each other and to the property, seems to be clearly recognized in the case of Toole v. Beckett, 67 Me. 544, 24 Am. Rep. 54.

Hun, 521. This case does not show whether tenant was of whole or part.

And a landlord of a tenement house failing to keep the part of the house under his control in repair is liable to the tenant, injured by the fall of the walls. Bold v. O'Brien, 12 Daly, 160.

And the landlord of an apartment house is liable to a lessee injured by a wall falling, caused by excavation of adjoining owner. Ward v. Fagan, 28 Mo. App. 116.

This building was controlled by the landlord, and as to this wall the tenant occupied the relation of stranger.

But Howard v. Doolittle, 3 Duer, 464, holds that the landlord was not liable for failing to shore up the wall of his tenant's building while an excavation was made by an adjacent owner. In this case the landlord had parted with all control and the question considered was whether he was bound to repair after renting.

And a landlord owning adjacent lot and removing outside wall from part of leased premises exposing goods, is not liable, where it was questionable if the extension exposed had any wall of its own, and also questionable if the tenant was injured. The liability of the landlord in such a case is the same as that of another owner. Rotter v. Goerlitz, 16 Daly, 484.

Falling articles.

A landlord in control of a building occupied by several is liable to a person injured from the fall of the cornice, or timbers from the roof, or a stone from the top of the fire-escape. O'Connor v. Andrews, 81 Tex. 28; O'Connor v. Curtis (Tex.) Feb. 23, 1892; Hungerford v. Bent, 55 Hun, 8; Schachne v. Barnett, 28 Jones & S. 145.

And a landlord furnishing power in an apartment building is liable to an employé of a tenant injured by defective shafting falling in the stairway. Poor v. Sears, 154 Mass. 539.

A landlord having notice is liable to his tenant or person properly on the premises, injured in a common hallway by reason of the same being out of repair, as from fall of plaster. Dollard v. Roberts, 14 L. R. A. 238, 130 N. Y. 289.

And is liable to a tenant for injury from a falling sign used by the landlord above the tenant's room. Payne v. Irvin, 144 Ill. 482, affirming 44 Ill. App. 105.

And a landlord controlling the roof is liable for injuries caused to a stranger by the fall of accu-

The decision and its reasoning are not satisfactory, and the vice of the opinion is that it confounds the passivity of the landlord with affirmative action on his part amounting to negligence. It overlooks the fundamental principle in all leases by which the lessor is made to "hand off" during the continuance of the lease. He may not be required to affirmatively aid the tenant in repairs, and he may not affirmatively act inconsistently with his lessee's right to possession and enjoyment; and, so long as the lessor abstains from all action, he is within the line of his duty. The Maine case confounds negligence with nonintervention, and is unsound.

A critical study of the case of Priest v. Nichols, 116 Mass. 401; Kirby v. Boylston Market Assn. 14 Gray, 249, 74 Am. Dec. 682, and Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295,—the two former cited, and supposed to have been followed, by the court in 67 Me., and the last relied upon by appellant's counsel,—readily distinguishes them from the Maine case and the case at bar. The case of Kirby v. Boylston Market Assn., 14 Gray, mulated snow and ice from the same. Shipley v. Fifty Associates, 101 Mass. 251, 3 Am. Rep. 346.

But a landlord occupying premises and renting bench and power to a tenant in a lumber mill, is not liable to him for injury by timber thrown from the upper door as the tenant was coming out of the lower door, having knowledge of the custom of loading and of this load in particular. Allen v. Johnson, 4 L. R. A. 734, 76 Mich. 31.

Light and air.

A tenant of a second floor is entitled to damages for addition built in front of his rooms obstructing his view and access, between the building and the sidewalk. Brande v. Grace, 154 Mass. 210.

But it is no eviction of a tenant for the landlord to build on an adjoining lot, obstructing the light, and the statute allowing a surrender when the building is untenable does not apply. Johnson v. Oppenheim, 2 Jones & S. 416.

For other cases on light and air, see note to Case v. Minot (Mass.) 22 L. R. A. 536.

Nuisances.

A landlord is not liable to one tenant for renting another part of the same premises to another tenant who used gasoline or other dangerous articles, unless the landlord knew it would be so used. Lewis v. Hughes, 12 Colo. 208.

And a tenant vacating a stable because the landlord rented the other part as a restaurant cannot claim an eviction on account of smoke, heat, and fumes injuring his horses. Gray v. Goff, 8 Mo. App. 329.

This on the ground that there is no implied covenant that premises are tenantable.

And a lessee of a storeroom cannot refuse to pay rent on account of operation of elevator and use of stairway necessary for other part, when such tenant renewed his lease after such use. Benedict v. Barling, 79 Wis. 551.

A party having a delicate trade should stipulate for protection, and where the landlord used the cellar and heated the first floor to 80 degrees, causing paper stored there to lose weight, the tenant could not recover damages as there was no implied warranty of fitness, and the tenant saw the boiler in the cellar when he rented, and the landlord did not know that the kind of paper stored would be injured. Robinson v. Kilvert, 17 Wash. L. Rep. 697, 40 Alb. L. J. 312, 61 L. T. N. S. 60.

249, 74 Am. Dec. 682, determined that "the owner of a building leased in several tenements, who is bound to make all necessary repairs, and has control of the passageways and doors for that purpose, and who keeps the keys, and opens and closes the doors of portions of the building at times fixed by occupants, is not relieved from liability for injuries caused by defects in the building, or by the falling of snow and ice therefrom." The case, on its facts, does not bear the slightest semblance to the case at bar, nor is the opinion of the court authority for the proposition we are considering. The case of Priest v. Nichols, 116 Mass. 401, presents a clear case of negligence in affirmative action on the landlord's part. The landlord occupied the upper story, and negligently injured his tenant below by water escaping from a waste pipe and from an engine which the landlord used and had charge of. Here liability was imposed for negligence in affirmative action by the landlord in the use of his engine and waste pipe. The case of Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 88, 87 Am.

Rep. 295, held that a landlord who lets rooms in a tenement house to different tenants, with a right of way in common over a staircase, is bound to keep such staircase in repair; but that is not the case at bar. If the weight of authority is controlling, it will be ascertained, on examination, that the current is against liability of the lessor in such case as this. See Walker v. Gilbert, 2 Robt. 214; Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119, 6 Am. Rep. 47; Ward v. Fagin, 101 Mo. 669, 10 L. R. A. 147; Cole v. McKey, 66 Wis. 500, 57 Am. Rep. 293; Purcell v. English, 86 Ind. 84, 44 Am. Rep. 255; Krueger v. Ferrant, 29 Minn. 385, 43 Am. Rep. 223.

This line of decisions rests upon sound reason. The general rule is firmly established that no implied covenant for repairs can be raised against the lessor. The lessee cannot invoke an implied covenant of the landlord that the leased premises are fit and suitable for the lessee's business or use. The intending tenant must use his own faculties, and judge for himself if the premises he desires to lease are in repair, and are suitable

And a tenant cannot plead an eviction where the other tenant so used his part as a house of prostitution without the knowledge or consent of landlord. Gilhooley v. Washington, 4 N. Y. 217.

But a landlord cannot recover rent where the tenant vacated part on account of landlord converting other part into a house of prostitution. Dyett v. Pendleton, 8 Cow. 727.

And a landlord of an apartment building is liable to lower tenants for injury caused by fall of upper floor, from overloading the same, where he misrepresented to tenant of upper floor the strength of the same. Brunswick-Balke Callender Co. v. Rees, 65 Wis. 442.

For other nuisances, see "Water."

Roof used in common.

A license to use roof as a drying place for clothes does not require the landlord to fence it. Iray v. Hedges, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 80.

And the landlord is not liable for injuries caused by breaking of slat on roof used in common for drying clothes, where he had no notice of any defect and was not guilty of any negligence. Alperin v. Earle, 55 Hun. 211.

And is not liable, where child of tenant fell out of a window and through a skylight on a roof used in common for drying clothes, as landlords are not required to build protections to catch children that fall out of windows. Miller v. Woodhead, 104 N. Y. 471.

Water from roof.

A landlord having control of the roof is generally liable to the tenant below for damages from defective condition of the same, or for negligently leaving the conducting pipe so as to flood premises below, or for exposing goods of tenant by uncovering roof. McVie v. McNaughton, 21 N. Y. Week. Dig. 89; Worthington v. Parker, 11 Daly, 545; Rauth v. Davenport, 45 N. Y. S. R. 226, and 60 Hun. 70; Sulzbacher v. Dickie, 6 Daly, 469; Center v. Davis, 39 Ga. 210; Toole v. Beckett, 67 Me. 544, 24 Am. Rep. 54; Glickauf v. Maurer, 75 Ill. 239, 20 Am. Rep. 238; Bissell v. Lloyd, 100 Ill. 214.

And under Georgia Code, a landlord is bound to repair a leak after notice, and if the landlord occupied the upper rooms he would be liable to the lower tenant for damages from a leaky roof without notice, but would not be liable for damages resulting from an extraordinary fall of snow. Guthman v. Castleberry, 49 Ga. 272, 23 L. R. A.

Where the landlord examined the roof five days prior and found it all right, he is not liable for injury caused to lower floor tenant, by leak in gutter pipe made by rats gnawing a hole therein. Carstairs v. Taylor, L. R. 6 Exch. 217, 40 L. J. Exch. 129, 19 Week. Rep. 722.

And it was held in Tenant v. Hall, 27 N. B. 499, that a landlord occupying the upper floor was not liable to the tenant below, injured by water from an insufficient pipe during a severe storm where there was no negligence in the construction of the pipe, or the mode adopted. While the court said that there was no implied warranty the jury found for the defendant on the question of absence of negligence in the construction of the pipe and there was no question made as to the terms on which the question of negligence was submitted to them. So the verdict was not disturbed.

And it was held in Krueger v. Ferrant, 29 Minn. 385, 43 Am. Rep. 223, that in the absence of an express covenant to repair, a landlord having control of the roof where there are several tenants is not liable for damages from leak on tenant below as there is no covenant implied to keep in repair, or that the premises are suitable, and shelter from roof does not require landlord to repair, and the risk was assumed.

This case appears to conflict with the weight of authority, although cited with approval by the main case. The cases on which it mainly depends are those of liability of adjoining owners or where tenant has exclusive control.

Water, pipes, and plumbing controlled by landlord.

A landlord occupying the upper floor is liable to tenant below for injury to tenant below for leakage from his room. Slapenhorst v. American Mfg. Co. 15 Abb. Pr. N. B. 355; Jackson v. Eddy, 12 Mo. 209; Priest v. Nichols, 116 Mass. 401.

And is liable to tenant for damages for defective plumbing controlled by the landlord. Bernauer v. Hartman Steel Co. 38 Ill. App. 491; Pike v. Brittan, 71 Cal. 159, 60 Am. Rep. 527; Freidenburg v. Jones, 63 Ga. 612.

A landlord allowing sewerage to flow from his lot adjoining into cellar of his tenant is liable. Smith v. Faxon, 156 Mass. 599.

And if he fails to comply with the orders of the board of health as to sewer gas in an apartment building he cannot collect rent from a tenant vacating on account of the same. Bradley v. De Golt for his use. If he wishes to protect himself against the hazards of subsequently accruing accidents or defects requiring repairs, he must do so by proper covenants in his contract of lease. He takes his leased premises for better or for worse, as an ancient authority aptly characterizes his taking. He takes the premises as he finds them, and he must return them, as nearly as possible, in like condition. This necessarily involves his making repairs on the property during the term of his lease. And all this must be true—all this is true—whether he lease one room or six, the whole or a part of the house. If he rents the whole, the wisdom and necessity of his protecting himself in his contract by stipulating for repairs by his landlord appears to be not less, but greater, than if he rents a part, only. The rule extends to the whole premises, and to every part of the premises. The duty of the tenant to examine the premises, and protect himself by proper stipulations in his contract of lease if danger is suggested by his examination, is the same in case of the leasing of a whole or of part, only. He cannot fix liability upon his lessor by some supposed implied covenant to repair, when he had it in his power to create this covenant expressly in the written contract, and failed to do so.

And if the water pipes controlled by landlord are out of order, and the tenant is injured thereby, rent ceases under New York Act 1860, providing that rent shall cease when property is untenable. Vann v. Rouse, 94 N. Y. 401.

And the same was held where the tenant's part was overflowed by filth from vault, which was on that or an adjoining lot. Fash v. Kavanagh, 24 How. Pr. 847.

Under New York Act 1860, chap. 345, providing rent shall cease if the building is unfit for occupancy, a tenant is justified in leaving where he is annoyed by explosions, shaking of the building, and cracking of plaster, which the landlord claimed was caused by dynamite placed somewhere to injure him, but probably was from the water pipes and tank. Tallman v. Murphy, 180 N. Y. 345.

A verdict for a tenant on his tender of amount due was sustained where he filed a counterclaim for damages from water from pipes above. In a suit for rent, and the record did not show that the pipes were in repair when rented, and it was questionable whether the jury considered the counterclaim. Coleough v. Niland, 68 Wis. 309.

But it was held in Edgerton v. Page, 20 N. Y. 251, that damages caused to a tenant by water from the landlord above him is not a proper set-off or counterclaim for rent where there is no eviction as the acts of plaintiff are acts of trespass or negligence.

And a landlord is not liable for breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment where the tenant of lower floor was injured by bursting of pipe at the branch on first floor, as the defect existed before the lease was made. But if the water had been disconnected from plaintiff's pipe it would have been different, and injury from escape of water was not pleaded. Anderson v. Oppenheimer, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 602, 49 L. J. Q. B. 708.

And a landlord is not liable to a tenant injured by water where the record does not show whether the pipes burst on or off the part occupied by tenant. Simons v. Seward, 22 Jones & S. 406.

Water, pipes, and plumbing used by other tenants.

A landlord is not liable to one tenant for injuries caused by abuse or misuse of water privileges of tenant above. White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204; Mendel v. Fink, 8 Ill. App. 378; Greene v. Hague, 10 Ill. App. 598; McCarthy v. York County Sav. Bank, 74 Me. 315, 43 Am. Rep. 591; Robbins v. Mount, 33 How. Pr. 24; Kenney v. Barna, 67 Mich. 336.

And is not liable for leakage from room above the tenant, where the tenant injured has exempted him from all damages by leakage, and the tenant injured neglected to turn off water running to water closet on the floor above that he had the use of. Taylor v. Bailey, 74 Ill. 178.

But a landlord is bound to keep in condition pipes used in common by several tenants. Fitch v. Armour, 27 Jones & S. 413.

A landlord having notice of misuse of water closet by upper tenants in common is liable, in Georgia, to lower tenants for damages from overflow. Marshall v. Cohen, 44 Ga. 489, 9 Am. Rep. 170.

And is liable to his tenant for injuries from defective water pipes of another tenant. Ingwersen v. Rankin, 47 N. J. L. 18, 54 Am. Rep. 109.

And under N. Y. Laws 1860, chap. 335, providing that tenancy shall cease if premises are untenable, rent cannot be collected from a tenant who was forced to leave by reason of defective plumbing of other tenant. St. Michaels Prot. Episcopal Church v. Behrens, 10 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 181.

Water supply.

A landlord cannot cut off water supply pipes. Gans v. Hughes, 38 N. Y. S. R. 490; West Side Sav. Bank v. Newton, 76 N. Y. 618, reversing 8 Daly, 382.

But where no duty rested on the landlord to apportion the water tax, and the tenant of the fourth and fifth floors refused to pay a bill for the whole, and the supply was cut off by the city, and then he had to pay it all and pipe his own part, he was liable for rent as the lease did not guarantee a supply of water. Reynolds v. Meldrum, 33 N. Y. S. R. 564.

And where the water supply was cut off, but the answer did not show that it was on account of a leak in another part of the building, and might have been cut off by some tenant without the landlord's knowledge, the tenant was liable for rent. Coddington v. Dunham, 8 Jones & S. 412.

A landlord leasing a house and land, with a license to use a pump on another tract, is not liable in an action of covenant for nonrepair of the pump. If an action would lie it would be an action of case. Pomfret v. Riccroft, 1 Wms. Saund. 4th ed. 322.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Richard A. TYSON et al., Appts.,
v.
WESTERN NATIONAL BANK OF BALTIMORE.

(77 Md. 412.)

1. An indorsement "for collection" will not pass the title to commercial paper to the bank in which it is deposited.
2. Entering the amount of commercial paper deposited with a bank "for collection" as cash in the pass-book of the depositor and to his credit on the books of the bank will not pass to the bank the title to the paper if it was not to be an absolute credit but was to be charged back if not collected.
3. The collection of paper deposited with a bank indorsed "for collection" after the bank has ceased to do business because of insolvency will not vest the title to the paper in the bank.
4. A third person can acquire from the bank no title to commercial paper deposited with an indorsement "for collection."
5. No judgment can be rendered in a case submitted to the court for its opinion upon an agreed statement of facts, unless a request for judgment is distinctly made in the agreed case.

(March 16, 1893.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of the proceeds of a draft and check which belonged to plaintiff. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller & Bonsal, for appellants:

When a draft, check, or note is indorsed "for collection" for account of "such indorsement is known in law as a restrictive indorsement, and the effect of it is to retain the title to the paper in the indorser.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 836, 837; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 593; Cecil Bank v. Farmers Bank, 22 Md. 148; National Butchers & Drovers Bank v. Hubbell, 7 L. R. A. 853, 117 N. Y. 384; Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 40 Fed. Rep. 46; Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 2 L. R. A. 699, 148 Mass. 553; Levi v. National Bank of Missouri, 5 Dill. 107; Balbach v. Bank of Monroe, 83 Fed. Rep. 406; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 183 U. S. 556, 33 L. ed. 688; Scott v. Ocean Bank, 23 N. Y. 289.

The language of the indorsement is without ambiguity, and needs no explanation, either by parol proof or by resort to usage. It does not purport to transfer the title of the paper or the ownership of the money when received. Both these remain, by the reasonable and almost necessary meaning of the language, in the indorser.

White v. Miners Nat. Bank of Georgetown, Colo. 102 U. S. 660, 26 L. ed. 253.

Nor is the effect of the written contracts between the parties made by indorsements and letters, to be altered by the fact that Tyson & Rawls were entitled to check against the credits given them, before the proceeds of the paper actually came into the hands of J. J. Nicholson & Sons.

St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 574, 33 L. ed. 686; Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, supra; Giles v. Perkins, 9 East, 12, approved in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, supra; Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, and Levi v. National Bank of Missouri, supra.

The indorsement upon the draft and check gave notice to the appellee that the appellants were the owners, and J. J. Nicholson & Sons merely agents for collection, and therefore the appellee acquired the paper with notice of and subject to the rights of the appellants.

I. 119, 28 Am. Rep. 429, and Claflin v. Wilson, 51 Iowa, 15.

If appellee was the sub-agent for collection, Tyson & Rawls could recover.

Cecil Bank v. Farmers Bank, First Nat. Bank of Circleville v. Bank of Monroe, and Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, supra; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 591.

The insolvency of an agent revokes the agency; and when J. J. Nicholson & Sons made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, their agency to collect money for Tyson & Rawls terminated, and the money afterwards coming into the hands of the assignees, from this check and draft, would be held by the assignees in trust for Tyson & Rawls.

NOTE.—The effect of the indorsement of paper "for collection" to prevent the passing of title on a deposit of such paper in a bank, is a question on which the above case fairly represents the current of decisions.

On this subject in harmony with the present case, see National Butchers & Drovers Bank v. Hubbell (N. Y.) 7 L. R. A. 852, and note; Freeman's Nat. Bank v. National Tube Works Co. (Mass.) 8 L. R. A. 42, and note; also Armstrong v. Boyertown 28 L. R. A.

On the more difficult question of the effect of an indorsement of a check "for deposit," on which there has been but little authority, although the custom of making such indorsements is quite general, see Ditch v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, post, 164, and note.

Messrs. Schmucker & Whitelock for appellee.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Tyson & Rawls brought suit against the Western Bank of Baltimore. The facts, so far as they are material, are as follows: The plaintiffs who were bankers in Greenville, North Carolina, for two years before the transactions now in question kept an account with Nicholson & Sons, bankers in the city of Baltimore. They from time to time forwarded by mail to Nicholson & Sons drafts, checks, and notes of different persons, and they were indorsed in this manner: "For collection for account of Tyson and Rawls, Greenville, N. C." Nicholson & Sons would at once pass to the credit of Tyson & Rawls upon their ledger account, as cash, all checks and sight drafts, and would promptly inform them by mail of the amount of such credit. Tyson & Rawls were entitled to check against such credits as soon as they were entered, and Nicholson & Sons treated and used as their own property the sight drafts and checks so credited, in the same manner as if they had been deposited over their counter in the ordinary way; but Tyson & Rawls did not know and did not inquire how Nicholson & Sons treated and dealt with such drafts and checks. If any of the sight drafts or checks which were credited as cash were dishonored by the parties on whom they were drawn, Nicholson & Sons would charge the account of Tyson & Rawls with them and give them notice by mail. When promissory notes or time drafts were mailed to Nicholson & Sons, they were not entered to the credit of Tyson & Rawls until they had been collected. There was no special agreement between these parties in regard to their relations with each other except such as arose from their course of dealing.

On the 9th of January, 1892, Tyson & Rawls forwarded to Nicholson & Sons a check of P. E. Braswell on the State Bank of Commerce, Hendersonville, North Carolina, for $400 payable to the order of Jarvis & Blow. They had discounted this check, and they indorsed it for collection for their account. Nicholson & Sons credited it to them as cash, and so informed them by mail, and indorsed it for value to the Western National Bank of Baltimore. The bank collected the check on or about the 24th of February, 1892, and it retains the proceeds as its own property. On the 11th of January, 1892, Tyson & Rawls forwarded to Nicholson & Sons a sight draft of J. C. Cobb & Brothers on Cobb Brothers & Gillian of Norfolk Virginia for $800. They had discounted this check, and they indorsed it to Nicholson & Sons for collection for their account. Nicholson & Sons credited it to them as cash, and so informed them by mail, and indorsed it for value to the Western National Bank of Baltimore. The bank collected the draft on the 14th of January, 1892, and it holds the proceeds as its own. Nicholson & Sons failed on the 14th of January, 1892, subsequently to their indorsement of the check and draft to the Western National Bank; but they were insolvent at the time they received the check and draft from Tyson & Rawls, and upon a proper investigation of the business, this fact would have been apparent to the surviving partner, who had charge of the affairs of the firm; but it was not known to Tyson & Rawls nor to the Western Bank. Nicholson & Sons had an account with the Western Bank in which the check and draft were credited as cash; they overdrew their account and have never made it good. Tyson & Rawls never checked to the full extent of their credit with Nicholson & Sons, but always kept a balance in their favor, and at the time of the failure had a balance greater than the amount of the proceeds of the check and draft in question. It is admitted that both parties to this suit have acted in good faith in all of their dealings in the matters now in issue. It is well settled that when a customer of a bank deposits money to the credit of his account, the money becomes the property of the bank. The customer is creditor and the bank is debtor, with all the ordinary incidents belonging to that legal relation. There is no fiduciary connection between them. The depositor parts with his money, and the bank contracts an obligation to pay such checks as he may draw to an amount not exceeding the sum deposited. The consideration which the depositor receives for his money is the absolute and unconditional contract by the bank to pay his checks to the extent of his deposit. And the same rule obtains in the case of checks, drafts, and promissory notes, wherever, under the circumstances of the case, it is applicable; that is to say, wherever the bank becomes the owner of the commercial paper, and the customer acquires the unconditional right to draw for the proceeds. When a check, draft, or promissory note is indorsed in blank, or to the order of the bank, and the proceeds credited to the depositor as cash, the bank becomes the owner of the paper by virtue of the indorsement. And, in case it is not paid at maturity, it has the ordinary remedies which belong to the indorsee of instruments of this character which have been dishonored. In the present case the check and draft were deposited with Nicholson & Sons with an indorsement in these words: "For collection for account of Tyson & Rawls." This indorsement was not adequate to pass to Nicholson & Sons the title to these papers. It has been so held by this court, and the Supreme Court of the United States, and other courts. In Sweeney v. Easter, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 166, 17 L. ed. 681, it was said: "The words 'for collection' evidently had a meaning. That meaning was intended to limit the effect which would have been given to the indorsement without them and warned the party that contrary to the purpose of a general or blank indorsement, this was not intended to transfer the ownership of the note, or its proceeds." In White v. Miners Nat. Bank of Georgetown, Colo., 102 U. S. 660, 26 L. ed. 257, where the indorsement was "Pay S. V. W. order for account of Miners Nat. Bk. of Georgetown" it was said: "The plain meaning of it [the indorsement] is, that the acceptor of the draft is to pay it to the indorsee for the use of the indorser. The indorsee is to receive it on account of the indorser. It does not purport to transfer the title of the paper or the ownership of the money when received. Both these remain, by the reasonable and almost necessary meaning of the language, in the indorser." The same meaning was attributed to such an indorsement in Cecil Bank v. Farmers Bank, 22 Md. 148.

It would be superfluous to make further citations on this point. The indorsement did not pass the title, and no other way has been shown in this case, by which it could have been passed. Entering the amounts represented by these papers as cash to the credit of Tyson & Rawls is very far from having such an effect. It was the clear understanding that this was not an absolute and unconditional credit; but that it was to be charged back to the depositors in case the paper should not be paid at maturity. The paper was not sent to Nicholson & Sons to be discounted, or to be purchased by them, but it was intrusted to them as agents to collect it; and Nicholson & Sons could not treat it as a discount or purchase except by making an agreement to that effect with their correspondents. It probably suited their mutual interest and convenience to make these qualified entries. The depositaries probably had sufficient confidence in the pecuniary ability of these depositors to give them a credit for the short time that would intervene before the maturity of sight drafts. It is a very common practice with bankers to deal in this manner with their customers who are in good credit. In the argument this entry was likened to a collection of the commercial paper by the depository. It was not in point of fact a collection. Nor was it similar in its effects and consequences. When a collection is made the proceeds are placed absolutely and unconditionally to the credit of the depositor and he is no longer under any responsibility on account of the paper deposited; as that question has been irrevocably settled by payment. In point of fact when collected the paper has lost its vitality by the settlement; and satisfaction of all rights which can arise from it. It would have been perfectly competent for Nicholson & Sons to agree with Tyson & Rawls that they would consider this paper as collected, pay them the amount of it, and relieve them from all responsibility on account of it. But no such agreement was made; their contract was entirely different. If the paper had not been paid at maturity, it would have been charged back to Tyson & Rawls. It would be very unjust to hold Tyson & Rawls responsible for the contingency of payment of these instruments and at the same time to hold that they had lost the title to them by a sort of constructive and metaphysical collection. It may be objected that as the check and draft were actually paid at maturity the contingent responsibility of the depositors has not accrued. But we must judge of legal rights by the state of the facts which exist at the time they arise, and not by events which occur afterwards. One circumstance existing at the time will show the value of the cash entry as a consideration for the transfer of the check and draft. Nicholson & Sons were insolvent when the deposit was made, and they knew or ought to have known their pecuniary condition; and as a matter of course that the credit entry of cash was a mere delusion. Upon the whole it appears to us that the title to these papers did not pass to Nicholson & Sons. There has been much apparent conflict between the authorities on the questions which we have discussed. But the conflict is more in appearance than in reality. In most, if not all, of the cases which have held that when checks, drafts, and promissory notes have been deposited with a bank, and credited as cash to the depositor, the title to the negotiable paper has passed, it will be found that it was either indorsed in blank, or made payable to the banker. On the face of the paper he was owner, and in case it was dishonored, he had his remedy against the depositor, as indorser. The opinion in National Butchers & Drovers Bank v. Hubbell, 117 N. Y. 384, 7 L. R. A. 852, contains a very clear and convincing exposition of the difference between the rights of the banker in case of such deposit, and one where the paper is indorsed for collection. And even in case where a sight draft was deposited, payable to the order of the bank, and was credited as cash, it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the title to the draft did not pass, because the accompanying circumstance showed that it was not so intended; and the court said that "the property in notes or bills transmitted to a banker by his customer to be credited to the latter, vests in the banker only when he has become absolutely responsible for the amount to the depositor," and that "such an obligation previous to the collection of the bill can only be established by a contract to be expressly proved, or inferred from an unequivocal course of dealing." St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 688. The terms of the indorsement of the check and draft in this case gave legal notice to all persons receiving them that Tyson & Rawls were owners of the papers, and that Nicholson & Sons were merely agents for collection. Cecil Bank v. Farmers Bank, 22 Md. 148. The Western Bank could therefore acquire no title by the indorsement, made to it, and is responsible to Tyson & Rawls for the proceeds collected.

This case was submitted to the trial court upon an agreement signed by counsel which begins in the following terms: "It is agreed by the plaintiffs and defendant that this case be tried before the court without a jury, and upon the following statement of facts, hereby agreed upon." If this is the substitution of the court for a jury, as the language seems to indicate, the rulings of the court ought to be brought before us by a bill of exceptions, just as they would be in a jury trial. This point has often been decided. Many of the cases on this question are collected in Trustees of Methodist Episcopal Church v. Brown, 89 Md. 160. More recent decisions are McCullough v. Biedler, 66 Md. 283, and Jackson v. Salisbury Comrs. Id. 459. When the court takes the place of a jury, the circumstance that the facts were admitted can make no difference; because facts may be admitted before a jury, as well as before a court, and in either case the law requires that the specific point or question to which objection is made must be shown by a bill of exceptions. But parties may make a case stated for the opinion of the court. This is a very old practice, and is quite distinct from the right given by the constitution to try a case by consent before the court without a jury. In the former case the court is in the exercise of its inherent functions to decide questions of law submitted to it; all the facts must be stated, and the court cannot draw inferences from them, unless there is an agreement to that effect. In a trial before the court sitting by consent without a jury, it deals with the facts in all respects as a jury would do. In a case stated, it ought affirmatively to appear that it is submitted to the court for its opinion on the law, and that it is requested to render a judgment in accordance therewith. An examination of the numerous cases of this kind which appear in our Reports will show that this is the approved practice in civil cases. We are not now concerned with criminal procedure. In a comparatively recent case in this court (Brinkley v. Hambleton, 67 Md. 169), the printed volume does not show that this practice was followed; but the transcript of the record shows distinctly that the case was submitted to the court for its opinion, and that it was requested to enter judgment for plaintiff or defendant according as its opinion might be. And there are other cases in which the printed volume omits this portion of the case, stated although contained in the transcript of the record. It has been adjudged so important that this court in Marine Bank of Baltimore v. Merchants Bank of Baltimore, 12 Gill & J. 498, held that it was error in the trial court to render judgment without this provision. They say "There being no provision in the case stated, as to judgment to be entered, after the court's opinion is expressed on the question submitted, the court can give no judgment, and the cause must be remanded." It is also customary to state that a right to appeal is reserved to each party where an appeal is contemplated. From the peculiar form of the statement of facts in this case, we were in some doubt whether we could consider the questions presented. But as the counsel on both sides regarded it as a case stated, and so argued it; and as, although we feel the necessity of maintaining the established methods of procedure, we are always very unwilling to permit justice to be impeded by matters of form, when it can be properly avoided,—we have thought that it was appropriate to express our opinion on the matters in controversy according to the wish of counsel on both sides. Following the precedent in Marine Bank of Baltimore v. Merchants Bank of Baltimore, we will reverse the judgment, and remand the case. As the parties now know our opinion, they can settle. 28 L. R. A.

tle this controversy without further litigation, if they elect to do so.

Reversed and remanded.

Alvey, Ch. J., concurred:

As the judgment appealed from must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial, because of the omission in the case stated to provide for the judgment to be entered. In accordance with the opinion of the court on the facts (Marine Bank of Baltimore v. Merchants Bank of Baltimore, 12 Gill & J. 498; Burgess v. Poe, 2 Gill & J. 254, 291.) I prefer to express no opinion upon the facts contained in the defective statement. A proper decision of the case may depend essentially upon facts that can only be arrived at inferentially, as the case is now presented (St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683), and the court is not at liberty to make inferences of fact upon a case stated. The court can only declare the law arising upon the facts contained in the statement, as in the case of a special verdict. Stewart v. State, 2 Harr. & G. 114; Keenide v. Fischer, Id. 320; Miller v. Negro Charles, 1 Gill & J. 890; Hysinger v. Bultaell, 3 Gill & J. 153; Lewis v. Hoblitzell, 6 Gill & J. 259.

WESTERN NATIONAL BANK OF BALTIMORE.

(.....Md.....)

1. On indorsement "for deposit" of a check, which is credited as cash by the bank which receives it, and thereafter by indorsement in the same form is transferred to another bank, which in good faith credits it as cash and pays the proceeds to the former bank, which afterwards makes an assignment for creditors, the title to the check must be held to be in the bank which holds it and has paid for it.

NOTE.—Indorsement of check "for deposit."

Notwithstanding the very general practice of indorsing checks "for deposit," the effect of such indorsement has been brought to adjudication in surprisingly few cases.

While these cases do not entirely agree in holding such an indorsement to constitute a retention of title in the depositor, it may be said that they sufficiently establish the rule that such is the effect of the indorsement in the absence of any agreement or practice to the contrary.

Thus in Beal v. Somerville (C. C. App. 1st C.) 17 L. R. A. 291, a deposit by a city treasurer of checks on another bank, indorsed "for deposit," was held not to pass the title to the checks to the bank in which they were deposited, although the depositor was immediately given credit therefor on his pass-book, where there was no agreement with him for such credit and no practice or custom which was equivalent to such agreement. Therefore, on the insolvency of the bank in which the checks were deposited, before collecting the checks, the title to the proceeds did not belong to the bank, or its receiver.

The discussion of this case by both the prevailing and dissenting opinions in the above case of Dixon

2. Testimony of a depositor that he regarded a check as deposited for collection is incompetent as a conclusion, where the indorsement was "for deposit."

(Robinson, Ch. J., and Fowler and Roberts, JJ., dissent.)

(March 15, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court, No. 2, of Baltimore City in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of a certain check which was alleged to be the property of the plaintiffs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard Bernard and Alfred D. Bernard, for appellants:

Nicholson knew when he accepted the check in controversy that he was hopelessly insolvent, which fact was then unknown to the appellants. Therefore the acceptance of said check was a fraud upon them, and they are entitled to recover it unless the holder thereof shows itself to be a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the rights of the appellants.

Apart from the question of the insolvency of Nicholson, the appellants are the owners of the check in question,—Nicholson never being the owner thereof, but merely their agent to collect the same, the title thereto remaining in the appellants until collected.

Beal v. Somerville, 17 L. R. A. 291, 15 U. S. App. 14, 50 Fed. Rep. 647; Manufacturer's Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 2 L. R. A. 669, 148 Mass. 558; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, supra; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, §§ 584, 586; National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 173, 54 Am. Rep. 50; Bulbach v. Prelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675. See also Dan. Neg. Inst. ed. 1891, § 340a, b, c.

If, upon the facts in the record, Nicholson was Ditch & Bro.'s agent, it follows that the Western Bank was the agent of Nicholson and the relation of the Western Bank to Ditch & Bro. was that of sub agent, therefore Ditch & Bro. are as much entitled to recover the check from one as the other.

There is a plain duty imposed upon the two banks by the transaction, to collect the check if good, to promptly return it if not good. The character of the transaction is shown by both indorsements.

Miller v. Farmers & M. Bank of Carroll County, 30 Md. 400; Wilson v. Smith, 44 U. S. 8 How. 763, 11 L. ed. 820; Freeman v. Exchange Bank of Macon, 87 Ga. 45.

The restrictive indorsement, "For deposit to the credit of J. S. Ditch & Bro." disclosed the conditions upon which they parted with the check in question and therefore no one can be a bona fide holder thereof for value, without full notice of all the facts growing out of the relation arising from that indorsement.

Freeman v. Exchange Bank of Macon, supra; Beal v. Somerville, supra; White v. Miners Nat. Bank of Georgetown, Colo. 102 U. S. 658, 26 L. ed. 250; Blaine v. Bourne, 11 R. I. 119, 23 Am. Rep. 429; Lee v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank of Ohio, 1 Bond, C. C. 887.

Any indorsement which shows that the holder of the check did not purchase and pay for it is a restrictive indorsement.

White v. Miners Nat. Bank of Georgetown, Colo., supra; Power v. Finnie, 4 Call (Va.) 411; Wilson v. Holmes, 5 Mass. 543, 4 Am. Dec. 75; First Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Reno County Bank, 3 Fed. Rep. 261; Lee v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank of Ohio, Beal v. Somerville, and Freeman v. Exchange Bank of Macon, supra; Lawrence v. Fussell, 77 Pa. 460.

A non-restrictive indorsement alone gives the right to assume that the indorsee was a purchaser for value; that on the face of the paper he is the owner thereof.

Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, ante, 161, 77 Md. 412; Sweeney v. Easter, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 166, 17 L. ed. 681.

The account between Nicholson and the Western Bank showed, when the failure was announced, a balance in favor of Nicholson

V. WESTERN NAT. BANK OF BALTIMORE. seems sufficiently to show that it is to be accepted as correct, where no rights of a bona fide purchaser or transferee for value have intervened.

In Freeman v. Exchange Bank of Macon, 87 Ga. 45, the same indorsement was held legally to import an intention of ownership, in the absence of any extrinsic facts to show a different intent. Therefore, expert testimony to show the meaning of such indorsement was held inadmissible in that case as well as in the above case of DITCH V. WESTERN NAT. BANK OF BALTIMORE.

Neither of these cases excludes the right to consider a custom or course of dealing as bearing on the intention of the parties in respect to such an indorsement, and in the case of National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 173, 54 Am. Rep. 50, it is expressly held that such an indorsement must be considered in the light of the attendant circumstances and previous dealings, and the court says: "Where a depositor has for some time previously kept a deposit account with the banker, on which he was accustomed to deposit checks payable to him, entries of which were made in his pass-book, and to draw against such deposit, an indorsement, 23 L. R. A.

in the absence of a different understanding, is presumptive of more than a mere agency or authority to collect." Here, plainly, the custom of making credits in the depositor's pass-book, and his drawing against such deposits, is a significant fact in respect to his intention to pass title by the depositor. But in this case the bank in which the deposit was made had obtained a certification of the checks, which was held to create a new contract by which the checks were in effect paid, so far as the drawer and indorser were concerned.

These three cases, all of which are discussed in the opinions in the main case, are all that have been found in which an indorsement "for deposit" has been considered, although millions of such indorsements are undoubtedly made every year. The fact that in the present case of DITCH V. WESTERN NAT. BANK OF BALTIMORE the check thus indorsed had been transferred by the bank in which it was deposited with a similar indorsement, to another bank, the latter of which had not only given credit to the other in good faith, but had actually paid to it the proceeds, is a very important feature, which fairly distinguishes this case from the others.

of $3,500. Down to that time the plaintiff believed Nicholson to be solvent and would have paid and certified all it did pay and certify and $1,000 besides, if Nicholson had not made the last deposit. Therefore there was no special credit given or risk incurred by the plaintiff on the faith of the check in question and there is no equity in the plaintiff's contention.

Miller v. Farmers & M. Bank of Carroll County, 80 Md. 401.

The property in notes or bills transmitted to a banker by his customer to be credited to the latter vest in the banker only when it has become absolutely responsible for the amount to the depositor, and such an obligation previous to the collection of the bill, can only be established by a contract to be expressly proved or inferred from an unequivocal course of dealing.

Balbach v. Freelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675; Newmark, Bank Deposits, § 209; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 23 L. ed. 683; Scott v. Ocean Bank, 23 N. Y. 289; Freemans Nat. Bank v. National Tube Works Co. 8 L. R. A. 42, 151 Mass. 413.

When the bank is insolvent, the matter is still clearer. It is then a fraud upon the depositor for the bank to receive a check, and if a check indorsed in blank be deposited by a customer ignorant of the bank's condition, and the bank immediately goes into the hands of a receiver, no title whatever passes from the depositor to the bank.

Messrs. Schmucker & Whitelock for appellees.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves a question of considerable importance. Thomas J. Shyrook & Co. drew their check for $187.55 on the Third National Bank of Baltimore, payable to the order of John E. Reese. Reese indorsed it in these words: "Pay to the order of J. S. Ditch & Brother." The next indorsement was in these words: "For deposit to the credit of J. S. Ditch & Brother," signed "per T. F. Cassidy." It was admitted that Cassidy had due authority from Ditch & Brother to make and sign this indorsement. Luther Ditch, a member of the firm of Ditch & Brother, in person deposited this check, together with others, in the bank of J. J. Nicholson & Sons, and they at the same time entered a credit of cash to the amount of all these checks in the deposit books of Ditch & Brother, and also in their own books. Ditch's testimony on this point is as follows: "That he handed his deposit to John R. Nicholson in person. That his firm kept another pass-book with Nicholson & Sons, in which accounts were left for collection, on which promissory notes only were entered. That when these promissory notes were paid credit was entered on the regular deposit book. All checks, whether out of town or city checks, were entered on the regular deposit books as cash; on a few occasions checks dated ahead were entered as cash. If necessary, or if they were short of funds, they checked immediately after the deposit was made. They made no special arrangement about checking on deposit. . . . That the paper left for collection, consisting of promissory notes, was not carried to the deposit books until the collection had been made, but all checks were entered in the deposit book when deposited as cash, as if they were so much currency, and they were at liberty to check against such deposits as soon as made, if they desired." Mathew Aiken, general book-keeper for Nicholson & Sons, testified: "that he knew J. S. Ditch & Bro.; that they had two accounts with his bank and a separate pass-book for each account—one a deposit account and the other an account for collection. The collection went to their credit when collected, and were then marked off their collection book and credited on the deposit book. The deposits made by Ditch & Bro. went to their credit on the books of Nicholson & Sons on the same day the deposit was made, and they were credited on the deposit book of Ditch & Bro. at the time the deposit was made;" and also "that the check in question forms a part of a credit of cash of $929.75 to Ditch & Bro. in their deposit book with Nicholson & Sons on January 14, 1892, and that the amount of the credit was so entered on the deposit book at the time the deposit was made, and was carried to their credit on the books of Nicholson & Sons;" and also "that all checks deposited by Ditch & Bro. were entered on their deposit book as cash and subject to immediate withdrawal in currency or anything else."

When Ditch deposited this check it is evident that he did not wish to have the money for it paid into his hands, because if he had wished the money it would have been as easy to obtain it from the Third National Bank as to deposit the check; and secondly, because, according to his own testimony and Aiken's, he could have drawn the money immediately if he had chosen to do so. Instead of the money he preferred a credit with Nicholson & Sons subject to his check; this was in all respects more convenient to him than the possession in hand of currency or coin. And this is what the indorsement plainly meant; the check was to be deposited, and the amount of it was to be placed to the credit of Ditch & Bro. The indorsement was in blank, so far as the name of the indorsee is concerned; but when Ditch handed the check to Nicholson & Sons with the book in which his deposits were entered as cash, he evidently intended that the deposit should be entered in that book, and that he should receive credit for the amount of the check as cash, and that Nicholson & Sons should be the holders of the check as indorsees in blank. No form of words could have made his meaning plainer. And this meaning is in exact accordance with the indorsement. The indorsement showed that it was to be deposited in a banking house, and that Ditch & Bro. were to receive credit for it; but the name of the banking house was not mentioned; it was left blank. By delivery Ditch designated the bankers with whom it was to give credit. If Nicholson & Sons had paid to Ditch & Bro. the full amount of the check in coin or currency when it was delivered to them, it is supposed that there would have been no question about the nature and effect of the transaction. But they gave Ditch & Bro. what was preferred to the coin or currency; they gave them the unconditional right to get the coin or currency at any time they might see fit to call for it, thus relieving them from the trouble and risk attending the care and custody of it. Now it is extremely difficult to see on what principle or by what process Ditch & Bro. could retain any interest in this check after they had delivered it to a blank indorsee and had received full and valuable consideration for it. It will not be alleged by any one that the banker did not give a consideration, valuable in the eye of the law, and sufficient to maintain the transfer of the check, when he made an absolute and unconditional contract with the depositor to pay his checks to the amount of the deposit. This point was decided in Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, 77 Md. 413, ante, 161. It has been asked what would be the condition of the bank in case this check should be dishonored when presented for payment. The answer is not difficult. In Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore the court thought that the bank would have against the depositor the ordinary remedies which belong to the indorsee of dishonored instruments of this character. It could certainly recover from him the amount of the check. And here we may notice a portion of the testimony which has been made the subject of a good deal of comment.

Aiken testified as follows: "It was not the custom of Nicholson & Sons to charge back to the depositors the checks which had been deposited with them and were dishonored. The custom was to have returned the checks to the party and to get the money refunded." John Ditch testified "should any check be returned they (Ditch & Bro.) had always to make them good. That the Nicholsons never bothered themselves about the unpaid checks." This testimony merely shows that the bank was aware of its legal rights and that depositors paid voluntarily what they could have been compelled to pay by suit at law. Persons engaged in mercantile pursuits would lose all commercial credit and standing if they did not promptly perform their plain and well understood obligations.

In Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore the draft deposited was indorsed in these words: "For collection for account of Tyson and Rawls, Greenville, N. C." This court held that this indorsement was not adequate to pass to the holders the title to the draft; and that the evidence in the case did not show any other way by which it could have been passed. The court also held that it was the clear understanding between the parties that Tyson & Rawls (the depositors) should not obtain an absolute and unconditional credit in consequence of the deposit. It being our opinion that Nicholson & Sons acquired title to this check, we must declare our carefully considered judgment. If other tribunals for whose learning and ability we entertain the greatest respect have arrived at conclusions different from our own, we do not feel called upon to abandon the deliberate convictions which we entertain. But we do not assume that there is a great contrariety in the opinions of the courts on this question. A great many cases have been brought to judgment; but their facts have been diversified in great variety. It has always been held that the bank and the depositors could make their own contracts. Sometimes they have been made in express terms; and sometimes they have been inferred from the acts and conduct of the parties and the regular and established course of dealing between them. It can readily be seen how broad a field of inquiry has been spread out before the courts and what diversities of facts and combinations of facts would probably be presented for their consideration. Among the great number of cases which have been earnestly pressed upon us, we will cite three in which the effect of an indorsement for deposit was considered. The first is National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 168, 54 Am. Rep. 50. In this case the bank brought an action against Proskaner, and sued out a garnishment, which was served on Miller & Co., private bankers, who were alleged to be the debtors of Proskaner. We will state the court's opinion in its own words: "The defendant, in the name of A. Proskaner & Co., agents, opened in January, 1883, a deposit account with the garnishees, who were bankers. On this account the defendant deposited checks payable to A. Proskaner & Co., agents, which were entered in the pass book, and drew checks in the same name 'on funds so deposited.' The check in question was indorsed 'For deposit, A. Proskaner & Co., Agents.' The import and effect of such indorsement must be considered in the right of the attendant circumstances, and of the previous dealings between the parties. Where a depositor has for some time previously kept a deposit account with a banker, on which he was accustomed to deposit checks payable to him, entries of which were made in his pass-book and to draw against such deposits, such an indorsement, in the absence of a different understanding, is presumptive of more than a mere agency or authority to collect. The special purposes for which an indorsement for deposit is made, under such circumstances, may be readily inferred. It was a request and direction to the garnishees to deposit the same to the credit of the defendant, and conferred on them, not only authority to collect, but also authority to put the check in such form, and use it in such manner, as in their judgment and discretion, having reference to the condition and necessities of their business, would make it most available to their protection. The effect of the indorsement for the consummation of this purpose is to vest the garnishees with the title to and control of the check. If in such case the check is not paid the banker depends for safety and indemnity on the liability of the drawer, and the security of the indorsement. It appeared that Miller & Co., the garnishees, had presented the check for certification to the bank on which it was drawn, and that it was certified by that bank in these words: "Good for eight thousand dollars." The court says that the certification made a new and distinct contract between the holder and the certifying bank, which thereby became the debtor of the holder; and that the drawer and indorser of the check were released from all liability on it, and that as to them it was paid. The significance of the certification was a question in the case, because after it had been made and after service of the garnishment, the defendant gave notice to Miller & Co., the garnishees, that he revoked their authority to collect it, and that they were forbidden to present it for payment. But as it was already paid in legal effect to Miller & Co., they were the debtors of the defendant, and the notice was not efficacious to change the rights of the attaching creditor or to displace the lien on the debt which he had acquired by service of the garnishment. We have mentioned the certification of the check and its consequences, because these matters were zealously urged in the discussion of this case. But we do not see how they bear any analogy to the facts on which the rights of the parties in the present case depend. The other two cases were thought to be still more decisive.

In one of them, Freeman v. Exchange Bank of Macon, 87 Ga. 45, the court used this language: "There being in evidence no facts extrinsic to the bill itself and its indorsement to throw light upon the question of title, we are not to be understood as holding that such facts might not exert a controlling influence on the question. Indeed, there is authority for giving them such effect when duly proved." A deposit of paper in bank by a customer, he indorsing it "for deposit," may operate to clothe the bank with title under certain circumstances. National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 168, 54 Am. Rep. 50. The other case is Beal v. Somerville, 50 Fed. Rep. 647, 17 L. R. A. 291, 5 U. S. App. 14.

Checks were deposited in the Maverick National Bank by the treasurer of the city of Somerville; each of them was indorsed "for deposit." The deposit was made about 15 minutes before 3 o'clock in the afternoon; at 3 o'clock of the same day the bank closed its doors and never opened them again for business. At the time of the deposit it was irretrievably insolvent. Beal was appointed its receiver and a bill in equity was filed against him by the city of Somerville. In the bill the facts just mentioned were alleged, and also the following: "The treasurer had for several years made deposits with the bank without any special agreement in regard thereto; there was no agreement that checks deposited should be considered as cash, or that the treasurer could draw against them before collection. The treasurer never drew a check for which his deposit was not sufficient without counting the proceeds of uncollected checks, except in a few instances, on a few occasions, by special arrangement with the bank. There was no express understanding that the checks should be credited to the city immediately on deposit, but they were always so credited on the pass-book at the time of the deposit. . . . It was the practice of the Maverick and the other banks in Boston, in some cases, to allow depositors to draw against checks deposited before such checks were collected, and in some cases not, depending on the bank's opinion of the reliability of the depositors and the makers of the checks." A demurrer was filed, admitting, of course, the facts stated. The court, in its opinion, said, among other things, Beal "fails to show that the city had an absolute right to check against the deposit as soon as made irrevocable by notice from the bank; and that such right did not exist must be received by this court as a matter of judicial knowledge." The decree determined that the checks were the property of the city. We have not made these citations for the purpose of criticising these decisions, nor for the purpose of inquiring whether they sustain or oppose the judgment which we have formed in the case before us. Our object has been to show the great variety in the facts and details of the cases which have been adjudged; and to illustrate a sound juridical principle,—that differing facts may justly lead to differing conclusions of law.

John Ditch testified that he regarded all the checks deposited by him as having been deposited for collection; otherwise, why should they have to make good those which might be returned. The legal character and attributes of the deposit depend upon the indorsement and upon what was said and done at the time the deposit was made, and upon the regular and uniform course of dealing between the parties. The testimony of the witness was his opinion on a question of law. An exception was filed to it and it was undoubtedly incompetent. The check, on the day it was received by Nicholson & Sons, was indorsed by them "for deposit" and deposited in the Western Bank, where they kept an account. It was passed to their credit, subject to their check, and on the same day they largely overdrew their account. Later in the day they made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors, and it became known that they were totally insolvent. Although Nicholson & Sons acquired title to the check in the manner which we have stated, it is quite true that, in a controversy with their trustee, Ditch & Bro. might successfully impeach the transfer for fraud and set it aside. But the question with the Western Bank stands on different grounds. It is a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for value without notice of any facts which would invalidate the title of the indorsers from whom they obtained it. All commercial principles and usages require that such a title should be protected.

At the request of Ditch & Bro. the payment of this check was stopped by the order of Shyroek & Co., the drawers. Shyroek & Co. filed a bill of interpleader in Circuit Court No. 2 of the City of Baltimore, and the court required the Western Bank and Ditch & Bro. to litigate between them their respective claims to the ownership of the check. The decree established the title of the Western Bank, and we affirm it.

Decree affirmed with costs.

Fowler, J., dissenting:

While the amount involved in this appeal is not large, yet the questions presented are of some importance. The controversy here, as in the case of Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, ante, 161, 77 Md. 412, grows out of the conflicting claims of the Western National Bank of Baltimore, and one of the depositors of Nicholson & Sons, bankers, in that city, who failed several years ago.

The check which is the subject of this litigation, was dated January 18, 1892, and was drawn by Thomas J. Shyroek & Co. on the Third National Bank of Baltimore to the order of John E. Reese, who, on the day of its date, indorsed it to J. S. Ditch & Bro., who on the following day indorsed it as follows: "For deposit to the credit of J. S. Ditch & Bro., per Cassidy." Cassidy is a clerk of Ditch & Bro., and there is no question as to his authority to indorse. So indorsed, this check, with several others, amounting in the aggregate to $929.75, was deposited by one of the firm of Ditch & Bro. in the bank of Nicholson & Sons a short time before noon on January 14, 1892. The deposit was at once credited by the Nicholson in the pass-book of Ditch & Bro., and a similar credit was made upon the books of the former, who at once indorsed the check in question thus: "For deposit, J. J. Nicholson & Sons," and deposited it in the Western Bank, receiving credit for the amount of the deposit as cash, both on their pass-book and also on the books of the Western Bank. It is conceded, of course, that Ditch & Bro. believed the Nicholson to be solvent when the deposit was made in the latter's bank, and it would seem that the Nicholson themselves must have been aware that they were not in the solvent condition the appellants believed them to be, for within an hour, or perhaps two, after these deposits were made they had placed on record a deed of trust for the benefit of their creditors, and closed the doors of their bank. On the day of the failure of the Nicholson, Ditch & Bro. heard of it, and immediately requested Shyroek & Co., the makers of the check, to stop payment. This request was complied with, and the check having been duly protested, the Western Bank sued the makers. Whereupon a bill of interpleader, setting forth the respective claims of the Western Bank and Ditch & Bro. was filed by Shyroek & Co., and a decree was passed by Circuit Court No. 2 of Baltimore City requiring the Western Bank and Ditch & Bro. to interplead—the former as plaintiff and the latter as defendants. In accordance with this decree the Western Bank filed its bill, and Ditch & Bro. answered it. The bank alleged substantially that Ditch & Bro. indorsed the check in question to the Nicholson, and deposited it with them as cash, and received credit therefor in their account with the Nicholson, and that the Nicholson thereby became the owners of the check, and having indorsed it to the Western Bank "for deposit," and having deposited it with and received credit for it as cash by said bank, it became and is the bona fide holder of said check by reason of the facts above mentioned and because the Nicholson were permitted to draw from the Western Bank the funds represented by said check. The defense which Ditch & Bro. set up in their answer is that they indorsed the check "for deposit to the credit of J. S. Ditch & Bro." to enable the Nicholson to collect the same in the usual course of business, and receive that character of credit usual to receive when checks are deposited by a customer with a bank for collection. They deny, however, that by such deposit for collection the Nicholson thereby became the owners of said check or that they had a right to indorse the same to the Western Bank or to any one.

Upon the bill, answer, and testimony the court below decreed that the property in the check in question passed from Ditch & Bro. and vested in the Nicholson, and that the latter conferred a perfect title upon the Western Bank. From this decree Ditch & Bro. have appealed, and the question is whether the Western Bank has a valid legal title.

The general question of the relations between depositors and banks as regards their respective rights in and title to negotiable paper deposited by the former with the latter, is much embarrassed by a conflict of authority. But after all, as we said in Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, the conflict is more apparent than real. It will be found that the views expressed by the highest tribunals in this country and in England, when carefully examined, differ not so much in the principles announced as in the facts to which these general principles have been from time to time applied. In most of the cases in which it has been held that the title to negotiable paper passed to the bank from a depositor it will be found that such paper was indorsed in blank or made payable to the bank. After stating the general rule that when a customer deposits money to the credit of his account, the bank becomes debtor and he is creditor, we said in the case just cited: "The consideration which a depositor receives for his money is the absolute and unconditional contract of the bank to pay his checks to the extent of his deposit. And the same rule obtains in the case of checks . . . whenever, under the circumstances of the case, it is applicable, that is to say, whenever the bank becomes the owner of the commercial paper, and the customer acquires the unconditional right to draw for the proceeds. When a check . . . is indorsed in blank, or to the order of the bank, and the proceeds credited to the depositor as cash, the bank becomes the owner of the paper by virtue of the indorsement."

These quotations from such a recent case are sufficient to indicate our views in regard to the character of paper and the forms of indorsement there considered. But the indorsement in this case is neither an indorsement in blank nor to the bank. It is of a very different character, both in form and effect. Its terms are "For deposit to the credit of J. S. Ditch & Bro." It was contended by Ditch & Bro. that this is a restrictive indorsement, and by the Western Bank that it is partly restrictive and partly absolute—restrictive as to all the world except the Nicholsons, and as to them, absolute as soon as it reached their hands.

If such an indorsement as this can be held to pass title to commercial paper, it must be so either because such is the clear meaning of the words used, or because of some artificial or technical, but well known and settled meaning given to the language of the indorsement by the customs and usage of banks and their customers, which indicates a transfer of title was intended, though not expressed. Of course, it is not, and could not be contended in this case, that there is any such custom, for there is no evidence to sustain any such contention. What, then, is the fair and legal construction of this indorsement? In the first place, we start with the presumption that the depositor does not intend to part with title to his paper, subject to be rebutted only by evidence of an express contract to the contrary, or of facts from which such contracts must be inferred. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 340.

We shall presently consider the effect of the credit given to Ditch & Bro. in anticipation of the collection of the proceeds of the check by the Nicholsons, but before doing so we wish to ascertain the purport of the language of the indorsement itself. It is apparent no words are used to indicate a transfer of title; on the contrary, it is conceded the indorsement here used is for the purpose of destroying negotiability in case of loss or miscarriage of the check. If that be its object, it is difficult to understand how such an indorsement, without something added thereto by special agreement, can be relied upon to establish title either in the Nicholsons or the Western Bank. The plain import of the indorsement would seem to be that the check was deposited for collection. What else could have been the object of the deposit? Certainly not for the purpose of getting an immediate credit, for it is in evidence that Ditch & Bro. not only had no agreement allowing them to draw on uncollected checks, but that in point of fact their deposited checks were always collected before they were actually drawn on, and were not considered cash until collected by the Nicholsons. In the case of Beal v. Somerville, 50 Fed. Rep. 647, 17 L. R. A. 201, 5 U. S. App. 14, a case strikingly like the one at bar, and in which the indorsement was "For deposit, John F. Cole, Treasurer," the following facts appeared: Cole, the treasurer of the city of Somerville, indorsed the checks as above and handed them to the receiving teller of the Maverick National Bank with a deposit ticket and also his pass-book, and the teller at once credited therein and on the books of the bank the total amount of the checks. When the checks were received by the bank it was irretrievably insolvent, and closed its doors the same day of the deposit at three o'clock.

There was no agreement to allow the customer to draw at once on the proceeds of deposited checks. It was held, irrespective of the question of insolvency, that title to the checks so indorsed did not pass. "The transaction," says the court, Putnam, J., delivering the opinion, "was primarily a deposit of the checks with, secondarily, a duty to be performed concerning them by the Maverick Bank." After stating the general principle that a deposit of money creates the relation of debtor and creditor between the depositor and the bank, the opinion of the court continues: "But with reference to the checks claimed by the city of Somerville, the word by which the transaction is ordinarily described may conveniently have, and therefore should have, its full natural force and meaning. A mere deposit would only require a bank to keep; but a usage requiring the Maverick Bank to do in this case something more has continued so long, and is so notorious and universal, that the law can take judicial notice of it, and it happens that its terms and limitations cannot be mistaken. The bank must use due diligence to collect; and, as collections are completed, the bank no longer holds the avails as bailee, but is authorized to mingle them with its other funds, and thus constitute itself a debtor."

And again "aside from the right of the bank to constitute itself a debtor from the time the checks are converted into cash or its equivalent, instead of a mere trustee or agent, no qualification of the strict legal relations created by a bailment is deductible from the general nature of the transaction, the terms in which it is expressed or the settled custom, or is shown by" the bank. The case just cited is one of much interest and importance and the opinion of the court bears the impress of the most careful consideration and research.

In Freeman v. Exchange Bank of Macon, 87 Ga. 45, an indorsement precisely like the one we are considering was held to be restrictive. The indorsement was, "For deposit to the credit of S. A. Brown & Co." The indorsers deposited the draft so indorsed in the National Bank of Kansas City, which bank by its cashier indorsed the draft "Pay Exchange Bank or order for collection, account of National Bank of Kansas City." The draft was paid to the Exchange Bank, where the money was attached as the property of S. A. Brown & Co., and it was so held.

The supreme court of Georgia says: "The agency created by the owners of the bill by means of their indorsement had not been fully executed. The Kansas City Bank was still the immediate agent under them, and the Macon (that is the Exchange) Bank was a subagent under it. The latter held the money as a bailee for the ultimate use and benefit of the owners." Again quoting from the same opinion, "The maker of a restricted indorsement can follow the bill or its proceeds over any number of subsequent indorsements, the terms of his indorsement being notice of his title." And, as we have said, it was held that notwithstanding the depositors S. A. Brown & Co. had indorsed their paper, precisely as the paper in this case was indorsed, title did not pass, and the money attached in the hands of the Exchange Bank was condemned as the property of S. A. Brown & Co.

It would too greatly prolong this opinion if we should examine the many cases in which various forms of indorsements have been held restrictive, and we shall only cite a few of them.

"Pay S. V. W. or order for account of Miners' National Bank of Georgetown;" White v. Miners Nat. Bank of Georgetown, Colo., 102 U. S. 658, 26 L. ed. 250; "Pay to P. or order only,"—Power v. Finnie, 4 Call (Va.) 411; "Pay T. W. or order for our use, value received in account,"—Wilson v. Holmes, 5 Mass. 543, 4 Am. Dec. 75; "Pay to the order of W. H. & Co. account,"—First Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Reno County Bank, 3 Fed. Rep. 261; "Credit my account. J. B. S., Cashier,"—Lee v. Chillicothe Branch of State Bank of Ohio, 1 Bond, C. C. 887.

We think, therefore, that looking at the indorsement itself without regard to any course of dealing between the parties, the language of the indorsement cannot be held to transfer title to the check in question, but, on the contrary, must be held to be restrictive, at least, until the bank has performed its duty and has collected the proceeds of the check.

And this is the view very clearly expressed by Mr. Daniel in his work on Negotiable Instruments, even when the paper is so indorsed as prima facie to transfer title, as, for instance, in blank or to the order of the bank. He says that the collection of checks is generally attended with so little delay that banks are willing to treat them as cash deposits, and allow their customers to draw against them in anticipation of collection—reserving the right to charge back the paper to the customer, if returned unpaid. "Out of this practice," says the author, "has grown the erroneous idea that the bank, without more, becomes the owner of the deposited paper before collection." Exemplified in Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 90 N. Y. 530. "Later cases," continues the author, "hold, and correctly, as we conceive, that the checks deposited in bank by its customers do not at once become the property of the bank, but that it continues to be the agent of the customer until actual collection—the check in the meantime remaining the property of the depositor." And in Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675, one of the cases to which reference is made in the note to the section just cited, it was held that even when the check is indorsed to the bank and credit is given for it as cash on the customer's pass-book and the books of the bank, these facts are not conclusive evidence that title passes to the bank, for two reasons, says the court, (1) Because such credit was only conditional, and if the check should be dishonored, it would be charged back to the customer, which is inconsistent with ownership in the bank; and (2) because this practice of banks to credit such deposits at once and to allow the depositor to draw against them is reckoned by the ablest text-writers as a mere gratuitous privilege. See also St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683. It would seem to follow that whether we consider the indorsement alone or in connection with the credit given in this case to Ditch & Bro. by the Nicholsons, the result would be the same. For it is conceded here that no absolute credit was given, the Nicholsons always reserving to themselves the right to charge back or return unpaid paper. As between Ditch & Bro. and the Nicholsons, without regard to the restrictive character of the indorsement, no title to the check passed to the latter. No consideration was paid by them and they were, and they knew they were, insolvent when the check was deposited. "The acceptance of a deposit by a bank irretrievably insolvent constituted such a fraud as entitled the depositor to reclaim his draft or the proceeds." Fuller, Ch. J., St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, supra.

We have neither found nor been referred to any authority which sustains the contention of the appellee, unless the section in Morse on Banks & Banking (sec. 577) cited in the opinion of the learned judge below, can be so considered. But when this section is examined, and especially when it is ascertained that the sole authority (National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 168, 54 Am. Rep. 50), which Mr. Morse cites to sustain it, does not seem to support the contention of the appellee, we may well hesitate before adopting the construction which has been placed upon Mr. Morse's language. It would seem more reasonable to construe this section (577) to mean that when a check is indorsed "for deposit," under the circumstances therein set forth, the bank may have the check certified, instead of actually collecting the money. And so the author says in his last clause of the section. In the case just cited (National Commercial Bank v. Miller) it was held that title passed to the bank for the consummation of the purpose for which the indorsement was made, that is to say, to enable the bank to deposit the proceeds to the credit of the indorser. It is nowhere said in that case that absolute title passed to the bank by virtue of the indorsement alone. But on the contrary the question under consideration was the effect of the indorsement together with the certification of the checks. And having determined that the bank by virtue of the indorsement had the right to have the check certified and that when certified the check was, in contemplation of law, paid, the bank thereupon became the owner of the check and was the debtor of the depositor. In other words the indorsement "for deposit," like the indorsement "for collection," gives the bank the right to collect the proceeds and credit them to the depositor, but in neither case can the bank appropriate to its own use paper so indorsed. Nor does the court, in National Com- mercial Bank v. Miller, intimate such a view. On the contrary it held that the bank, "by accepting a certification of the check made it their own, and the relation of debtor and creditor was created." The indorsement "for deposit" passed title for the purpose of certification, and the certification being, in contemplation of law, payment, the depositor's title to the check was transferred to the bank. Without adopting these views, we have referred to them for the purpose of showing that they do not seem to support the contention of the appellee, nor the construction it gives to section 577 of Morse on Banks & Banking.

There is a wide distinction between National Commercial Bank v. Miller and the case under consideration. There the check was indorsed, deposited, and collected; but here there has been no collection—no payment of the check either in cash or its equivalent. If, however, the section (577) we have just referred to is to have the construction given to it by the appellee, there would be a striking conflict between it and section 584 of the same book, where it is said that when checks are deposited they are taken generally for collection by the bank as agent, and the bank does not owe the amount until the collection is accomplished. The bank may permit, as matter of favor, checks to be drawn before collection and payment, the depositor in the event of non-payment being responsible for the sums so drawn, not by reason of his indorsement, the checks not having ceased to be his property, but for money paid. 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 584. In Bolles on Bank Collections, ed. 1893, § 8c, the author cites the case of Somerville v. Beal, 49 Fed. Rep. 790, to sustain the view that an indorsement "for deposit" with credit and conditional right to draw, transfers title: but this case was taken by appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals, and is reported in 50 Fed. Rep. 647, 17 L. R. A. 291, 5 U. S. App. 14. And in the court last named the contrary doctrine was held and ably maintained by an elaborate opinion from which we have already quoted to show that such an indorsement is restrictive and does not pass title. And in the case of Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, supra, cited by the appellee to sustain its contention, the credit given by the bank to the depositor was an absolute one. "Admitted circumstances," says the court, "show it was the intention of the parties to make the transfer absolute," and "the bank charged itself with a debt absolutely due to Murray," the depositor. But here, as we have seen, there is not only no absolute credit, but "the credit entry of cash was a mere delusion." And, as was said in Beal v. Somerville, supra, if the appellee bank had shown that the depositor had a legal right to draw against the checks from the moment of the deposit, so absolute that the bank could not lawfully suspend it by notice or otherwise, pending the collection, this would tend to support its position throughout. But on the contrary the provisional or mere pretense of a credit, such as shown in this case, is inconsistent with the notion of ownership of the check in the bank. If, however, the check in question had been indorsed in blank, or to the order of Nicholson, a very different question would have been presented. There the legal effect of such indorsements to pass title to bona fide holders for value, according to the settled rules of commercial law, and the rights of innocent third parties, if any had intervened, would be properly considered, as was done in Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, and in many other cases since. "The views of the Supreme Court of the United States," says Mr. Daniel, 1 Neg. Inst., § 840, "seem to embody the true logic of the question." The bank transmitting the paper indorsed in blank is ostensibly the owner. It has agreed by implied contract arising from usage that the avails shall be applied to balances against it. With this understanding its correspondent undertakes the collection and applies the avails. And then when the contract has been executed it would seem to be in contravention of the universally recognized principle which controls the negotiation of commercial paper to permit a third party who had declared by his indorsement that he had parted with his title to come in and assert it. The same view is expressed by us in Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, and constitutes what Putnam, J., in Beal v. Somerville, calls the doctrine of "reputed ownership," which he says is recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, supra. If, therefore the depositor does not intend to pass title he should not use the forms of indorsement which are universally used for that purpose, but should adopt some other form, such as "for collection," which we held in Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, supra, does not, without more, pass title, or "for deposit to credit of," which we think, as used in this case, is equally restrictive. Of course if the depositor is awarded even the gratuitous privilege of drawing in anticipation of collection, and he should avail himself of that privilege, then without regard to the form of his indorsement, he should not be allowed to claim the proceeds of any deposited check. With the proceeds in his pocket he would be estopped. But, as we have seen, that is not this case. It has been suggested it was against public policy and contrary to the interests of commerce to hold this indorsement to be restrictive. But we do not think so. On the contrary, in our opinion, it would be for the best interests of the public, the banks and commerce, if all indorsements except those which are in full or in blank should be declared restrictive. And such was the opinion of Lord Tenterden in the case of Sigourney v. Lloyd, 8 Barn. & C. 622.

In the case just cited, the indorsement was "Pay to Williams, or order, for my use." "I cannot see," says Lord Tenterden, "that the interests of commerce will be prejudiced by our holding that such an indorsement is restrictive. On the contrary, I think the interests of commerce will be thereby advanced."

venience can possibly arise to the commercial interests of the country by limiting the operation of an indorsement so expressed. The only effect will be to make persons more cautious in transactions of this nature in the future. Unless the words 'for my use' have no meaning, it is obvious, upon looking at the indorsement, that inquiry was necessary to have been made, and if a meaning can be found for these words, the court must apply them so as to meet the object and intention of the indorser." Lloyd v. Sigourney, 8 Moore & P. 229. The commercial world is well acquainted with the forms of indorsement universally used to transfer paper, and when these forms are not used, the owner of the paper ought not to be deprived of his interest therein by any course of reasoning, however ingenious it may be.

Our conclusion is, that the legal effect of this indorsement was to give notice to the Western Bank that J. S. Ditch & Brother were the owners of the check, and that the Nicholsons were only agents to collect the proceeds of the same and deposit them to the credit of J. S. Ditch & Brother.

EXCHANGE BANK OF WHEELING,
Appt.,
v.
SUTTON BANK.

(.....Md.....)

1. The completion of a transfer of credit to the payee of a check indorsed "for collection and credit" by the assignee for creditors of an insolvent bank which just before assignment had charged the check to the maker but had not given credit to the payee will not constitute a payment of the demand for which the check was given.

2. An instrument must be treated as a check which is headed by the name of a bank and a date and over the signature of the cashier directs the payment to the order of a third person of a certain amount of cash while at the bottom of the paper it is directed to a banking firm.

3. Failure of the bank on which a check is drawn and with which it is deposited "for collection and credit" to notify the drawer of its neglect to transfer the credit will discharge him from further liability in case he is injured thereby.

4. The fact that when a bank received a check upon itself "for collection and credit" to another account it was hopelessly insolvent and the same day placed its assets in the hands of trustees for creditors shows that its failure to notify the drawer of its neglect to transfer the credit worked no injury to him which would discharge him from liability for the debt for which the check was given.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of a Superior Court of Baltimore City in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff for certain collections and for which a draft had been sent to plaintiff, the collection of which failed because of the insolvency of the drawee. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller & Bonsal, for appellant:

If the bank is on the point of failure the such an order by a bank on another bank in another state was held, on interpleader between the holder and the assignee for creditors of the drawer, under an assignment made after the draft was drawn but before it was presented, to constitute an equitable assignment of the fund. In this case, however, there is no discussion of the question whether the instrument is to be regarded as a check or as a draft.

NOTE.—The nature of drafts by one bank on another.

When a bank draft is made payable at some particular time, or includes some other particular provision which cannot be included in a check, as illustrated by Harrison v. Nicolle Nat. Bank (Minn.) 5 L. R. A. 748, it is unquestionably to be regarded as a bill of exchange; but when one bank makes an absolute order on another to pay a specified sum to the payee, including no provision which would prevent the instrument from being considered a check, if drawn on the bank by an ordinary depositor, the question whether it is to be considered a check or a bill of exchange is one of much importance. Considering the very different rules which apply to checks and ordinary bills of exchange in respect to presentment, notice, and protest, as well as in other particulars, and considering the almost innumerable drafts made every year by banks on each other, it is astonishing that the question whether they are bills of exchange or checks has been considered in so small a number of cases, and that the question seems to be almost absolutely untouched in legal text books and treatises.

In Roberts v. Corbin, 26 Iowa, 315, 96 Am. Dec. 146, such drafts by one bank on another bank in another state were involved, and the court says that counsel agreed that they should be regarded merely as bankers' checks and not foreign bills of exchange. The question decided was that an assignment for creditors by the bank which drew them, made after they were issued but before they were presented, would not defeat the right of the holder to the money as against the assignee for creditors.

such an order by a bank on another bank in another state was held, on interpleader between the holder and the assignee for creditors of the drawer, under an assignment made after the draft was drawn but before it was presented, to constitute an equitable assignment of the fund. In this case, however, there is no discussion of the question whether the instrument is to be regarded as a check or as a draft.

In harmony also with the above cases is that of First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Coates, 3 McCrary, 9, in which Mr. Justice Miller in an oral opinion held that a draft by one bank on another in another state, which is a mere order to pay absolutely, is a check, and that as against an assignee for creditors of the drawer the check constitutes an equitable assignment of the fund, although notice of the assignment for creditors, which was made after the draft was drawn, was given to the drawee before the draft was presented.

Directly to the contrary of this are other decisions growing out of the same bank failure that was involved in the above case.

Thus in Rosenthal v. Mastin Bank, 17 Blatchf. 318, and Dickinson v. Coates, 79 Mo. 250, 49 Am. Rep. 228, such drafts or checks on banks in other states are denied effect as against a subsequent assignment for creditors by the drawer, of which notice to the drawee is given before the presentment of the drafts. These cases do not, however, discuss the question of the difference between checks and bills of exchange. The draft is spoken of in Dickinson v. Coates as a check, and in Rosenthal v. Mastin Bank it is called a "draft or check," and it is the law of checks which is chiefly discussed.

The case of Dickinson v. Coates, supra, was one of credit which the drawer of the check has at the bank is worthless.

Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, ante, 161, 77 Md. 412.

And even suppose the defendant's credit had been transferred to the plaintiff on the books of J. J. Nicholson & Sons before the failure, how could the defendant make valid payment by a transfer of such credit?

Upon broad principles of justice it would seem that a man should not be allowed to pay a debt with worthless paper, though both parties supposed it to be good.

Thomas v. Westchester County Suprs. 4 L. R. A. 477, 115 N. Y. 47.

When the deed of trust was executed the right of Nicholson as a going concern to constitute itself a debtor of the plaintiff at once ceased.

A check given for an antecedent debt is not an extinguishment of the debt, but only a means of payment. A check is not payment until paid.

If the check be not paid and the payee is not negligent, his right of action against the drawer for the debt, which has been merely suspended by the giving of the check, revives, and he may have recourse to the drawer either upon the debt or upon the check, at his option.

a suit against an assignee for creditors, to whom the funds had been turned over by the bank in another state, while in Rosenthal v. Mastin Bank, supra, the suit was in a federal court against the drawer and the drawer's assignee for creditors, as well as the drawee.

In Grammel v. Carner, 55 Mich. 201, 54 Am. Rep. 363, the court in respect to such bank drafts says it is "not the case of a check, but of bills of exchange," but held that whether or not a check would constitute an equitable assignment without such a draft, in case of the drawer's subsequent insolvency and assignment for creditors before its presentment, such a draft by one bank on another would not give the holder, as against a receiver of the drawer, a right to the funds, except pro rata with other creditors.

In Harrison v. Wright, 100 Ind. 515, 58 Am. Rep. 806, such drafts by a bank on banks in other states were held to be merely checks, and not to constitute an equitable assignment of funds which would be effectual on the subsequent suspension of the drawer bank made before presentment of the drafts, and it was therefore held that a receiver of the drawer should not pay such drafts from the assets of the bank except pro rata with other debts due to general creditors. Among the holders of these drafts or checks were some who had paid for them by checks on their deposits in the bank, and others who bought the drafts of the bank by paying cash for them, but all were alike held to be entitled merely to their pro rata share of the assets in the receiver's hands.

The instrument was a check, and therefore the defendant drawer was not discharged by the failure to protest, not having been injured by such failure.

Notice of non-acceptance of a bill of ex-other bank in another state to "pay this our first check (second unpaid) to the order of," etc., was held to be merely a check, and not a foreign bill of exchange requiring acceptance notwithstanding the reference to the duplicate order.

That an absolute order drawn by one bank on another in another state is merely a check, so that delay in presenting it will release the liability of an indorser only when the delay causes him injury, is decided in Bull v. First Nat. Bank of Kasson, 123 U. S. 105, 81 L. ed. 97; Planter's Bank v. Merritt, 7 Helsk. 177; Planter's Bank v. Keesee, Id. 200.

But such a draft is a "bill of exchange" within the meaning of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1875, respecting the jurisdiction of federal courts in actions on bills of exchange. Bull v. First Nat. Bank of Kasson, supra.

That a bank draft on another bank is a check is also decided in State v. Vincent, 91 Mo. 662, deciding that such a draft is properly described as a "check" in an indictment for forging a check. The court says: "It is none the less a check because drawn by a bank."

These are all the cases in which we have found the question touched upon whether or not a bank draft on another bank in the form of check is to be considered a check. Probably there are other cases in which such drafts have been involved, but it would seem that if so the courts have not had this question raised in respect to them. As the decisions stand, they may be regarded as substantially settling the matter in favor of the doctrine that a draft or order on a bank in the form of a check is not the less a check because it is drawn by a bank.

Mr. Frank Woods, for appellee:

The case under discussion turns in favor of appellee upon the important exception to the general rule that, if the creditor parts with the bill received as conditional payment, or is guilty of laches, to the prejudice of the debtor, in not presenting it for acceptance or payment in due time, or in failing to give the debtor due notice of its dishonor, the debtor is discharged.

Glenn v. Smith, 2 Gill & J. 493, 20 Am. Dec. 452; Lewis v. Brehme, 33 Md. 430, 3 Am. Rep. 190.

The drawer of the draft in question had ample funds in the hands of its drawee and a reasonable expectation that its draft would be honored when presented for payment. Such a drawer is everywhere entitled to all the defenses afforded by commercial law to the indorser of negotiable paper.

Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 810; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1050, 1276; Orear v. McDonald, 9 Gill, 350, 52 Am. Dec. 709; Schuchardt v. Hall, 36 Md. 602, 11 Am. Rep. 514; Brant v. Mickle, 28 Md. 437.

Due presentment and notice of dishonor are necessary in order to charge the appellee.

Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 334; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 970, 971, 1076; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 452; 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1201.

Neither the fact that the draft in question was drawn as a conditional payment of a pre-existent debt, nor the fact that on the day it was received by mail by the drawees they were insolvent, affords any valid excuse for appellant's failure to make a legal demand on the drawees for payment, and to protest the draft and give appellee due notice of its dishonor, if it was dishonored.

3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1329; 3 Kent, Com. 110; Wood's Byles, Bills & Notes, *206; Story, Bills of Exchange, §§ 326, 347; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1171, 1172; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 366; Orear v. McDonald, 9 Gill, 351, 52 Am. Dec. 703.

The only evidence of presentment for payment is that the draft was by mail forwarded to the drawees by appellant, and that it was received by the drawees and charged on their books to the debit of appellee's account. To say nothing of the manifest tendency of this evidence to prove that the draft was duly honored and paid, it is not sufficient, upon the supposition that the draft was dishonored, to prove such presentment for payment as the law requires, in order to charge appellee as its drawer.

Halls v. Howell, 1 Harp. L. 426; Gillespie v. Hannahan, 4 McCord, L. 504.

A presentment or demand of payment must be made personally upon the acceptor, at his place of business, or at his dwelling house, when his residence is known, or may be ascertained by reasonable inquiry; and cannot be made by a written demand, sent to him through the postoffice.

Page, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit, upon a case stated for the opinion of the court with a request to render a judgment in accordance therewith.

The defendant below, being indebted to the plaintiff for certain collections made by the former, on account of the latter, on the 9th day of January, 1892, mailed to the plaintiff the following instrument of writing, viz.:

The Sutton Bank,

Sutton, W. Va., Jan. 9, 1892.

Pay to the order of J. J. Jones, Esq., cash $938.50 (nine hundred and thirty-six dollars and fifty cents).

T. M. Berry,
Cashier.

To J. J. Nicholson & Sons,
Baltimore, Md.

The plaintiff received it on the 18th following and on the same day forwarded it by mail to the Nicholsonsons (with whom both parties kept accounts) indorsed as follows: "For collection and credit account of Exchange Bank, Jan. 13th, 1892, of Wheeling, West Va., John J. Jones, Cashier." On the morning of the 14th the paper was received by the Nicholsonsons, and was stuck upon a file where were generally placed the various checks drawn upon the house in the ordinary course of business. The defendant then had on deposit to its credit with the banking house a sum in excess of $938.50. Later in the day, it was taken from the file and entered to the debit of the defendant's account, but was not then entered as a credit to the account of the plaintiff. On the morning of the 14th, Nicholson & Sons were hopelessly insolvent, and about 1 o'clock of that day made an assignment to the trustees, who, after they had taken possession, entered the check to the credit of the plaintiff; but at the time of the receipt, the Nicholsonsons did not have in their banking house the amount of the plaintiff's claim in actual cash. The paper is now lost, and it is not known whether it was protested or not; but if it was, no notice thereof, or of the non-payment was sent to, or received by, either the plaintiff or defendant. A demand was made by the plaintiff on the defendant for payment, on the 7th of June, 1893, and until that day the defendant had no knowledge that it had not been paid. This was the only demand ever made on the defendant by any one.

It is not contended that the treatment of the paper by the Nicholsons, or their trustees, was tantamount to a payment. There was no credit given to the payees for the amount; and, under the circumstances of the case, until this was done, there was no evidence that it had been accepted. Whether it be regarded as a bill of exchange or a check, it did not operate as an assignment, pro tanto, of the drawer's funds in the hands of the Nicholsons, until it was accepted. Moses v. Franklin Bank of Baltimore, 34 Md. 590.

So far as the plaintiff was concerned, there was no evidence that the Nicholsons had accepted the order upon them, and thereby agreed to become responsible to it for the amount. And, apart from this, at the time the paper was drawn, and when received by the Nicholsons, they were hopelessly insolvent; and, under such circumstances, a transfer of credit from the defendant to the plaintiff would have been a mere delusion.

After the assignment they ceased to be a going concern, and neither the firm nor their trustees had the right to make a transfer of credit which was wholly worthless. Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 2 L. R. A. 699. A check or bill is not a payment until paid—Morse on Banks and Banking, secs. 544, 546; Lewis v. Brehme, 33 Md. 412, 3 Am. Rep. 190; Patapasco Ins. Co. v. Smith, 6 Harr. & J. 166—or unless it is accepted as such, or the creditor parts with it, or is guilty of some laches by which injury inures to the drawer. Glenn v. Smith, 2 Gill & J. 509, 20 Am. Dec. 452.

In this case therefore, unless it can be shown that the plaintiff had been guilty of some negligence, whereby the defendant has been either actually or constructively injured, the paper having been lost, it was not improper to resort to the original cause of action. Myers v. Smith, 27 Md. 50.

What was the character of the paper offered in evidence? The appellee contends it is a bill of exchange. This court has stated in Moses v. Franklin Bank of Baltimore, 34 Md. 579, that "a check is denominated a species of inland bill of exchange, not with all the incidents of an ordinary bill of exchange, it is true, but still it belongs to that class and character of commercial paper." And in Bull v. First Nat. Bank of Kasson, 123 U. S. 105, 31 L. ed. 97, in which an instrument of writing exactly similar to the one in this case was declared by the court to be a check, Judge Field, speaking for the whole court, says: "When an instrument is drawn upon a bank, or a person engaged in banking business, and simply directs the payment to a party of a specified sum of money, which is at the time on deposit with the drawee, without designating a future day of payment, the instrument is to be treated as a check. The chief points of difference are, that a check is always drawn on a bank or banks. No days of grace are allowed. The drawer is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presenting it for payment, unless he can show that he has sustained some injury by the default. It is not due until payment is demanded, etc." Merchants Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank of Boston, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 647, 19 L. ed. 1019; Harker v. Anderson, 21 Wend. 375; Merchants Nat. Bank v. Ritzinger, 118 Ill. 484; Harrison v. Wright, 100 Ind. 515, 58 Am. Rep. 805; First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Coates, 3 McCrary, 9; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1566; Story, Prom. Notes, § 487; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 362.

We do not think what was said by this court in Hawthorn v. State, 56 Md. 534, is in conflict with the views here expressed. There, as well as in Moses v. Franklin Bank of Baltimore, supra, they hold that a check was a species of bill of exchange, not with all the incidents of an ordinary bill of exchange, but belonging to that class and character of commercial paper; or in other words, as was said by Cowen, J., in Harker v. Anderson, supra, the "bill is the genus and the check is the species;" and therefore Hawthorn was within the terms of the statute, which made it a felony to forge an indorsement on a bill of exchange. The instrument of writing in question in this case must therefore be treated as a check.

On receipt of the check, the plaintiff, with reasonable promptness, forwarded it to the Nicholsons, indorsed "For collection and credit account of Exchange Bank, Jan. 13, 1892, of Wheeling, W. Va.," Such an indorsement constituted them the agents of the plaintiff to collect and credit, and at the same time, as drawees of the check, they were also the agents of the drawers to pay. The plaintiff was therefore responsible for any omission of duty on the part of the Nicholsons in their capacity as collectors. As collecting agents of the plaintiff, it was their duty to do whatever was necessary in respect to demand and notice to the drawer, and for any negligence in regard to this, they would be liable to the plaintiff, and not to the defendant, for such damages as might be occasioned by reason of their neglect. Montgomery County Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y. 459. The evidence is clear that they did not transfer the credit for the amount of the note from the defendants to the plaintiff. If they had done this, other questions would have to be considered here, upon which we are not now called to decide and do not intimate our opinion; and the failure to make such transfer was equivalent to a refusal to accept and pay. Under such circumstances, it was their clear duty to give notice of the non-payment, to the drawer, in order that the drawee might take any necessary steps to protect its interest; and if they failed to do so, and loss ensued by reason of such want of notice, it falls on the plaintiff, and not upon the drawer. A failure, however, to notify the drawer of the non-payment of a check does not always discharge him from liability; it must also be shown that he has either actually or pre-sumptively suffered some loss or injury therefrom. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1587, and authorities cited. Bull v. First Nat. Bank of Kasson, supra. In the case of Norris v. Despard, 38 Md. 491, it is true this court said, "If the notice be not given, it is a presumption of law that he is injured by the omission," but they explain this remark by adding that "in the application of the principle, courts must inquire into the liabilities of the respective parties to the check for the purpose of ascertaining whether this injury, either actual or presumptive, could take place." And further on, in the same opinion, "it was but just that they should give the defendant notice of the non-payment in reasonable time before they brought their action, or to have shown that the defendant sustained no injury in consequence." Rhett v. Poe, 43 U. S. 2 How. 457, 11 L. ed. 338; Eichelberger v. Finley, 7 Harr. & J. 385, 16 Am. Dec. 812; Schuhardt v. Hall, 36 Md. 602, 11 Am. Rep. 514.

Here it is clear, that at the time the check reached the Nicholsons they were hopelessly insolvent, and did not have in their banking house the amount of the check in actual cash. Their assignment on the same day placed all their assets in the hands of trustees, and definitely fixed the status of any claim the defendant had, or could have upon them. Under these circumstances, we can perceive no way by which, on account of the want of notice, injury to the defendant either "actual or presumptive" could take place.

The judgment below must be reversed.

Judgment reversed and judgment for the appellant for the sum of $1,055.56 with interest from this date until paid and costs.

1. An insurance company cannot avoid a policy stipulated to be void if the interest of the insured be other than the unconditional and sole ownership of the property because such interest was not truly stated and the interest of the insured was not that of unconditional and sole ownership, where its agent knowingly and intentionally wrote down the answers differently from those made by the insured and the latter made true and full statements of his interest to such agent.
2. A simple contract creditor has an insurable interest in a building belonging to the estate of his deceased debtor which may be subjected to his debt because the personal property is insufficient to pay the debts of the estate.
3. Plaintiffs in a suit upon an insurance policy are shown to have an insurable interest by a plea showing that the building and lot insured belonged to the estate of a decedent and that neither of the assured are his legal heirs, and a replication averring that one of the plaintiffs was the widow of the decedent and that he owned no other real estate, followed by the conclusion that she owned a dower and homestead interest, and further averring that the other plaintiff was a creditor of the decedent, stating the amount of her claim, the insufficiency of personal assets to pay the debts, and that there was no other real property belonging to the estate, as such replication shows a remainder interest in the real estate liable for the debts.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in favor of defendant in an action brought to NOTE.—While the above decision is well within established principles of insurance law the application seems to be a new one.

recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The defendant pleaded that by the terms of said policy it was provided that the entire policy was to be void if the insured concealed or misrepresented any material fact concerning the insurance, or the subject thereof; and further averred that the insured had concealed a material fact concerning the subject of the insurance, in that the plaintiffs applied for and took out said insurance upon the house described in the complaint as their property, whereas in truth it was, at the time of the taking out of said policy, and at the time of said fire, the property of the estate of one T. W. Creed, who died intestate before the taking out of said insurance policy; and that the said T. W. Creed left surviving him brothers and sisters, heirs-at-law, and that neither of the plaintiffs was a sister of the deceased; and that the plaintiffs concealed from the defendant the fact that said house was the property of the said T. W. Creed, deceased; that in and by the terms of the policy sued on in this case it is expressly provided, among other things, that the entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, shall be void if the interest of the insured be other than the unconditional and sole ownership of the property insured; and defendant avers that the said insured took out the said policy upon the said house described in said complaint as their property, and that at the time the said insurance occurred, and at the time the said building was destroyed by fire, the said house was not the property of the said plaintiffs; and defendant further avers that the said policy contains no agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto that the plaintiffs might insure the said property although they were not the sole and unconditional owners of the said property; that in and by the terms of the policy sued on in said complaint it is expressly provided that the entire policy shall be void if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated therein, and defendant avers that the interest of the said insured is not truly stated in the said policy, that the said property is insured as the property of the said plaintiffs, whereas in truth and in fact the said property was not the property of the said plaintiffs; that the said Mattie Flinn had no interest in the said property; that the said house insured formerly belonged to one T. W. Creed, who had died intestate, leaving certain brothers and sisters as his heirs-at-law; that the only interest that the said plaintiff Katie Creed had in and to the said property was the interest which she as the widow of the said T. W. Creed might acquire therein, and the said Mattie Flinn had no interest therein; wherefore this defendant avers that the interest of the said plaintiffs, the insured, was not truly stated in the said policy, and that the same is void; that in and by the terms of said policy it is expressly provided that, unless it is provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, the said policy shall be void if the subject of the insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple; and defendant avers that the subject of insurance in this instance was a building on a certain lot of land near the city of Montgomery, Alabama; that the said lot of land was not at the time of taking out said policy, or at the time of said loss, nor at any time after the taking out of the said policy, owned by said plaintiffs in fee simple, but that, on the contrary, the said ground was owned by the heirs-at-law of one T. W. Creed, then lately deceased; and that plaintiffs were not the heirs-at-law of said T. W. Creed. And defendant further avers that no agreement was indorsed on the said policy, or added thereto, providing that the subject of insurance might be on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple; and that the defendant had no notice at the time of the issuance of said policy, nor at any time prior to the burning of said building, that the plaintiffs did not own the ground upon which the said building was situate. The plaintiffs filed the following replication: "That at the time of taking out the policy of insurance sued on in this cause, Katie Creed, one of the plaintiffs, was the widow of T. W. Creed, then lately deceased, who died seised in fee of the property insured, and that she is still such widow; that as such widow she had and has an interest by way of dower and homestead in the property covered by said insurance; that she had such interest at the time of the application for and the issuance of said policy by defendant; that at the time of the application for and the issuance of said policy, Mattie Flinn, the other plaintiff in this cause, was a large creditor of the estate of T. W. Creed in the amount of, to wit, about two thousand dollars, and that she was such creditor at the time of the burning of said house insured and described in the complaint in this cause, and such claim of said Mattie Flinn has been ever since the taking out of the policy of insurance sued on, and is now, a valid and subsisting demand against the estate of T. W. Creed, deceased; that there is not and was not at the time of the application for and the issuance of the policy sued on in this cause, enough personal property belonging to the estate of said T. W. Creed to pay the debts due and outstanding against said estate. And plaintiffs aver that they applied to one J. B. Trimble, who was at the time of said application the regularly constituted agent of defendant corporation, for said policy on said building; that said J. B. Trimble well knew at the time plaintiffs applied for said policy, and at the time of the issuance and delivery to them by him as such agent of defendant corporation, that the said property so insured was the property of the estate of T. W. Creed, deceased, and that he was at the time of the application for said policy informed of this fact by plaintiffs; that said Trimble, as agent of defendant, well knew at the time of the application for said policy and its issuance, and was then and there informed by plaintiffs, that their only interests in the property so insured was that plaintiff Mattie Flinn was a creditor, as above described, of the estate of T. W. Creed, and that plaintiff Katie Creed was the widow of said T. W. Creed, and as such had a dower and homestead interest in said property; that, so knowing, said J. B. Trimble himself drew up the application for said insurance, received the premium therefor, and turned the policy over to plaintiffs; and that plaintiffs never in any way misrepresented the title to said property to the defendant, or any of its agents, but that the defendant, with full knowledge as aforesaid, issued said policy to plaintiff." This replication was afterwards amended by averring that the property insured in said policy was the only real property of the estate of said T. W. Creed, deceased. To the replication as amended the defendant demurred on the following grounds: "(1) It is averred in the second plea, and not denied by the replication, that the policy sued on contains a clause and stipulation that it should be void, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon, if the interest of the insured should be other than the unconditional and sole ownership of the property insured; and it is shown by the allegations of said replication that the insured were not the unconditional and sole owners of such property, and it is not averred therein that there is any agreement indorsed on said policy that plaintiffs might insure such property although they were not such owners. (2) It is averred in the fourth plea, and not denied by said replication, that one of the terms of the policy sued on is that the same should be void if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated in the policy; and it is not shown by said replication that such interest was truly stated. (3) It is shown by said replication that the interest of the insured was not truly stated in the policy. (4) It is not denied that the policy sued on provides that it should be void if the buildings insured were not situate on ground owned by the insured in fee simple, and it is shown by the allegations of said replication they were not such owners. (5) It is shown by the allegations of said replication that plaintiffs had no insurable interest in the property covered by the policy sued on. (6) It is shown by the allegations of said replication that plaintiff Flinn had no insurable interest in the property covered by the policy sued on. (7) It is shown by the allegations of said replication that the contract sued upon was and is a wagering or gambling contract. (8) It is shown by the allegations of said replication that plaintiff Flinn had no interest in the property covered by the policy sued on, and that the alleged contract insuring the same was and is against public policy, and void. (9) It is not shown by the allegations of said replication that plaintiff Creed had any homestead right in the property covered by the policy sued on. (10) It is shown by the allegations that the property was not subject to the debt of Mattie Flinn."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. A. A. Wiley, for appellants:

If plaintiffs had an insurable interest in said property, the replication, when properly interpreted, "shows a waiver of the condition and constitutes a full answer to the plea."

Brown v. Commercial F. Ins. Co. 86 Ala. 194.

The agent, Trimble, knowing the character of the interest which each of the plaintiffs had in or to the property covered by the policy, "himself drew up the application for said insurance, received the premium therefor, and turned the policy over to plaintiffs," and the replication particularly avers that plaintiffs "never in any way misrepresented the title to said property to the defendant, or any of its agents, but that the defendant, with full knowledge, as aforesaid, issued said policy to plaintiffs."

In such case "the defendant will not be permitted to take advantage of the wrongful act, or misconstruction or mistake of its own agent and avoid the policy, the insured being without fault."

The term "interest" does not necessarily imply property. The contract of insurance being one of indemnity against losses and disadvantages, an insurable interest may be proved in the insured, without the evidence of any legal or equitable title to the property.

The objections that the plaintiffs have no insurable interest comes with bad grace from a company that has received premiums on a policy issued with knowledge of the very facts it objects to, now, as insufficient to create an insurable interest.

Currier v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 57 Vt. 496, 52 Am. Rep. 184.

Mattie Flinn had an insurable interest in the property. T. W. Creed was dead, and the personal property was insufficient to pay the debts outstanding against the estate. She was his largest creditor, and looked to the property covered by the insurance as her only means of payment, as her indemnity against loss.

Fenn v. New Orleans Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra. See also Ellicott v. United States Ins. Co. 8 Gill & J. 166.

Mrs. Katie Creed, as the widow of the decedent, being in possession of the property at the time the contract was made, and entitled to dower and homestead, had such an interest as was insurable.

Harris v. York Mut. Ins. Co. 50 Pa. 841, and cases cited above.

If she alone had an insurable interest, the policy was good as to her interest therein.

1 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 74.

A general creditor of the estate of one deceased, whose personal property left is insufficient for the payment of his debts, has an insurable interest in the sole real estate of the deceased debtor, when it is plain that if it is damaged by fire a pecuniary loss must ensue to the creditor thereby.

Rep. 451; 4 Ins. L. J. 787.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by appellants upon a policy of insurance issued for the benefit of plaintiffs, insuring a certain dwelling against loss or destruction by fire. The suit is in the joint name of Katie Creed and Mattie Flinn, the assured. The defendant pleaded several special pleas, upon some of which issue was joined, and to the others a replication was filed by plaintiffs. The court sustained a demurrer to the replication, and the plaintiffs declining to plead further, judgment was rendered for the defendant.

Several questions have been argued, but the rulings of the court upon the demurrers to the replications present the material questions involved on this appeal. The first is whether, when a policy of fire insurance contains a stipulation that the policy shall be void if the interest of the insured be other than "the unconditional and sole ownership of the property insured," and the plea avers a state of facts which, if true, shows that the interest of the insured was not truly stated in the policy, and that the interest of the insured was not that of "unconditional and sole ownership," a replication to such plea is good which avers that the policy was procured from an agent of the defendant, authorized to issue policies of fire insurance, to whom the insured, at the time the policy was applied for and received, truly and fully stated their interest in the property to the agent; and that the agent, being fully informed, himself drew up the application for the insurance, received the premium therefor, and, with full knowledge of the facts, turned the policy over to plaintiffs. We have held that if the applicant make full and true answers to the questions contained in the application, and suppresses no material fact which it is his duty to make known, the company will not be permitted to take advantage of the carelessness, inadvertence, or misunderstanding of its agent; the insured being without fault. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Garner, 77 Ala. 210; Williamsen v. New Orleans Ins. Assn. 84 Ala. 106; Pelican Ins. Co. of New Orleans v. Smith, 93 Ala. 428; Equitable F. Ins. Co. v. Alexander (Miss.) 12 So. Rep. 25.

Upon the same principle, and for stronger reasons, the company cannot avoid its obligation if its own agent knowingly and intentionally writes down the answers differently from those made by the insured. We think the replication a full answer to the plea on this question.

The next proposition involves a question new in this state. Has a creditor an insurable interest in a building, the property of the estate of his deceased debtor which may be subjected to his debt, the personal property being insufficient to pay the debts of the estate? After much deliberation, our conclusion is that he has an interest which may be insured. We concede and affirm that a simple contract creditor, without a lien either statutory or contract, without a ius in re or a ius in rem, owning a mere personal claim against his debtor, has not an insurable interest in the property of his debtor. Such contracts are void, as being against public policy. We do not think the principle applies after the death of the debtor, as to property liable for the debt, and which, if destroyed, will result in the loss of the debt. The real estate as well as personal property of a deceased debtor is liable for his debts, but the real estate cannot be subjected to the payment of his debts until after the personalty has been exhausted. After the death of the debtor the debt is no longer enforceable in personam. The proceedings to reach the property of the estate of the deceased debtor are in rem. The property of the debtor takes the place of the debtor, and becomes, as it were, the debtor. Whoever knowingly receives the property of a deceased debtor, and wrongfully converts it, is answerable to the creditor. 8 Brickell, Dig. p. 484, § 148; Id. p. 465, § 162. The relation of creditor and debtor invests the creditor with an insurable interest in the life of his debtor to the extent of his debt. Alexander v. Sanders, 93 Ala. 345; 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, § 319. It would seem upon like principles that, when the property becomes directly subject to proceedings in rem for the satisfaction of the debt, the creditor should become invested with an insurable interest in the property. Certainly, if a creditor cannot obtain satisfaction of his debt from the personal property of his deceased debtor, and has a legal right, which cannot be defeated, to enforce its collection by proceedings in rem against a building belonging to the estate of the deceased debtor, and if it be true that the destruction of the building by fire would immediately and necessarily result in pecuniary loss, the loss being the direct consequence of the fire, the creditor has an interest in the protection of the building. He has no lien as in the case of a mortgagee nor such lien as the statute may confer on an attaching or execution creditor; but his right to subject the specific property to his debt invests him with an interest but little less, if any, than that of the attaching or execution creditor or mortgagee. In the case of Herkimer v. Rice, 27 N. Y. 168, the question arose as to whether an administrator of an insolvent estate held an insurable interest in the real estate of the deceased debtor. The court (Denio, Ch. J., rendering the opinion) held that he did, and the conclusion was based in great part upon the proposition, that the creditors had such an interest which the administrator could protect by insurance for them. We think whatever could be done by an administrator for the creditor in this respect could be done directly by the creditor for himself. Rohrbach v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 62 N. Y. 47, 20 Am. Rep. 451. Other reasons might be given, but we are of opinion these are sufficient to show that the creditor of a deceased debtor, whose estate is insufficient to pay the debts, has an insurable interest in the property of the estate, which by law may be subjected by proceedings in rem to the payment of the debts. The recovery cannot exceed the amount of the insurable interest.

The next question is whether the pleadings show such an insurable interest. The pleas and the replication appear to have been drawn with technical caution, so far as the rights of Mattie Flinn, the creditor, are affected. The plea shows that the building and lot upon which it is located belonged to the estate of Thomas Creed, deceased, and that neither of the assured are his legal heirs. Upon the death of Thomas Creed the land descended to his legal heirs. Prima facie, upon the fact of the plea, the insured owned no insurable interest. The replication avers that Katie Creed was the widow of Thomas Creed, and that he owned no other real estate, and this statement of facts is followed with the conclusion that she owned a dower and homestead interest. Hers was clearly an insurable interest. Its value is a fact to be ascertained by proof. The replication then further averred that Mattie Flinn was a creditor of Thomas Creed, stating the amount of her claim, the insufficiency of personal assets to pay the debts, and that there was no other real property belonging to his estate. The interest shown by the plea to be in Katie Creed (dower and homestead) does not include the entire estate. Under the replication there is a remainder interest in the real estate liable for the debts of the estate. The pleadings inform us that the lot and building were in the city of Montgomery. Whether it exceeded in value $2,000, the constitutional limit of the value of the homestead exempt from debts during the lifetime of the widow, does not appear. We are not unmindful of the statutory provision by which, under some circumstances, the fee to the homestead may become vested in the widow and minor children or widow or minor child. The consideration of these questions does not arise upon the pleadings. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the replication.

Reversed and remanded.

v.

CAPITAL INSURANCE CO., Appt.

1. A waiver of proofs of loss under a policy upon a building, made by an adjuster sent by the same company to adjust a loss upon the contents of such building, under a policy held by a firm of which the holder of the former policy was a member, is binding upon the company, in the absence of notice to the insured of any limitation upon the authority of such adjuster.

2. In an action upon a policy of insurance, evidence as to a loss and adjustment under a policy held by a firm of which the plaintiff was a member, upon the contents of the building covered by the policy sued on is admissible to show the connection of the two losses and the relation of the parties to the suit in the two transactions, upon the question whether an adjuster who adjusted the loss of the firm had authority to waive proofs of loss under the policy in question.

3. Upon the trial of an action upon an insurance policy, instructions that authority from the defendant to a certain adjuster to adjust and settle the loss of a firm of which the plaintiff was a member, would not give him authority to bind the defendant as to the loss of the plaintiff under the policy in question, and that the fact that authority was given him to settle the firm loss is proper to be considered as a circumstance to show the relation existing between defendant and such adjuster, and that from that and from other facts and circumstances shown by the evidence, the jury must say whether such adjuster was authorized to adjust and settle plaintiff's loss or not, are not conflicting or erroneous as regards the defendant.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

An agent to adjust a particular loss cannot bind his principal by acting with reference to another loss.

Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 3 Colo. 422. Mr. L. L. DeLano for appellee.

Granger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was the owner of a livery barn at Atlantic, Iowa, on which the policy in suit issued, which is numbered 2,241. The policy issued to the plaintiff. The defendant also issued a policy on the contents

NOTE.—The above case is a somewhat novel application of the doctrine that one who holds another out as his agent with certain powers will be estopped to deny his authority when strangers have dealt with him in reliance upon such representations, which doctrine will be found in cases collected in notes to Wheeler v. McGuire (Ala.) 2 L. R. A. 308, and Hubbard v. Tenbrook (Pa.) 2 L. R. A. 323.

of the barn to Slater & Eller, the Slater of the firm being the same person as the plaintiff. The Western Home Insurance Company also issued separate policies on the same property to the same persons. Other companies also issued policies in the same way. On the 3d day of May, 1888, and while the policies were in force, the building and contents were destroyed by fire. The policy issued to Slater & Eller by defendant was numbered 2,239. Notice of loss was given to the company under the two policies. Under the policy in suit, No. 2,241, no proofs of loss were made, and the defense to the suit is based on that fact, so far as concerns this appeal. In avoidance of the failure to make such proofs the plaintiff pleaded a waiver by the defendant.

One E. F. Philbrook was the adjusting agent for the Western Home Insurance Company, and visited Slater & Eller for the purpose of adjusting the loss of that company. On his way he called at the office of the defendant company at Des Moines, and was by its secretary, H. E. Teachout, asked to act for the defendant company with reference to its loss; but there is some conflict as to the extent of his authority to so act. It is the claim of the plaintiff that, under his authority, he could legally bind the defendant as to adjustments under both policies, while it is that of the defendant that he was merely authorized to "adjust or take proofs of loss," under policy 2,239. At the close of plaintiff's direct testimony, and again at the close of the testimony in the case, the defendant moved the court to instruct for a verdict in its favor on the ground that there was no testimony from which the jury could properly find that Philbrook had authority to act for defendant with reference to the loss under the policy in suit. In each case the motion was overruled, of which rulings complaint is here made, and the consideration of the questions thus presented will largely dispose of the questions in the case. It will only be necessary to consider the ruling upon the second motion, because if, in the further progress of the trial, after ruling upon the first motion, the state of the evidence was so changed that such a motion was properly overruled, the first ruling, even if erroneous, was without prejudice.

1. Under the authority granted to Philbrook by defendant's secretary, he so acted that the loss of Slater & Eller was adjusted and paid. His own report to the defendant shows that he not only took proofs of loss, but that he also exercised the authority of adjusting values by agreement, and the company acted upon his report. This fact, with the statement in argument by appellant that he was authorized to "adjust or take proofs of loss," warrants the conclusion with us that he was before Slater & Eller as the company's authorized adjuster. With this relationship fixed, we can more easily apply the evidence as to Philbrook's authority to bind defendant as to the loss under the policy in suit. It will be remembered that other companies than the defendant and the Western Home Company, for which Philbrook acted under the Slater & Eller loss, carried risks on the livery barn; and these other companies and Slater, at the time of this adjustment by Philbrook of the Slater & Eller loss, had agreed upon terms of arbitration, and there were at that time no adjustments under the policy in suit. The facts upon which plaintiff relies to support his plea of waiver are that at the time of the adjustment of the Slater & Eller loss he and Philbrook agreed that no proofs of loss under the policy in suit need be made, and that the claim should abide the result of the arbitration with the other companies, the defendant to pay its proportion of the loss as thus ascertained; and that, relying upon such agreement, no proofs of loss were made; and this suit is for the proportion as fixed by the arbitration. The evidence is conflicting, but the state of it is such that the jury could, as it must, have found that such an agreement was made, and with its finding we should not interfere if, in making such agreement, he could legally bind the defendant. What, then, as between plaintiff and defendant, is the legal effect of the authority granted to Philbrook? The company had sent him to Slater & Eller as their adjuster. Neither the company nor Philbrook intimated that his authority as an adjuster was limited, but, on the contrary, he in the one case authoritatively exercised the usual powers of such an agent. The company had said to both Slater and Eller: "This is my authorized agent. Deal with him as such." In view of the finding of the jury, we may say that Philbrook assumed the same authority for adjustment under one policy as under another. The rule of appellant's contention would require us to hold that Slater, after dealing with him as an authorized adjuster with him and Eller in regard to the loss on the contents of the barn on one policy, could not recognize him as an adjuster on a loss on another policy from the same company to him resulting from the same fire. We think that such a rule should not obtain. Looking to the manner in which the insurance business of the country is transacted, through agents, distant from the home offices of the companies, by which patrons neither see nor know any other than the soliciting agent, who, upon a written application, either issues or procures and delivers the policy, and, after loss, the adjuster, through whom the business of adjustment is carried on, and the consequences of the rule contended for will be apparent. The rules of law are designed to be in harmony with the natural and reasonable conduct of parties in their business intercourse, and with the changed condition in the business intercourse of the country from time to time must come such changes in the laws governing legal rights as will maintain such harmony. Philbrook had been sent to Slater as an adjuster. It is the law that Slater must, at his peril, know of Philbrook's authority to act as such; but with his knowledge that he was an adjuster came the legal right to assume that his power was commensurate with the duties of adjustment between the persons to whom he was sent and the company as to all matters that should reasonably be considered as intended by the company. We think that, after the adjustment of the Slater & Eller loss by Philbrook, no reasonable person would have doubted his pretended authority to adjust the loss on the barn, particularly in view of the close identity of the losses as to parties and circumstances. It was the act of the company that gave rise to this reasonable belief on the part of Slater by sending Philbrook as adjuster. If an insurance company does not wish to be bound up by so broad a presumption as to the authority of an adjuster, a reasonable and very just rule, as applied to the present method of insurance business, would require that it should impart to the assured the limitations upon his authority, by which means the parties could act upon an equality,—a condition absolutely forbidden by the rule contended for.

The general importance of the rule we are considering will justify a somewhat extended quotation from Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. of Maine v. Wilkinson, in 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 223, 20 L. ed. 617, where the United States Supreme Court has adopted reasoning somewhat similar to ours with like conclusions. We quote therefrom as follows: "It is well known," said the court "(so well that no court would be justified in shutting its eyes to it), that insurance companies organized under the law of one state, and having in that state their principal business office, send these agents all over the land, with directions to solicit and procure applications for policies, furnishing them with printed arguments in favor of the value and necessity of life insurance, and of the special advantages of the corporation which the agents represent. They pay these agents large commissions on the premiums thus obtained, and the policies are delivered at their hand to the assured. The agents are stimulated by letters and instructions to activity in procuring contracts, and the party who is in this manner induced to take out a policy rarely sees or knows anything about the company or its officers by whom it is issued, but looks to and relies upon the agent who has persuaded him to effect insurance as the full and complete representative of the company in all that is said or done in making the contract. Has he no right to so regard him? It is quite true that the reports of judicial decisions are filled with the efforts of these companies, by their counsel, to establish the doctrine that they can do all this, and yet limit their responsibility for the acts of these agents to the simple receipt of the premium and delivery of the policy; the argument being that, as to all other acts of the agent, he is the agent of the assured. The proposition is not without a support in some of the earlier decisions on the subject; and at a time when insurance companies waited for parties to come to them to seek assurance, or to forward applications on their own motion, the doctrine had a reasonable foundation to rest upon. But to apply such a doctrine, in its full force, to a system of selling policies through agents, which we have described, would be a snare and a delusion, leading, as it has done in numerous instances, to the grossest frauds, of which the insurance corporations receive the benefits, and the parties supposing themselves insured are the victims. The tendency of the modern decisions in this country is steadily in the opposite direction. The powers of the agent are prima facie coextensive with the business intrusted to his care, and will not be narrowed by limitations not communicated to the person with whom he deals. An insurance company establishing a local agency must be held responsible to the parties with whom they transact business for the acts and declarations of the agent within the scope of his employment as if they proceeded from the principal." The arguments in that case apply with strong, if not with equal, force to the business of fire insurance, and to the duties and authority of agents acting for companies after losses occur. In view of the business zeal and competition of the times, with insurance companies we may say "no stone is left unturned" to secure applications, and to this end agents wait upon desired customers in field and shop and home, to urge their superior claims for patronage. After a loss occurs, agents are promptly on the ground for investigation, conference, and adjustment. Under the business education of the times they are factors by and through which patrons may know and deal with the companies. The agent is the representative of the company. Now, it is certainly a reasonable rule that when an agent approaches a patron who has met with a loss, he may know to what extent he can safely act or deal with him as such agent. The company has that knowledge. If they are to do business upon equal terms, the patron should also have it. It is hardly to be expected that the business of adjustment must await a correspondence between the assured and the company to know the fact. But two other methods are open: First, that the company shall give notice of the authority possessed by its agent; or, second, that the assured may lawfully assume that the agent has authority to transact the business in hand as if possessing general powers for that purpose. Such a rule has full support in Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. of Maine v. Wilkinson, supra, and also in considerations of both public and private good. See, also, as bearing on this question, Silverberg v. Phenix Ins. Co., 67 Cal. 36, and to some extent, American Ins. Co. v. Gallatin, 48 Wis. 36.

There are very many cases in which other, but somewhat kindred, subjects are discussed, wherein, from the reasoning, this position receives support. Of those, see Morrison v. Insurance Co. of North America, 69 Tex. 353; Cleaver v. Traders Ins. Co. 71 Mich. 414; Schlomer v. Hekla F. Ins. Co. 50 Wis. 575; Alexander v. Continental Ins. Co. of New York, 67 Wis. 422, and cases therein cited.

It should be stated that the state of Wisconsin has a general statute on the subject, which controls the decisions of that state to some extent. We think the facts of this case justify the application of such a rule, and that the company is responsible for failure to make the proofs of loss. The evidence and admissions were such that, under the law as we have expressed it, it was not error to refuse the motion to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

2. There is a complaint that the court admitted evidence as to the Slater & Eller loss and adjustment, and it will be seen that we think such testimony was proper, as showing the connection of the two losses, and the relation of the parties to this suit in the two transactions. The court told the jury that "authority from the defendant to Philbrook to adjust and settle the Slater & Eller loss would not give authority to bind the defendant as to the loss of the plaintiff under the policy in question," and of this appellant does not complain; but the court further says: "Still the fact that authority was given him to settle the Slater & Eller loss is proper to be considered by you as a circumstance to show the relations existing at the time between defendant and said Philbrook, and from these and every other fact and circumstance shown by the evidence you must say whether said Philbrook was authorized to adjust and settle plaintiff's loss or not." We see no error in the instruction. The two statements are not in conflict. The first deals with the legal effect, only, of a particular fact, and the latter permits its use with other facts to reach a conclusion. It may be said that the theory on which the court submitted the case differs from the rule announced by us in this: that it required the jury to find as a fact that Teachout authorized Philbrook to act for the company in adjusting the Slater loss, without stating the presumption arising from the fact of his being sent to Slater as the company's adjuster. But appellant cannot complain of the neglect to state a presumption of law against it. We think the effect of the instructions, taken together, was to permit the jury to assume from the manner in which Philbrook was sent, in view of the entire surroundings, the authority to act in the Slater case. While the court did not, in terms, state the rule as to presumptions, it was inferable from the instructions given.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Lillie A. KEEPERS, Pff. in Err.,
v.
FIDELITY TITLE & DEPOSIT CO.
(Two Cases.)
(.....N. J.....)

- *1. The plaintiff's sister, on her death-bed, delivered to the plaintiff the key of a box, saying: "I give you the box and all it contains." The box was in another room of the house, looked in a closet, the key of which was in possession of the plaintiff's mother, with whom the sister lived. The plaintiff lived elsewhere, and during her sister's life, made no attempt to take possession of the box. Held, that there was no such delivery of securities contained in the box as is essential to a valid donatio mortis causa.
2. A will directed that testator's property be divided equally between his daughters, each to come into possession of her share on arriving at the age of twenty-three years, and that, in case of the death of either before arriving at that age, her children should inherit the parent's share, but, if no issue, then the survivor of the daughters should take the other's share. Held, that the will gave the survivor no right to the share of her sister, dying after she had reached the age of twenty-three years.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Essex County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in actions brought to recover the amount of a savings bank deposit and certain securities and certificates of stock. Affirmed.

Statement by DIXON, J.:

The plaintiff, Lillie A. Keepers, brought two suits in the supreme court against the Fidelity Title & Deposit Company,—one, an action on contract, to recover $418.22, the balance of $970 which had been deposited in the Howard Savings Institution by and in the name of Minnie I. Munn; and the other, an action of replevin, to obtain possession of stock certificate No. 2,459, for forty-one shares of the capital stock of the American Insurance Company, a bond made by the plaintiff to Minnie I. Munn for $1,000, and a bond made by John Bernreuther to James T. Van Ness for $400, which had been assigned to Minnie I. Munn. On the trial of these suits, in the Essex circuit, it appeared that all the things in controversy had belonged to the plaintiff's sister, Minnie I. Munn; and the plaintiff testified that her sister, while upon her death-bed, at home, a few hours before she lapsed into final unconsciousness, sent for the plaintiff, who lived elsewhere, and, on the plaintiff's coming into the room, the following incident took place: "My sister turned to my mother, and said 'to get those things for her.' My mother asked, 'What things?' and she replied, 'My things in the bureau.' My mother then brought to her from the bureau drawer a handkerchief, containing some things, and then she asked my mother to leave the room, which she did. My sister then opened the handkerchief, and it contained some jewelry and a little bag. From the bag she took a tiny key, and said to me, 'You see that key.' I said, 'Yes;' and she handed it to me, and said: 'There, that key I have carried in my bosom until it is rusty. It is the key of the box, and that I give to you, and all it contains.' Then she took the handkerchief, with the jewelry in it, and held the four corners of it up, and passed it over to me, saying: "There, I give you these. I have no more use for them." It further appears that, at that time, the box which this key fitted was in another room of the same house, locked in a closet of which Miss Munn's mother had the key, and that the box contained the savings bank book showing Miss Munn's deposit in the Howard Savings Institution, the stock certificate, and the two bonds, besides many other papers, some of which did not belong to Miss Munn. During Miss Munn's life the plaintiff did not ask her mother for the key of the closet, or make any attempt to assume control over or take possession of the box or its contents, nor did the box and contents ever come into her possession, but they were taken by the defendant company, as the administrator of Miss Munn. On these facts the trial justice ruled that there was not such a delivery of the things in controversy as was necessary to make a valid donatio mortis causa. The plaintiff also claimed that the stock of the American Insurance Company and the Bernreuther bond had been the property of her father, and, on the death of her sister, had become hers, by force of the following provision in her father's will: "Item 5. Subject to the foregoing uses and exceptions, I give, devise, and bequeath all my estate . . . to my two daughters, Lillie Alma and Minnie Ida, to be divided between them equally, share and share alike, each one to come into possession of her respective share upon arriving at the age of twenty-three years, and not before; and, in case of the decease of said Lillie or Minnie before they are twenty-three years of age, the children of said deceased shall inherit the parent's share; but, if there be no issue, then the survivor of the two last mentioned sisters shall take the other's share, and upon each respectively arriving at the age of twenty-one years, the interest of her share shall be paid to her direct." Both sisters had passed the age of twenty-three years, and, in the division of their father's estate, the stock and bond had been transferred to Minnie, as part of her share. She died unmarried. The trial justice overruled this claim of the plaintiff. Upon exception taken to these decisions, the present assignments of error are founded.

Choses in action belonging to the donor, though unindorsed, or unassigned save by delivery, are the subjects of a donatio mortis causa.

The practical question therefore is, What is 23 L. R. A.

a sufficient delivery? It may be actual—a manual possession of the article itself by the donee or his agent—or constructive. If constructive, it must be more than mere words, and more than any symbolic act. A constructive delivery must be something which completely terminates the donor's custody and control of the article donated, and which places it wholly under the donee's power, and enables him without further act on the donor's part to reduce it to his own manual possession.

Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1149; Cook v. Lum (N. J.) June 8, 1893.

A delivery of a key to a box, chest, or room, is a sufficient constructive delivery of the articles contained in the receptacle, on the principle that the donor thereby parts with all control, and places in the donee's hands the means of reducing the articles into his manual possession.

Some text-writers have endeavored to distinguish between the case of bulky articles, incapable of manual tradition, and of a trunk or chest, holding that a key in the one case sufficed but not in the other, and invariably they quote as authorities—

Powell v. Hellicar, 26 Beav. 261; Warriner v. Rogers, L. R. 16 Eq. Cas. 346.

But in both of these the key, instead of being delivered, was expressly and purposely retained by the donor, and on that precise ground the attempted gifts were not sustained.

Mr. Joyce for defendant in error.

Messrs. Riker & Riker for estate of Minnie I. Munn.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question for solution is whether the delivery of the key of a box containing valuable papers is sufficient delivery to constitute a valid donatio mortis causa of the papers, when the box is not in the presence or immediate control of the donor, and does not pass into the actual possession of the donee during the lifetime of the donor. The leading case on the subject of donations mortis causa is Ward v. Turner (A. D. 1752), 2 Ves. Sr. 481, where Lord Chancellor Hardwicke laid down the rule with reference to delivery, which has ever since formed the basis whereon such gifts are supported. After showing that the recognition of donations mortis causa by the common law was derived from the civil law, he declared that the civil law had been "received in England, in respect of such donations, only so far as attended with delivery, or what the civil law calls 'tradition;' that "tradition or delivery is necessary to make a good donatio mortis causa." He further said: "It is argued that, though some delivery is necessary, yet delivery of the thing is not necessary, but delivery of anything by way of a symbol is sufficient. But I cannot agree to that; nor do I find any authority for that in the civil law, which required delivery in some gifts, or in the law of England, which required delivery throughout. Where the civil law requires it, it requires actual tradition,—delivery over of the thing. So, in all the cases in this court, delivery of the thing given is relied on, and not in the name of the thing. Yet," he added, "notwithstanding, delivery of the key of bulky goods, where wines, etc., are, has been allowed as delivery of the possession, because it is the way of coming at the possession, or to make use of the thing." Although this doctrine has received general approval in the courts of England and of this country, yet some divergence has taken place respecting the facts which may constitute the delivery required. For the purpose of giving effect to the difference mentioned by Lord Hardwicke between articles that were bulky and those that were not, it was usually stated in the earlier cases that the delivery must be according to the nature of the thing given such as the thing was reasonably capable of, while in later cases, as if ignoring the ground of the distinction, it has often been asserted that the situation, as well as the nature, of the thing, must be taken into consideration, and only such delivery was requisite as, under all the circumstances, the donor could conveniently make. On this footing, it has, in some instances, been adjudged that delivery of the key was sufficient delivery for a valid donatio mortis causa of money or documents locked in a trunk or other receptacle, not within the presence or immediate control of the donor, and not otherwise transferred to the possession of the donee. Cooper v. Burr, 45 Barb. 9; Marsh v. Fuller, 18 N. H. 860; Jones v. Brown, 34 N. H. 439; Thomas v. Lewis, 89 Va. 1, 18 L. R. A. 170; Phipard v. Phipard, 55 Hun, 439; Pink v. Church, 88 N. Y. S. R. 735. That in this respect these cases depart from the view intended to be expressed in the leading case is, I think, manifest by noticing Lord Hardwicke's comment on Jones v. Selby. Finch, Prec. in Ch. 300, and his ruling in Smith v. Smith, 2 Strange, 955. In Jones v. Selby the donor had called his cousin, who was his housekeeper, and two of his servants, and said, "I give to my cousin, Mrs. Wetherley, this hair trunk, and all that is contained in it," and delivered her the key thereof; and, on the strength of this, Mrs. Weherley claimed a £500 tally as part of the contents of the trunk. This claim was allowed by the master of the rolls as a valid donatio mortis causa, and would have been allowed by Lord Chancellor Cowper, on appeal, except for lack of full proof that the tally was in the trunk at the time, and his conclusion that the gift was satisfied by a legacy to the donee given in a will subsequently made by the donor. On this Lord

Hardwicke's comment was: "The only case wherein such a symbol seems to have been held good is Jones v. Selby, but I am of opinion that amounted to the same thing as delivery of the possession of the tally, provided it was in the trunk at the time." He thus seems to state that, with regard to the tally, the key was but a symbol, the delivery of which he had just declared to be insufficient, but that the circumstances showed a delivery of the trunk, and consequently of the tally, if in the trunk. Smith v. Smith, 2 Strange, 955, was a ruling at nisi prius, where the plaintiff's intestate, having lodgings in the defendant's house, had brought there furniture and plate, and had said that whatever he brought into those lodgings he did not intend to take away, but gave directly to defendant's wife. Whenever he went out of town, he used to leave the key of his lodgings with the defendant. He having died, probably out of town (see Bunn v. Markham, 7 Taunt. 224), Lord Hardwicke, then chief justice, permitted the jury to find a valid gift. This ruling accords with the view expressed in the leading case upon the idea that the things given were too bulky for actual delivery, otherwise than by leaving them in the defendant's house, and giving him the key of the rooms. The same distinction is clearly noted in Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 324, 96 Am. Dec. 464, and other cases.

The opinion that delivery of a key is equivalent to the delivery of documents locked up under the key is not at all supported by the views announced in such cases as Hawkins v. Blewitt, 2 Esp. 663; Bunn v. Markham, 7 Taunt. 224, and Warriner v. Rogers, L. R. 16 Eq. Cas. 340, where the retention of the key by the donor was deemed to negative the claim of a gift; for, to constitute a gift, there must be, besides delivery of the thing, an intention to transfer to the donee complete dominion over it, and the withholding of the key proved that no such intention existed, notwithstanding the fact of delivery. Nor is that opinion, in its general form, fully sustained by cases like Debnson v. Emmons, 158 Mass. 592, where the receptacle was in the immediate presence and control of the parties, in a room occupied by the donee, as well as the donor, and where the only external sign of the exclusive possession of the receptacle was the actual possession of the key. Under such circumstances, tradition of the key might be considered tantamount to tradition of the receptacle and its contents, without giving the same force to the tradition of the key when the receptacle was away from the presence of the parties, and in the actual possession of a third person. We are not willing to approve the extreme views which have been adopted in the cases cited. We agree with the sentiment expressed in Ridden v. Thrall, 125 N. Y. 572, 11 L. R. A. 684, that "public policy requires that the laws regulating gifts causa mortis should not be extended, and that the range of such gifts should not be enlarged." When it is remembered that these gifts come into question only after death has closed the lips of the donor; that there is no legal limit to the amount which may be disposed of by means of them; that millions of dollars' worth of property is locked up in vaults, the keys of which are carried in the owners' pockets; and that, under the rule applied in those cases, such wealth may be transferred from the dying owner to his attendant, provided the latter will take the key, and swear that it was delivered to him by the deceased for the purpose of giving him the contents of the vault,—the dangerous character of the rule becomes conspicuous. Around every other disposition of the property of the dead, the legislative power has thrown safeguards against fraud and perjury; around this mode, the requirement of actual delivery is the only substantial protection, and the courts should not weaken it by permitting the substitution of convenient and easily-proven devices. We think the trial justice properly decided that the evidence would not warrant the jury in finding such a delivery as is essential to a donatio mortis causa. Nor was there any error in his ruling that the plaintiff had no title under the will of her father. That instrument made the estate of each of his daughters indefeasible upon her arriving at the age of twenty-three years. Only in case she died before that period and without issue, was there a gift over to her surviving sister. Van Houten v. Pennington, 8 N. J. Eq. 745.

The judgments should be affirmed.

Samuel M. WATTS

v.

Ellen M. WATTS.

(.....Mass.....)

A cause of action for divorce in favor of the husband on the ground of the wife's adultery is not barred by failure to set it up as a defense to a suit by the wife for a separate maintenance, in which she obtains a decree.

(February 27, 1894.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Plymouth County made during the trial of a libel for divorce, which resulted in the dismissal of the libel. Sustained.

At the trial it appeared that the libelee was discovered by libellant on June 4, 1892, in the act of adultery. Libellant ejected her from his house and on June 6, 1892, she brought suit for separate maintenance. Libellant defended but offered no evidence of the adultery. August 22, 1892, the probate court entered a decree for libelee, reciting that for justifiable cause she was living apart from her husband. No appeal was taken. The court ruled in this case that that decree was a bar to the maintenance of this libel.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Meers, Simmons & Pratt, for libellant:

It does not follow because of the failure of the libellant to put in evidence the Adulterous Act of June 4, 1892, that he is concluded by the rule that the judgment of the probate court rendered not only upon the issues there being tried, but upon all that might have been tried in that action is a bar to any subsequent action between the same parties.

1. Because the probate court upon the wife's petition had no authority to decree a judicial separation of the parties. It cannot suspend the marriage status. It affects to a limited extent the rights and duties of the parties, except so far as they are modified by the decree.

Barney v. Tourtellotte, 138 Mass. 106.

It might decree a separate maintenance of the libelee for the husband's gross cruelty or confirmed habits of intoxication, but such conduct upon his part is not a license for her to commit adultery.

Lea v. Lea, 99 Mass. 496, 96 Am. Dec. 773; Lyster v. Lyster, 111 Mass. 827; Franklin v. Franklin, 18 L. R. A. 843, 154 Mass. 515, and cases there cited.

2. The fact determined by the decree is not necessarily inconsistent with the necessary allegation in the libel and it does not therefore fall within the rule laid down in Miller v. Miller, 150 Mass. 111.

3. It is not to be taken for granted that because the record is silent upon this point, the actions by the wife in the probate court and by the husband in the superior court were for the same cause. On the contrary it may fairly be assumed and argued that the recrimination by way of which the decree was set up consisted in his violence at the time of ejecting her from his house. If they are not for the same cause of action the decree is not a bar to the maintenance of this libel.

Foye v. Patch, 133 Mass. 111; Burien v. Shannon, 99 Mass. 200, 96 Am. Dec. 738; Lea v. Lea, supra; Hawks v. Truedell, 99 Mass. 557; Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. ed. 195.

Mr. Chester M. Perry, for libelee:

(a) The probate court had jurisdiction in the matter of the petition of the libelee for separate support and maintenance.

Pub. Stat. chap. 147, § 88.

(b) The parties being the same, the decree of the probate court must have the same binding effect as the judgment of any other court having jurisdiction.

Smith v. Rice, 11 Mass. 507; Emery v. Hildreth, 2 Gray, 228; Pierce v. Prescott, 128 Mass. 140; McKim v. Doane, 187 Mass. 195; Miller v. Miller, 150 Mass. 111.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the libel alleges adultery with one Ford, on the fourth day of June, 1892, and on divers other

NOTE.—The decision in the above case as to the effect to bar a divorce, of a decree for separate maintenance, in which the wife's adultery is not set up as a defense, seems to be one of first impression.

days and times during the three years next preceding said fourth day of June; and that the libellant ejected the libelee from his house on the said fourth day of June, at which time he discovered her committing adultery with said Ford. The bill of exceptions does not show what the evidence was which the libellant relied on in the defense to the petition of his wife for separate support and maintenance, yet it is certain that the issue there was the wife's conduct during marriage, and it is fair to infer, from the above facts, that his defense to said petition was the adultery of the libelee; and, although it appears by the bill of exceptions that no evidence was offered, at the hearing on said petition for separate support and maintenance, of the particular act of adultery of June 4, 1892, yet it does appear that the libellant alone knew of it, and he cannot now complain of his own laches; and the finding of the probate court that the libelee was living apart from her husband for justifiable cause estops him from again litigating the same issue.

Com. v. Evans, 101 Mass. 25; Thurston v. Thurston, 99 Mass. 39; Lea v. Lea, Id. 493, 96 Am. Dec. 772; Lewis v. Lewis, 106 Mass. 809.

The probate court, by its decree that the libelee was living apart from her husband for justifiable cause, has judicially determined the fact that she was guilty of no matrimonial offense that would entitle her husband to a divorce, and the libellant's exceptions cannot be sustained without virtually impeaching the correctness of said decree, which, from motives of public policy, the law does not permit to be done.

Burden v. Shannon, 99 Mass. 200, 96 Am. Dec. 733.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In regard to subjects of which the probate court has jurisdiction, and upon parties brought within its jurisdiction, a decree of that court, like a judgment of other courts, is conclusive. Miller v. Miller, 150 Mass. 111; McKim v. Doane, 137 Mass. 195; Pierce v. Prescott, 128 Mass. 140; Laughton v. Atkins, 1 Pick. 585.

The decree introduced at the trial, being between the same parties as those in the present action, is binding and conclusive upon them in this suit in regard to all matters shown to have been put in issue, or to have been necessarily involved, in the former suit, and actually tried and determined in it. In regard to matters not then in controversy, and not heard and determined, although it is conclusive so far as the final disposition of that cause of action is concerned, it is not conclusive to prevent a determination of them according to the truth, if they are subsequently controverted in a different case. Foye v. Patch, 132 Mass. 111; Com. v. Evans, 101 Mass. 25; Burden v. Shannon, 14 Gray, 433-437; Thurston v. Thurston, 99 Mass. 39; Lewis v. Lewis, 106 Mass. 809; Burden v. Shannon, 99 Mass. 200, 96 Am. Dec. 733; Hawks v. Truesdell, 99 Mass. 557; Lea v. Lea, Id. 496, 96 Am. Dec. 772; Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 851, 24 L. ed. 195.

It would be a harsh and oppressive rule which should make it necessary for one sued on a trifling claim to resist it and engage in costly litigation in order to prevent the operation of a judgment which would be held conclusively to have established against him every material fact alleged and not denied in the declaration, so as to preclude him from showing the truth if another controversy should arise between the same parties. There might be various reasons why he would prefer to submit to a claim rather than to defend against it. For the purpose of defending that suit he would have his day in court but once, and if he chose to let the case go by default, or with a trial upon some of the defenses which might be made, and not upon others, he would be obliged forever after to hold his peace. But a plaintiff can claim no more than to be given what he asks in his writ. He cannot justly complain that the defendant has not seen fit to set up defenses and raise issues for the purpose of enabling him to settle facts for future possible controversies. In subsequent proceedings which are independent of the original suit, the judgment in that suit is conclusive as evidence, or may be pleaded as an estoppel, only as to those matters which were put in issue and determined; but it is not necessary that these should be particularly mentioned in the pleadings, if they are involved in the issue made up, and if the case is determined upon the trial of that issue. The bill of exceptions in this case shows nothing in regard to the pleadings, further than that there was a petition brought under Pub. Stat., chap. 147, § 33, and that the respondent appeared and defended against it. It appears that no evidence was offered of the act of adultery on June 4, 1892, and we infer that it was not set up in answer to the petition. We must assume that the respondent's pleading was a general denial. Was the question whether the petitioner had committed adultery, as now appears, necessarily involved in the issue made up by an affirmation and denial that she was living apart from her husband for justifiable cause? The grounds of the decree do not appear. Could such a decree have been made upon any possible state of facts, if the petitioner had been known to have committed adultery on June 4, 1892? If so, the decree could not be held to be a bar to a divorce unless the only facts which would render the decree possible are such as would, of themselves, preclude the libellant from obtaining a divorce. The decision that a wife is living apart from her husband for a justifiable cause, made upon a hearing between them on the general issue, conclusively shows that she has not utterly deserted him. Miller v. Miller, 150 Mass. 111.

Living apart from a husband under such circumstances as to constitute utter desertion, for which a divorce may be granted, is a marital wrong, and cannot be legally justifiable. But facts may be supposed upon which the decision of the probate court might have been made in the present case, even if it was known that the wife was guilty of adultery of which the husband had knowledge. If he had for a long time been guilty of extreme cruelty towards her, and had inflicted serious bodily injury upon her when he ejected her from his house, and then had asked her to return to his home, and had offered to forgive the adultery if she would come back, she would have been justified in refusing to return, on the ground that she had reason to fear great injury from his cruelty if she continued to live with him. If such facts appeared, the court might well decide that she was justifiably living apart from him on account of his cruelty, notwithstanding her adultery, which he was willing to forgive. It is obvious, therefore, that the decision in her favor on the question whether she was living apart from him for a justifiable cause is not necessarily a finding that she was not guilty of adultery; and upon the record before us it cannot be said that her guilt or innocence was necessarily involved in the issue then tried.

It may be said, however, that the facts above supposed are such as would bar his suit for a divorce, and that therefore such an hypothesis cannot help him in this case. It is true that the extreme cruelty of a libellant is a defense to a libel for a wife's adultery. Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 394; Oumming v. Cumming, 185 Mass. 386-389, 46 Am. Rep. 476; Morrison v. Morrison, 142 Mass. 361, 56 Am. Rep. 698. But there may be other causes which would justify her in living apart from him, less than those which would be a ground for a divorce in her favor. Such causes could not be availed of as an answer to his libel for a divorce on the ground of her adultery, although they might warrant this finding of the probate court. Against this proposition it is argued forcibly, by a prominent author, that no cause should be deemed sufficient to justify withdrawal from cohabitation which is not enough to call for a judicial separation. 1 Bishop, Marriage, Divorce & Separation, § 1753. This, until recently, was the law in England, and it is still the law in some of the American states; but it is now held by the English courts that the use of the words "separation without reasonable cause" in the statute in reference to desertion implies that there may be a separation with a reasonable cause which is something less than the causes for which a divorce may be granted. Yeatman v. Yeatman, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 489-491; Haswell v. Haswell, 1 Swab. & T. 502, 29 L. J. Prob. & M. 21. So, too, a voluntary separation of husband and wife is not there deemed to be against public policy, and articles of separation entered into by a husband and wife are enforced by courts of equity. Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 588; Besant v. Wood, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 605; Hart v. Hart, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 670. In this commonwealth it has been held that an indenture whereby a husband agrees to pay to a trustee money for the support of his wife, made in contemplation of an immediate separation, which takes place as contemplated, is not void as against public policy. Fox v. Davis, 118 Mass. 255, 18 Am. Rep. 476. In Lyster v. Lyster, 111 Mass. 327, Mr. Justice Gray says, in giving the opinion of the court: "It has accordingly been held, by a great weight of American authority, that ill treatment or misconduct of the husband of such a degree, or under such circumstances, as not to amount to cruelty for which a wife would be entitled to sue for a divorce against him, might yet justify her in leaving his house, and prevent his obtaining a divorce for her desertion if she did so." See, also, cases there cited.

The statute which we are considering (Pub. Stat. chap. 147, § 38) permits the husband as well as the wife to apply to a court to obtain an order "concerning support of a wife, or the care, custody, and maintenance of the minor children;" thus implying that the provisions of the statute are not alone for the benefit of a wife whose husband has been guilty of misconduct which would be a cause for divorce. If, to obtain the benefit of its provisions, a wife were obliged to show misconduct of the husband which would be a cause for a divorce, it would add but little to the provisions of previous statutes under which, in divorce proceedings, she could obtain orders for alimony, and in regard to the custody and support of minor children. We are of opinion that under this statute the wife may show that she is living apart from her husband for a justifiable cause, without necessarily going so far as to show a cause which would entitle her to a divorce, and that the reasons required to warrant the decree of the probate court in the present case were not necessarily reasons which would preclude a husband from obtaining a divorce for adultery from the wife. Precisely what reasons would justify a wife in withdrawing and living apart from her husband, so as to subject the husband to a liability for her support away from his home, under this statute, it is unnecessary in this case to determine; it is enough if the cause is something less than that required to entitle her to a divorce, and therefore less than that which would be necessary to furnish a bar to her husband's libel for her misconduct, if pleaded by way of recrimination. See Sturbridge v. Franklin, 160 Mass. 149.

Although ordinarily the question whether she was guilty of adultery would be important evidence on the issue tried in the probate court, the husband might offer to forgive her if she would return, or for other reasons the decision might be made to rest on grounds which would not involve a finding that she was innocent or guilty of that crime. It follows that the judgment of the probate court is not conclusive against the libellant in the present action, and there must be a new trial.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

BANK OF COMMERCE, Ptf. in Err.,

Peter GOOS.

- *1. The damages recoverable for the refusal of a bank to pay a check drawn upon it by one who has funds with the bank wherewith to make such payment should not exceed such amount as reasonably and fairly, in the natural course of things, would result from such refusal.
2. General damages are such as the jury may give when the judge cannot point out any measure by which they are to be ascertained except the opinion and judgment of a reasonable man. Special damages are such as by competent evidence are directly traceable to defendant's failure to discharge his contract obligations or such duties as are imposed upon him by law.
3. When a party litigant has, by an evasion of the adverse ruling of the court, intentionally and willfully introduced evidence of facts improper for consideration by the jury, it must be presumed that such improper evidence has had a prejudicial effect, and the verdict should accordingly be set aside.

(February 20, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by defendant's wrongful refusal to pay a check. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Cornish & Robertson, for plaintiff in error:

It appears that the English courts have decided that an action like the one at bar will lie; that it is an action arising upon contract and not in tort, and that the measure of damages, following the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 841, is such as naturally result from the dishonor of the check, or such as are reasonably within the contemplation of the parties, and "if the plaintiff is a trader, special damages need not be proved, just as in a case of an action for slander of a person in the way of his trade, or in case of the imputation of insolvency of a trader, the action lies without proof of special damage."

One reason given for the rule in the English cases, is that the payee of a check can bring no action against the bank to recover the amount due thereon, and it is necessary that the depositor have such an action as the present, to protect both himself and the payee of the check.

This court in Fonner v. Smith, 11 L. R. A. 528, 31 Neb. 107, has departed from the old rule as above stated, and declared that depos-itor and banker were the same in all respects as other creditors and debtors, and the payee of the check could bring an action direct against the bank.

All the English authorities agree that the action is upon contract, and if so the motive of the bank in refusing to honor the check when it has on deposit funds wherewith to meet it, is not material.

Frehn v. Royal Bank of Liverpool, L. R. 5 Exch. 92.

In all other analogous cases of debtor and creditor, on failure of performance, the measure of damages is invariably the interest on the amount withheld.

The damages which may be recovered are such damages as naturally result from the wrongful act, or such as were reasonably within the contemplation of the parties.

Sycamore Marsh Harvester Co. v. Sturm, 18 Neb. 210; Aultman v. Stout, 15 Neb. 586.

A party injured by breach of contract must reasonably exert himself to prevent damage, and cannot unnecessarily enhance the damage.

Dillon v. Anderson, 43 N. Y. 281; 1 Sutherland, Damages, p. 148 et seq.; Oliver v. Hawley, 5 Neb. 439; Long v. Clapp, 15 Neb. 417; Crete v. Childs, 11 Neb. 252.

Mr. C. A. Baldwin for defendant in error.

Ryan, C., filed the following opinion:

By his petition filed in the district court of Douglas county, Neb., Peter Goos alleged that the Bank of Commerce was a corporation carrying on a general banking business, and that as such it invited and received deposits, to be held and paid out upon the checks of its customers; that during the month of September, 1889, the said Goos was a depositor in said bank, and had on deposit in said bank about $3,800 on the 20th of said last-named month. The injuries for which compensation was sought were described in the following language: "Plaintiff says that on the 20th day of September, 1889, and when he so had in said bank said balance of more than $3,800.00, that said bank had so received from plaintiff, as aforesaid, on deposit, and which said money was so held by defendant subject to the order of plaintiff, he drew his check on said bank for the sum of $804.90, payable to the order of the city treasurer of Omaha; that at said date John Rush was the city treasurer of Omaha, and plaintiff delivered said check to said Rush in payment of certain taxes due from the plaintiff to the city of Omaha; that afterwards, on the 23d day of September, the said check was presented to said defendant (Bank of Commerce) for payment, and payment was refused on said check on the pretended excuse that plaintiff had no funds in the bank; and the defendant made no other or different excuse for not honoring and paying said check, and said check was not paid by defendant, and never was, and was returned by said bank to said Rush dishonored and unpaid. Plaintiff says that at the time said check was presented for payment at defendant's bank, and at all times from and after September 20, 1889, plaintiff had on deposit in said bank, subject to his order and to be paid on his checks, more than $3,000.00, and out of which said funds said check should have been paid. Plaintiff says that for the reason that said check was not paid by said defendant when it was so, as aforesaid, presented to said bank for payment, and for no other cause, and without any fault on the part of said plaintiff whatever, the said John Rush filed a complaint with the police court of Omaha, charging said plaintiff therein with the crime of obtaining a tax receipt under false pretenses, and by falsely and feloniously representing to said Rush that he had funds in said defendant's bank subject to be paid on the check of said plaintiff; and, upon said complaint having been so filed, a warrant was issued by the police judge of Omaha for the arrest of said plaintiff, and by authority of said warrant, and upon said complaint, said plaintiff was arrested by the police officers of Omaha, and was taken to the city prison, where said plaintiff was imprisoned with the lowest, filthiest, and most abandoned of human creatures, and plaintiff was kept so imprisoned for a long space of time, to wit, four hours, and was released from his said imprisonment on the condition, only, of giving bail in the sum of $1,200.00 for his appearance at the time fixed by said court for the trial of his case; and plaintiff was compelled to, and did, give said bail, and was thereby released from his said imprisonment. Plaintiff says that when he so gave said check he had, and knew he had, in said bank, subject to his order, a sum of money greatly in excess of the amount of said check, and plaintiff had no notice, or suspicion even, that said check would not be honored and paid; and said check was so given by said plaintiff in good faith, expecting that it would be honored and paid, and said check would have been paid but for the false, wicked, and cruel and illegal act of said defendant, its officers and employes, in refusing to honor and pay the same. Plaintiff says that he was, and for several years last past has been, engaged in the business of keeping an hotel in Omaha, and by so doing formed an extensive acquaintance, in the state of Nebraska and adjoining states, among the traveling public; that plaintiff is also doing an extensive business in various branches of trade, oftentimes requiring an extensive credit to carry on his said business, which, before the occurrence of the events so complained of, he was able to, and did, obtain. Plaintiff says that by reason of the refusal of the said defendant to honor and pay his said check, and his said arrest upon said charge aforesaid, and before the truth or falsity of said charge was known or could be determined, the said charge against him, and the fact of his arrest and imprisonment, was published in the daily papers of Omaha, and sent broadcast over the land in this state and adjoining states, and plaintiff was brought thereby to great and everlasting disgrace and contumely; and plaintiff's character was, by reason of the premises aforesaid, greatly injured, and persons whose confidence he was entitled to and did have before that time, by reason of the acts of said defendant, questioned the integrity of said plaintiff, and refused to give him the financial credit which they had been accustomed to; and, although plaintiff is possessed of a large amount of property over and above all his indebtedness, by reason of the said acts of said defendant his said creditors became clamorous for their pay, and plaintiff has been caused great embarrassment, and has been compelled to make great sacrifices to meet and pay his said creditors,—all of which said state of facts were caused by the said acts of said defendant. Plaintiff says, by reason of said averments and the disgrace brought upon him, he has suffered great distress and pain of mind, and has suffered great loss and damage to his reputation as an honest business man; that he has suffered great pecuniary loss and damage in the manner aforesaid; and he says by reason of the premises he has sustained damages in the sum of $50,000.00." For the sum last named, judgment was prayed.

The answer admitted that the defendant was a banking corporation, and that plaintiff was a customer of said bank, and that on September 1, 1889, plaintiff had on deposit in said bank the sum of $103.50; and the defendant denied all other allegations of the petition. Affirmatively, the defendant answered that about September 20, 1889, plaintiff drew his check on said bank for the sum of $804.90, payable to John Rush, city treasurer of Omaha, which check was presented for payment on the 28d day of said month, and payment thereof was refused, for the reason that the said bank then held a note of Peter Goos, dated August 15, 1889, due, by its terms, in ninety days from its date, and which it had been agreed, as defendant alleged, should be paid out of the proceeds of a mortgage loan (which, at the date of the note, Goos had in contemplation) whenever said loan should be effected. The defendant further answered that, in accordance with said understanding, the amount of the note aforesaid was charged against plaintiff when said loan was effected, and the unearned interest upon said note was credited to the account of Goos, and that this charge was afterwards assented to by Goos, and that, by reason of charging said note against the account of Goos, there was left an insufficient amount to pay his check afterwards given against said account in favor of the city treasurer. The bank, further answering, denied that the filing of the complaint, and the resulting arrest and imprisonment and the publication alleged in the petition, were the actual and necessary consequences of defendant's refusal to pay the check drawn in favor of said city treasurer, and denied that damages on that account were chargeable to the defendant. The matters affirmatively pleaded in the answer were denied serialim in plaintiff's reply. During the progress of the trial the parties stipulated as follows: "It is agreed by the parties hereto, for the purposes of this trial, that Peter Goos, at the time his check that he gave the city treasurer for $804.90 was presented for payment, and payment thereof refused, had in the defendant's bank, subject to being drawn by him, $3,625.24, unless the bank was authorized to charge Goos, as the bank did, the amount of his note which was dated August 15, 1889, given for $3,000.00, and due in ninety days from date. If the bank had the right to charge Goos with the amount of that note, as they did charge him, then, at the time the check to the city treasurer was presented for payment, the bank was not liable for dishonoring the check. It is not the intention of this stipulation to admit, on the part of the defendant, that the sum of $3,625.24 was correct, except for the purposes of this action, nor is it the intention of this stipulation to admit any proposition of law, the intention of the parties being simply to save, on this trial, an accounting of these matters." This stipulation restricted the scope of inquiries to the ground upon which the defendant acted in charging the ninety-day note against the account of the plaintiff, whereby arose the insufficiency of funds to pay the check in favor of the city treasurer when it was afterwards presented. The difficulty attending an analysis of the grounds of damage alleged in the petition was met in no way or degree, and to that question our attention must first be directed.

A reference to the averments of the plaintiff, relative to the special damages which he claims the right to recover, will show that plaintiff alleged that he had been keeping an hotel, whereby he had formed an extensive acquaintance, throughout the state of Nebraska and adjoining states, among the traveling public, etc. Following these introductory statements is this language: "Plaintiff says, by reason of the refusal of said defendant to honor and pay his said check, and his said arrest upon said charge aforesaid; and before the truth or falsity of said charge was or could be known or determined, the said charge against him, and the fact of his said arrest and imprisonment, was published in the daily papers of Omaha, and sent broadcast over the land in this and adjoining states, and plaintiff was brought thereby to great and everlasting disgrace and contumely, and plaintiff's credit was, by reason of the premises aforesaid, greatly injured," etc. Towards the close of his petition, plaintiff alleged that, by reason of said premises and the disgrace brought upon him, he had suffered great disgrace and pain of mind, and great loss and damage to his reputation as an honest business man. etc. It is evident that the petition was framed upon the theory that the bank was liable for the arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff, and the publication of that fact, whereby his credit was greatly damaged. The trial court, however, very properly held that these matters could not be charged to the bank for the mere refusal to pay the check of the plaintiff; his prosecution and imprisonment, and the published statements in relation thereto, not being the natural result of such refusal. Sycamore Marsh Harvester Co. v. Sturm, 13 Neb. 210; Aultman v. Stout, 15 Neb. 586.

The action, therefore, as was properly held by the trial court, was maintainable only as one for loss of credit resulting from defendant's refusal to pay plaintiff's check. While this was the theory to which the court sought to limit the trial of the case, the utmost vigilance could not prevent evidence going to the jury of the arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff and of the manner in which these facts were published to the world. The offense charged against Goos, as will be noted in his petition, was that he fraudulently obtained credit by falsely pretending that he had on deposit with the defendant sufficient money to pay the check which he tendered the city treasurer for his taxes. Judge Benecke, one of plaintiff's witnesses, being under examination, was asked as to the arrest of plaintiff, and how he learned of it. In the face of an objection which, in view of the innocent appearance of that question, could not be sustained, this witness answered: "I was sitting in my office on 15th and Douglas, and the newsboys were hallooing on the street, 'All about Peter Goos' arrest,' and I went down the street and bought a newspaper, and to my great astonishment I found that he had given a check to John Rush, the city treasurer, which was not honored." This was followed by other evidence, of the same witness, that the fact just sworn to had a very bad effect upon the credit of plaintiff. In the examination of plaintiff himself he was asked: "What did they say about the matter; what did the boys say,—the newsboys?" Answer: "All about Peter Goos' arrest; giving a forged check." This evidence was given under a ruling of the court that evidence might be given as to what the newsboys said as to the refusal of the bank to pay plaintiff's check, and how that refusal affected his credit. Immediately following this, plaintiff testified that, immediately after his arrest, imprisonment, and the publication above referred to, ten or twelve business men of Omaha, where plaintiff did business, came down that same evening to plaintiff's house, and wanted to settle up with him, and asked him what was the matter. In another part of his evidence plaintiff testified that he was arrested because of the refusal of the bank to pay his check. Again, on re-examination, he was asked why he did not go to the bank in answer to a telephone message, instead of going home, as he did, and he answered: "I did not get the papers; I got arrested; I got pulled in before I reached home." A motion was sustained to strike this out of the record, but that ruling did not probably efface from the minds of the jurors the effect of the testimony. Following this ruling upon the motion to strike from the record the above evidence, plaintiff's counsel offered to prove, without any question pending, that the reason he did not go to the bank was because he was arrested. Upon the final submission of the case the jury was instructed that the fact that Peter Goos had been arrested and imprisoned must not be taken into consideration to enhance his damages. The giving of this instruction was probably all that lay within the power of the court to do in avoidance of the prejudicial effect of the evidence to which we have just made reference, and yet that evidence must necessarily have had a prejudicial effect upon the minds of the jurors. This result was attained through the mistaken zeal of plaintiff's counsel in his endeavor to avoid the effect of the adverse rulings of the court, as to which, if he was aggrieved, he had an ample remedy otherwise than by circumvention.

At best it is a question more difficult of application than of a general definition to determine what the measure of damages is for the refusal, by a bank, to pay a check, when it has in its hands sufficient funds of the drawer for that purpose. In Rosewater v. Hoffman, 24 Neb. on page 280, is found the following language: "It is a well-settled rule in this state that punitive, vindictive, or exemplary damages will not be allowed. The only damages recoverable are denominated 'compensatory,' which are in satisfaction of the injury sustained. Boyer v. Barr, 8 Neb. 70, 80 Am. Rep. 814; Roose v. Perkins, 9 Neb. 315, 81 Am. Rep. 409; Rivoe v. McCormick, 11 Neb. 263; Boldt v. Budwig, 19 Neb. 789." In Brooks v. Traders' Nat. Bank, 69 Hun, 202, it was said that the measure of damages for a refusal to pay a check drawn upon a bank which had sufficient funds of the drawer for that purpose was such damages as might fairly and reasonably be considered as arising from a breach of contract according to the usual course of things. The supreme court of Illinois, in Schaffner v. Ehrman, 139 Ill. 109, 15 L. R. A. 134, used the following language: "The question, therefore, is, What is the measure of a banker's liability, to a person engaged in trade, for a refusal to pay his check, he having sufficient funds on deposit for that purpose, in the absence of evidence of malice and special injury to the depositor? Authorities are not numerous on the question, but they seem to be uniformly to the effect that more than mere nominal damages are, in such cases, recoverable. The leading case is that of Rolin v. Steward, 14 C. B. 595. In that case there was no evidence of malice in fact nor of special damages, but the jury were told that they ought not to confine their verdict to nominal damages, but should give the plaintiffs such temperate damages as they should judge to be a reasonable compensation for the injury they must have sustained from the dishonoring of their checks; and the jury accordingly, by their verdict, gave substantial damages, on which judgment was rendered by the trial court. On appeal, all the judges concurred in holding that the directions to the jury were correct; the case being likened to that of a slander of a person in the way of his trade. Williams, J., said: 'I think it cannot be denied that if one who is not a trader were to bring an action against a banker for dishonoring a check at a time when he had funds of the customer in his hands sufficient to meet it, and special damages were alleged and proved, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover special damages; and, when it is alleged and proved that the plaintiff is a trader, I think it is equally clear that the jury, in estimating the damages, may take into their consideration the natural and necessary consequences which must result to the plaintiff from the defendant's breach of contract, just as, in the case of an action for the slander of a person in the way of his trade, the action lies without proof of special damages.' This case was cited with approval in Prehn v. Royal Bank of Liverpool, L. R. 5 Exch. 92, in which Martin, B., says: 'Now, with respect to damages in general, they are of three kinds: First, nominal. The second kind is general damages, and their nature is clearly stated by Creswell in Rolin v. Steward, 14 C. B. 595, to be such as the jury may give when the judge cannot point out any measure by which they are to be assessed except the opinion and judgment of a reasonable man.' In Wood's Mayne on Damages (1st Am. ed. § 8, p. 12), the rule is announced, that 'when there may be an injury existing at present, though unascertainable, or to arise hereafter, and for which no further action could be brought, substantial damage might be given at once;' citing the case of Rolin v. Steward, supra. And text-writers, without exception, seem to approve of the rule announced in that case. See Bishop, Non-cont. Law, § 49; 1 Sutherland, Damages, 129. In 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 226, it is said: 'The depositor, by proving special loss, may recover special damages from a bank for its breach of duty; but, if unable to do so, he may recover such temperate damages as will be a reasonable compensation for the injury he has sustained,'—citing authorities. 'Where a bank refuses to honor a check of its depositor without legal cause, the latter is entitled to recover substantial damages.' [5 Gen. Dig. U. S. Ann. 283],—citing Patterson v. Marine Nat. Bank of Pittsburgh, 180 Pa. 419, and other authorities."

Plaintiff might have relied upon his right to general damages under the above rule, but he did not. Special damages, we believe, are such as, by competent evidence, are directly traceable to a defendant's failure to discharge his contract obligations, or such duties as are imposed upon him by law. The language which we have just quoted at great length probably, as nearly as possible, defines this kind of damages in cases like that under consideration. In the case at bar the attempt to recover special damages was upon allegations and proofs of an unjustifiable dishonor of a check presented by the city treasurer, so confusedly interwoven with the subsequent arrest of the plaintiff, his incarceration, and the newspaper and newsboys' account thereof that it was impossible, in the nature of things, for the jury to segregate and ascertain the amount of damages which were solely traceable to the refusal to pay plaintiff's check, independently of the other circumstances to which we have referred. This confusion of matters which should have been kept distinct seems, by plaintiff, to have been intensified by working in evidence which the court had repeatedly ruled was inadmissible in proof of recoverable damages.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the District Court is reversed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Div. 2).

STATE of Missouri, ex rel. Edward J. ROBB,
v.
William J. STONE.

(.....Mo.....)

Mandamus will not lie to compel official action, by the governor, whether the act is of the kind regarded as ministerial or otherwise, under constitutional provisions that the three departments of the government shall be distinct and that neither branch can interfere with the duties of the others.

(February 27, 1894.)

ON DEMURRER to an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the governor to order payment of money alleged to be due under a contract for legal services. Demurrer sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward Robb and Silver & Brown for relator.

Mr. Robert F. Walker, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator in this case, Edward J. Robb, was employed by David R. Francis, then governor of the state, as counsel on behalf of the state in the case of the State of Missouri v. Louis Ulrich, at that time pending in the Supreme Court of the United States. This employment had its origin in an Act of the 36th General Assembly approved March 25, 1891, which authorized and empowered such employment to be made, at and for a sum not exceeding the sum of $500; all disbursements out of the fund thus created to be made upon the order of the governor. By an Act approved March 31, 1893, the general assembly reappropriated said amount for the purpose aforesaid, which act provided that all disbursements under this section should be made by order of the governor, and that counsel fees should be paid "only on determination of suit." The sum which David R. Francis, then governor, agreed to pay relator for his services as counsel in that cause, was the said sum of $500, in consideration of which sum relator agreed to represent the state as counsel in said cause until the determination thereof. After thus entering into such contract, relator duly performed all of its conditions on his part, and discharged his duty as counsel for the state thereunder, until the final determination of said cause, which resulted in Ulrich dismissing his appeal therein on the 15th of May, 1893. No part of the amount appropriated by the general assembly for the payment of counsel fees, and agreed to be paid relator, has ever been paid him. On the 22d day of August, 1893, relator presented his said contract with, and claim against, the state of Missouri, to

Gov. William J. Stone, exhibiting to him at the same time all necessary papers, etc., and asked that said sum of $500 be paid to relator, but which sum said governor neglected and refused to order to be paid to relator. Upon these facts thus presented in the petition, relator prays that an alternative writ of mandamus issue, directed to the governor, commanding him, etc. Waiving the issuance of the alternative writ, the governor has entered his appearance herein, and by his counsel has filed a general demurrer to relator's petition, to the effect that the petition does not state facts sufficient, etc.

As the petition states a good contract with, and cause of action against, the state, and the demurrer admits the allegations of the petition to be true, the only question for determination is whether the respondent is amenable to the process of this court in a case of this sort; in other words, whether this court has jurisdiction to entertain this application made by relator. The inquiry thus suggested brings into prominence article 3 of our Constitution, by which it is provided that: "The powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial—each of which shall be confined to a separate magistracy, and no person, or collection of persons, charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of those departments, shall exercise any powers properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances in this constitution expressly directed or permitted." In this instance, we, constituting a portion of the judicial department of the government, are called upon to exercise, or what amounts to the same thing, to control the exercise of, powers belonging exclusively to the executive department of that government. To such action on our part the organic law interposes an insuperable barrier. In addition to the provisions of the organic law quoted, that instrument also declares that: "The supreme executive power shall be vested in a chief magistrate, who shall be styled 'The Governor of the State of Missouri.'" Const. art. 5, § 4. Section 6 of the same article requires that "the governor shall take care that the laws are . . . faithfully executed." Of the same article, section 1 provides that the governor "shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law." And section 6 of article 14, as a prerequisite to his entering on the duties of his office, prescribes that he "take and subscribe an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and of this state, and to demean himself faithfully in office." Under these plain and comprehensive provisions, it must be apparent that any duty "prescribed by law" for the governor to perform is as much part and parcel of his executive duties as though made so by the most solemn language of the constitution itself. Conceding the validity of any given law, the fact that the duties which it prescribes are merely ministerial cannot take them out of the domain of executive duties, nor make them any the less those which "properly belong" to the executive department of the government. And should we, by our process, be able to compel the performance by the governor of such duties, we would, in effect, and to all intents and purposes, be performing those duties ourselves; for there can be no substantial distinction drawn between our assumption of duties pertaining to another department of the government, and our intervention resulting in the compulsory performance of such duties. "Qui facit per alium," etc. Nor does the fact that any duty which the law prescribes for the governor to perform might have been assigned to some other officer, who would have been amenable to the process of this court, alter the conclusion to be reached, or vary the result; for the fact would still remain that the act required to be done was nevertheless an official one, assigned by the legislative department of the government to be performed by the executive department, eo nomine,—by the governor, and by him alone,—and therefore, if he is not bound to obey the law in question as governor, he is not bound to act at all, since he only assumed to obey the laws in his gubernatorial capacity, and not otherwise or elsewhere. See Rice v. Austin, 19 Minn. 108 (Gil. 74), 18 Am. Rep. 830. So that we should manifestly be trenching on the exclusive powers of two separate magistracies of the government, should we assume to exercise jurisdiction in this case.

NOTE.—For other authorities in line with the above decision, see note to Hovey v. State (Ind.), 11 L. R. A. 763.

Abundant authority establishes the position here taken that mandamus will not issue to the governor to compel the performance of any duty pertaining to his office, whether political or merely ministerial; whether commanded by the constitution or by some law passed on the subject. People v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89; Hawkins v. The Governor, 1 Ark. 570, 33 Am. Dec. 346; State v. Warmoth, 22 La. Ann. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 712, 24 La. Ann. 351; State v. Board of Liquidation, 42 La. Ann. 647; Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192, 5 Am. Rep. 564; Rice v. Austin, supra; Dennett, Petitioner, 32 Me. 508, 54 Am. Dec. 602; Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Loury, 61 Miss. 102, 48 Am. Rep. 76; State v. The Governor, 25 N. J. L. 831; State v. Drew, 17 Fla. 67; Hovey v. State, 127 Ind. 588, 11 L. R. A. 763, which distinguishes or virtually overrules Gray v. State, 72 Ind. 567; People v. Bissell, 19 Ill. 229, 68 Am. Dec. 591; People v. Yates, 40 Ill. 126; People v. Cullom, 100 Ill. 472; Jonesboro Fall Branch & Blair's Gap. Turnp. Co. v. Brown, 8 Baxt. 490, 35 Am. Rep. 718; Bates v. Taylor, 87 Tenn. 819, 8 L. R. A. 816; State v. Towns, 8 Ga. 360; Houston, T. & B. R. Co. v. Randolph, 24 Tex. 317; Hartman's App. 85 Pa. 433, 27 Am. Rep. 667; Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 487.

The same views are enunciated by several text-writers. Thus High says: "While, as to purely executive or political functions devolving upon the chief executive officer of a state, and as to duties necessarily involving the exercise of official judgment and discretion, the doctrine may be regarded as uncontroverted that mandamus will not lie, yet as to duties of a ministerial nature, and 23 L. R. A.

involving no element of discretion, which have been imposed by law upon the governor of a state, the authorities are exceedingly conflicting, and, indeed, utterly irreconcilable. Upon the one hand, it is contended, and with much show of reason, that as to duties of this character the general principle allowing relief by mandamus against ministerial officers should apply, and the mere fact of ministerial duties having been required of an executive officer should not deter the courts from the exercise of their jurisdiction. Upon the other hand, it is held that under our structure of government, with its three distinct departments,—executive, legislative, and judicial,—each department being wholly independent of the other, neither branch can properly interfere with the duties of the others, and that as to the nature of the duties required of the executive department by law, and as to its obligation to perform those duties, it is entirely independent of any control by the judiciary. While the former theory has the support of many respectable authorities, and is certainly in harmony with the general principles underlying the jurisdiction, as applied to purely ministerial officers, the latter has the clear weight of authority in its favor, and may be regarded as the established doctrine upon this subject." High, Extr. Legal Rem. 2d ed. § 118. Touching this subject, Wood says: "The attempt on the part of some of the courts to interfere with the discharge of executive duties is not only in opposition to our theory of government, and in excess of their power, but also attended with great danger. If the courts may interfere with the discharge of any ministerial duties of the executive department of the government, they may with all; and we should have the singular spectacle of a government run by the courts, instead of the officers provided by the constitution. Each department of the government is essentially and necessarily distinct from the others, and neither can lawfully trench upon or interfere with the powers of the others; and our safety, both as to national and state governments, is largely dependent upon the preservation of the distribution of power and authority made by the constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof. If the governor refuses or neglects to discharge his duties, or exceeds his powers in flagrant cases, there is ample remedy by impeachment and removal from office. It is not believed that the courts have the power to discharge his duties for him, or to say what he shall or what he shall not do." Wood, Mandamus, pp. 123, 124. See also Merrill, Mandamus, § 97.

Although the precise point now presented has never been decided in this state, yet in State v. Fletcher, 39 Mo. loc. cit. 388, the clear intimation is made by this court, speaking through Wagner, J., that there was really no valid distinction between a political and a ministerial act of the governor, when considered with reference to the issuance of a mandamus against him.

There are many respectable authorities, however, which maintain views diametrically opposed to those here advanced. Most of them will be found collated in the brief filed for relator. Tennessee & C. R. Co. v. Moore, 86 Ala. 871; Middleton v. Low, 80 Cal. 596; Greenwood Cemetery Land Co. v. Routt, 17 Colo. 156, 15 L. R. A. 369; Gray v. State, 73 Ind. 567; Magruder v. Swann, 25 Md. 173; Grooms v. Gwinn, 48 Md. 572; Chumaseiro v. Potts, 2 Mont. 242; State v. Blasdel, 4 Nev. 241; State v. Chase, 5 Ohio St. 528; State v. Nicholls, 42 La. Ann. 209. In addition to those cited, see Martin v. Ingham, 88 Kan. 641; State v. Thayer, 81 Neb. 82.

The fact that the governor has voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction of this court has been pressed upon our attention as a reason why we should pass on or adjudicate the question submitted; and cases have been cited—among them, Pacific Railroad v. The Governor, 23 Mo. 360, 66 Am. Dec. 673, as showing that, where the governor does not claim his exemption, then this court may adjudicate the matters at issue, and leave the governor to claim his exemption afterwards. But we regard such cases as wrong in theory, and unsafe and unsound in practice. If we have authority to render a judgment, then we have jurisdiction to enforce that judgment by all appropriate process, and need not inquire whether any exemption from that process will be pleaded. If, however, we have no jurisdiction over the chief magistrate, his consent will not confer it on us. We will not "assume a jurisdiction if we have it not." We will not sit as a moot court, and pass upon questions, and enter a judgment thereon which we are powerless to enforce. "For all jurisdiction implies superiority of power. Authority to try would be vain and idle without authority to redress; and the sentence of a court would be contemptible, unless that court had power to command the execution of it." 1 Cooley, Bl. Com. p. 242.

As we do not possess any jurisdiction over the governor, we shall decline any further discussion of this cause, hold the demurrer well taken, and deny the issuance of the peremptory writ.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

1. A contract may be implied and enforced in equity to leave to an adopted child as an heir the property of the adopting parent, where the proceedings for adoption were taken under a statute which was unconstitutional for defect in its title, but were supposed by the adopting parent as long as he lived to be valid.
2. A contract to leave property to an adopted child as an heir is taken out of the statute of frauds by its complete performance on the part of the child.
3. The rights of a person under an alleged contract to leave him as heir the property of the other party cannot be determined in proceedings, under Pub. Acts 1887, Act No. 278, to determine who are the legal heirs or legal representatives of such person.

(February 27, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enjoin waste. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas E. Barkworth for appellant.

Mr. Louis J. Pierson for appellees.

NOTE.—As to validity of agreement to pay money or give property after the death of the promisor, see note to Krell v. Codman (Mass.) 14 L. R. A. 860. As to legal status of adopted child, see note to Warren v. Prescott (Me.) 17 L. R. A. 435. 23 L. R. A.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill is filed by Charles E. Wright, of Denver, Colo., Edward Wright, of Jackson, Mich., Nettie Hart, of Oakley, Mich., and Elizabeth Pierson, of Chicago, Ill.,—all of whom claim to be the heirs-at-law of Phineas Wright, deceased,—to restrain defendant from committing waste on land of which Phineas Wright died seised, and which complainants now claim to own. The three complainants first named claim an undivided one-half interest in said land as children of Chester Wright, who was the brother of the deceased; and the complainant Elizabeth Pierson claims, as a sister of the deceased, to be entitled to an undivided one-half interest. On the hearing in the court below it was conceded by complainants and defendant that Phineas R. Wright was the owner of this land, consisting of 240 acres, situate in the township of Blackman, Jackson county, this state, and died seised thereof on May 23, 1888, leaving Polly M. Wright (now Polly M. Richardson, by a second marriage) as his widow, but no children surviving him; that after his death, and prior to the filing of this bill, what would amount to legal waste was committed by the defendant, by cutting timber upon the premises, as averred in the bill, to an amount which would confer jurisdiction upon the court to hear and determine,—the complainants agreeing, upon this conceded state of facts, to waive all claim for damages arising out of such waste already committed. The defendant set up in his answer his claim of title to the premises; and upon the hearing in the court below it was shown, in his behalf, that he entered the family of deceased when about one and a half years old, under an agreement entered into between the superintendent of the poor for the county of Jackson and the deceased, said agreement being in the form of an indenture binding him to deceased until he became twenty-one years old; that this indenture was dated January 29, 1868; that his name was then Frank Creer, but subsequently deceased and his wife, acting under the statute then in force, filed their petition in the probate court declaring their intention to make him their heir-at-law, and praying that his name be changed to Franklin P. Wright; that the order was accordingly made on January 30, 1875, defendant being then about eight years old; that defendant remained in the family, and at the time of the death of Phineas R. Wright was twenty-two years and three months old; and that he had performed his duty to his adopted parents faithfully, and given them his entire time, never receiving any compensation for such services. It was testified by Mrs. Richardson on the hearing in the court below that it was understood between her husband (the deceased) and herself that the defendant should, as the result of the adoption, be their heir, and ultimately come into possession of their property, and that it was always so intended. She was asked: "Did that intention continue to your knowledge, during Mr. Wright's lifetime?" Answer. "It did." Question. "Do you know whether or not Mr. Wright expressed from time to time a belief that that was successfully accomplished by the adoption papers?" A. "He told me a number of times that he had seen the lawyers about it, and they all said it was just as safe." Q. "State whether or not the defendant, to your knowledge, understood that he was to be the heir-at-law?" A. "He expected— He did not know but what he was our child until after Mr. Wright's death."

The witness further testified that there was never any talk between herself and her husband about paying the defendant in any way, and that about three months before Mr. Wright's death he was at a neighbor's house, and was speaking about these heirs coming up to break down this adoption, when he said: "Rather than have it done, he would do most anything, for he intended his property should go to Frank, if he used it up in four weeks after he died." The witness further testified that Mr. Wright meant and expected that Frank would inherit the property, the same as a son, and that he died in that belief. After Phineas R. Wright's death, proceedings were taken under the statute, in the probate court for Jackson county, to determine who were the heirs-at-law. Upon the hearing in that court, the defendant was so adjudged. An appeal was taken to the circuit court, and on the 1st of February, 1890, the proceedings of the probate court were reversed, and the complainants in the present case adjudged the heirs-at-law.

Defendant claims that in effect, and by force of the arrangement actually made, there was an agreement upon the part of Phineas R. Wright to reward him for his services and love and affection as a son, with such property as he might be seized at his death; that defendant, acting under that belief, performed the duties which made up the consideration of the contract, and is therefore entitled to receive his reward; and that equity will enforce this understanding, despite the failure of the law. On the other hand, it is contended by complainants that the case is barren of any proof of contract to will or devise the property to defendant, only as defendant might have inherited it, had there been a law under which he might have been adopted, and had legal proceedings been had under such law to accomplish such purpose; that there is no such thing as adoption known to the common law; that the proofs fail to show an agreement, except the agreement to adopt, which has failed because of the unconstitutionality of the statute; and that the defendant's claim is set up, apparently, to have the court find an agreement to let him have the estate, and then enforce it. It is also contended by counsel for complainants that the order of the circuit court made upon the appeal from the probate court is an adjudication upon the question here in controversy and is res judicata as to all matters here involved.

The statute under which defendant was adopted was held unconstitutional in People v. Congdon, 77 Mich. 857. It is apparent, however, that Phineas R. Wright and his wife supposed that defendant's adoption had been successfully accomplished by the proceedings taken for that purpose. During all these years they treated defendant as their son and heir, and Mr. Wright died in the belief that he would inherit the property the same as an own son would have done. So careful had the parties been to show him their love and affection, that he never knew until after Mr. Wright's death but that they were his own parents. During all these years he had rendered them filial affection, and given them his labor upon the farm, with the belief that at their decease he would inherit all they possessed. We think there may be said to be a contract, impliedly at least, that defendant was to have this property, and that there had been such a performance on the part of the defendant as to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds. If this arrangement so solemnly made by Mr. and Mrs. Wright cannot be carried out,—if strangers may now step in and take this inheritance which the defendant has been led to believe would be his,—the defendant would be most outrageously wronged. He has lived since his adoption upon this farm, in the full belief that he was under his own father's roof, and in the full expectation and belief that, as a son and only child, he would inherit it. It would be technical, indeed, to say, from all these circumstances, no contract could be implied which a court of equity would enforce to save the rights of the defendant.

There are two cases arising in the New Jersey equity court which sustain this doctrine,—Van Dyne v. Vreeland (decided in 1857), 11 N. J. Eq. 870, and Van Tine v. Van Tine (decided in 1888), reported in 1 L. R. A. 155, in which Van Dyne v. Vreeland, supra, is cited and approved. In the first of these cases, an uncle had made an agreement with the father of an infant child that he would adopt the boy, and after the death of himself and wife all the property should go to him. There was no formal adoption, but the child lived in the family twenty-five years, assumed their name, and treated them as parents. The court held that there was performance on the part of the child, and the agreement could be enforced. In the latter case, a girl eight years old was adopted by Mrs. Stryker, who assumed the obligation, by parol, with her parents, to treat the girl as her own child, and make her her heir. The girl remained in the family, giving her time and affection to Mrs. Stryker, with the expectation of becoming Mrs. Stryker's heir. The court found that there was a contract with the child, that the contract was performed on her part, and therefore she was entitled to receive the property, which was real estate, as in the present case. The doctrine of these cases finds support in Rhodes v. Rhodes, 8 Sandf. Ch. 279, 7 L. ed. 852, and Sutton v. Haydon, 62 Mo. 101. In Shahan v. Swan, 48 Ohio St. 25, the supreme court of Ohio expressly recognize the doctrines of these cases. It there said: "Notwithstanding that it is the established rule in Ohio that the payment of the consideration, even in the personal service of the party seeking relief, does not ordinarily constitute such part performance as will take a case out of the operation of the statute, we do not wish to be understood to hold that cases may not arise where specific performance of a contract in parol may be had on the ground that the consideration had been paid in personal services not intended to be, and not susceptible of being, measured by a pecuniary standard." This doctrine is also recognized in Sharkey v. McDermott, 91 Mo. 647, 60 Am. Rep. 270. We are aware that the principle laid down here is not supported in Wallace v. Rappleye, 108 Ill. 229, and Wallace v. Long, 105 Ind. 522, 55 Am. Rep. 222, and some other Illinois and Indiana cases, as well as in Shearer v. Weaver, 56 Iowa, 578, but we think the better reasons support the conclusions reached by the New Jersey court.

It is contended, however, that in the cases referred to a contract was shown to have been entered into between the party adopting the child and the parent, or some one who had the right and authority to make the contract. We think it has already been sufficiently demonstrated that such a contract is to be found in the arrangement made for defendant's adoption, and the acts of the parties subsequent thereto, and that it has been fully performed on the part of the defendant, so that it is taken out of the operation of the statute. It was expressly held in Carmichael v. Carmichael, 72 Mich. 76, 1 L. R. A. 596, that a person may enter into a valid agreement by parol, binding himself to make a particular testamentary disposition of his property. In that case, Van Dyne v. Vreeland was cited with approval.

One other question arises. Are the proceedings had in the circuit court res judicata? These proceedings were taken under the provisions of Act No. 273, Pub. Acts 1887, which gives to any person claiming an interest in the lands to which deceased had title at the time of his death the right to apply to the probate court, and gives that court power to adjudicate and determine who are the legal heirs or legal representatives, and entitled to such lands. Section 3 of the Act provides that such "adjudication shall be entered on the journal of said court, and which entry, or a duly certified copy thereof, shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein found." The inquiry to be instituted under that statute would give the probate court no jurisdiction to determine the questions involved in the controversy here. That proceeding was to determine who were the legal heirs or legal representatives entitled to take. Here the claim set up by the defendant by way of cross-bill is for the enforcement of a contract, which he insists that equitably he is entitled to have enforced against the legal heirs. The probate court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine that question, and, on appeal from the probate court, the circuit court would have no such jurisdiction. Nester v. Ross' Estate (Mich.) 57 N. W. Rep. 122; Linneman v. Moross' Estate (Mich.) 57 N. W. Rep. 103.

It follows that the decree of the court below must be reversed, and decree entered here dismissing complainants' bill, and finding that the title to the estate of Phineas R. Wright vested, by reason of this contract, at his decease, in the defendant, the same as if he had been the son. By reason of the stipulation between the parties, no costs will be allowed to either party.

McGrath, Ch. J., concurred with Long, J.

Grant, J., concurring:

Each case of this character stands upon its own peculiar circumstances and facts, upon which relief is granted or denied. The present case forms no exception. Mr. and Mrs. Wright were childless. They desired to adopt some one as heir, who should inherit their property. They first took the defendant under articles of apprenticeship. The adoption superseded these articles, and from that time until the date of his majority the relations existing between them were understood by all to be those of parent and child, and not of apprentice and employer. In no more solemn manner could Mr. Wright and his wife have declared that upon their death defendant should receive their property. It is no reply to this to say that, in his lifetime, Mr. Wright might have made other disposition of his property. He did not do so, and died in the belief that defendant would have it, and that he was his legal heir. They gave defendant their own name, and by their conduct, language, and treatment represented to him that he was their own son. He lived with them upon this understanding until some time past the age of majority. He had a right to rest and act upon the belief that he was the legal heir. So long as his reputed father and mother chose to let him repose in this belief, others had no right to interfere. Equity is clearly with the defendant, and, if relief cannot be granted, it must be because the strict rule of law interferes, and permits the accomplishment of an act of the greatest injustice. Unfortunately, the law in regard to adoption was found to be unconstitutional because the real object of the act was not expressed in its title. Each party acted in the undoubted belief that the defendant, upon the death of Mr. Wright, would take the property. Can equity give validity to such intention, in the absence of an express contract? I see no reason why it may not. Defendant rendered services upon the faith of his relationship. Those services were accepted in reliance upon such relationship, declared in the most solemn manner. There are no children interested. If there were no collateral heirs, the property would otherwise escheat to the state. While it is true, in the cases cited from New Jersey, that the parties who took the complainants to live with them said that if they would remain they should have their property, still great stress is laid upon facts and circumstances similar to, but not as strong as, some in the present case. As I read those authorities, they are not based solely upon the existence of a promise. This is a case where, in my judgment, equity should declare that to be done which the parties clearly intended. I therefore concur in the opinion of my Brother Long.

Hooker, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion of my Brother Long. The defendant admits the acts which constitute waste, unless he can establish his right to the premises under his answer, which partakes of the nature of a cross-bill. The undisputed testimony shows that he was bound to the intestate in 1868, when an infant of less than two years of age. This imposed upon him the obligation of rendering service to his master until he should reach the age of twenty-one years. In 1875—he having lived with the intestate during the interval—proceedings were had for his adoption under the statute, and with the intention of making him the heir of his foster parents. These proceedings are regular, but unfortunately the act was declared unconstitutional some years later, and hence the defendant did not become the heir of the intestate by force of the statute. If he can be held to have been his heir-at-law, it must be by reason of our ability to find that the intestate made a valid contract to make him such. Whether a man can, in the absence of statutory authority, make another his heir, and procure recognition for him as such, is a question not discussed. If he could, that question is concluded for this case by the adjudication by the circuit court, which, in the proceeding appealed from probate court, in which all of the parties were heard, determined that he was not such heir, and that the complainants were the lawful heirs of the intestate. Accordingly, we find that the defendant is not claiming upon the theory that he is the heir, but upon the theory that he is not the heir, and that he has the right to the specific performance of a contract whereby the intestate undertook and promised to give him his property at death in consideration of service until the defendant should reach his majority, which service he says has been rendered. Unfortunately for him, however, the testimony conclusively shows that the intestate never made any such promise. The indentures of apprenticeship were not pretended to have been based on any such promise. The adoption proceedings contain no more than the consent to make him an heir, the same as the intestate's own children; and if we shall, viewing these proceedings in the light of the unconstitutional law under which they were had, think that the intestate may be held to have promised to make him such heir, there is yet a fatal variance between the contract relied upon and the one proved. Were this an express and unqualified agreement to make him such heir, and were it based on the promise of service to which the intestate was not already entitled, it could not be enforced as a contract whereby the intestate had promised to give to the defendant his property, in consideration of his rendering certain service. The defendant cannot recover upon the theory which he is relying upon. He is precluded by the former adjudication from recovering as the heir, if that could otherwise be permitted, which we do not intimate. The evidence, so far as it appears in the record, shows an intention on the part of the intestate to allow his property to go to the defendant. Whether the complainants could have produced evidence to the contrary, we have no means of knowing, as they appear to have relied upon their legal rights. Perhaps, however, it is fair to infer that they could not, and, if so, it is a hardship upon the defendant to be deprived of the property. But he was under the obligation to render the service to the intestate before the adoption, and he incurred no further obligation by reason of the adoption. It is therefore difficult to see how the case differs from any other nudum pactum. The disappointment is one that comes from finding that he has labored under a mistake in relation to his ancestry and ancestral rights. I find no case which holds that proceedings like those shown in this case can be construed into a contract to convey property by will or otherwise, where the evidence conclusively shows that the undertaking was merely to adopt and make an heir of a child, subject to the right upon the part of the foster parent to cut him off as he might his own child, especially where the child adopted was not only ignorant of the transaction, but already under a legal obligation to perform all of the services which constitute the consideration for such agreement. I think the decree of the circuit court was correct, and should be affirmed, with costs.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS

Walter WILLIAMSON, by Benjamin Thomas, His Next Friend, Appt.,

LOUISVILLE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL OF REFORM.

(15 Ky. L. Rep. 623.)

A reform school under the control and oversight of the legislature, which is an agency of the state and maintained by taxation and state aid, is not liable to an action for damages for negligent or malicious injuries to an inmate by its servants or employes.

(January 27, 1894.)

NOTE.—Liability of charitable institution for negligence.

The decisions are few in which the liability of a charitable corporation for negligence of its officers or agents has been adjudicated.

The earliest case directly in point which we have found is that of Foefees of Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507, in which it is expressly held that no damages can be given out of the fund of a charity hospital. The case was one in which damages were claimed for refusal to receive an applicant. The court follows the case of Duncan v. Findlater, 6 Clark & F. 804, MacL. & Rob. 911, but the latter case was one relating to the liability of trustees under a public road act and therefore related to a kind of public or municipal corporation involving nothing about charity, except so far as municipal corporations, or those engaged in the public service instead of for private gain are all to be considered charitable. The distinction between a charity and a public or municipal corporation was not clearly taken in the above case and has not been kept entirely clear in some of the later decisions; but no attempt is here made to touch the question of the liability of municipal or public corporations, as such, but merely the question of liability as affected by the charitable nature of the enterprise in which a master is engaged.

While the later English cases have held public corporations, such as boards of health, or other local boards, liable for negligence of their servants, we do not find that the case of Foefees of Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, has been overruled by any case directly relating to a charity.

Following the above case it was held in McDonald v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529, that a hospital corporation, not operated for profit but holding property in trust for the purpose of benefit to the sick, although it had some receipts from paying patients, was not liable for the negligence of its aids.

Again in Benton v. Boston City Hospital Trustees, 140 Mass. 13, 54 Am. Rep. 428, the negligence of the superintendent in respect to the outside stairway of a city hospital, which constituted a charity, maintained by the city and by private donations with some receipts from paying patients, would not make the trustees of the corporation liable for an injury sustained by a person on such stairway while on a visit to a paying patient in order to arrange for the latter's removal from the hospital.

To the same effect it was held in respect to a house of refuge, which constituted a charity, that there was no liability of the institution for an assault by its officers on an inmate, for the property of the institution was contributed solely for benevolent purposes. Perry v. House of Refuge, 68 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495.

The court expressly approved the rule that damages cannot be recovered from a fund held in trust for charitable purposes, and the decision was based on the authorities above cited.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted by the cruel acts of one of defendant's servants. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. George Weissinger Smith and Samuel B. Kirby, for appellant:

Where the defendant corporation has knowledge of the incompetency of its servant it will be liable for the servant's tort even though the defendant would be ordinarily exempt from liability to pay damages out of a trust fund.

ages cannot be recovered from a fund held in trust for charitable purposes, and the decision was based on the authorities above cited.

On the other hand, it was held in Rhode Island in respect to a hospital, that it was liable to a paying-patient for negligent treatment, although the hospital was administered largely as a charity, with income derived mainly from endowments and voluntary contributions, and its physicians gave gratuitous services, except for the board and lodging given to those persons who were constantly in attendance. Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675.

The court in this case regards the authority of McDonald v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital as somewhat impaired by the fact that it was based in part on the case of Holliday v. St. Leonard, 11 C. B. N. S. 192, 8 Jur. N. S. 79, 4 L. T. N. S. 406, the authority of which it considered to be overthrown by later English cases; but the case of Holliday v. St. Leonard was one in respect to the liability for negligence of an employe of a surveyor of highways.

The Rhode Island case holds that a corporation holding property for a charity should not be more highly privileged than corporations created for public purposes holding their property for such purposes; but it says: "It may be that some of the corporate property, the buildings and grounds for example, is subject to so strict a dedication that it cannot be diverted to the payment of damages. But however that may be, we understand that the defendant corporation is in the receipt of funds which are applicable generally to the uses of the hospital, and following the decision in Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H. L. 93, 11 H. L. Cas. 686, 35 L. J. Exch. 225, 12 Jur. N. S. 571, 14 L. T. N. S. 677, 14 Week. Rep. 872, we think a judgment in tort for damages against the corporation can be paid out of them." It is seen therefore that the Rhode Island case treats the case of a charitable corporation as governed by the same rule as that governing public corporations.

There are other cases relating to liability for negligence of officers or employes of a hospital, in which the liability is denied, but these are cases in which the hospital was operated by a municipal corporation, and the exemption from liability is upheld, not on the ground that the enterprise is a charity, but on the broader ground of the exemption of municipal corporations from liability for negligence of officers engaged in public duties.

Such is the case of Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 375, 94 Am. Dec. 461, in which a city was held not liable for the negligence of its agents at a city hospital, resulting in the death of a slave, which was being treated in a hospital.

Likewise in the case of Murtaugh v. St. Louis, 41 Mo. 479, a city is held not liable to a nonpaying pa-

McDonald v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529; Perry v. House of Refuge, 68 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495.

The master is liable even for the malicious tort of the servant, if the tort was committed by the servant in the scope of his authority and while carrying out his master's ends.

Addison, Torts; Howe v. Newmarrh, 12 Allen, 49; Ortig v. Lee, 14 B. Mon. 119.

The corporation though charitable will be responsible for negligence in selecting its servants.

Several American decisions hold that a charitable corporation is not liable for the torts of its servants on the ground that to pay damages out of the trust fund designed to be devoted to the needs of the organization would tend to deprive it of the means to carry out the purposes of the charity.

Fire Ins. Patrol of Philadelphia v. Boyd, 1 L. R. A. 417, 120 Pa. 624; Perry v. House of Refuge, supra; Benton v. Boston City Hospital Trustees, 140 Mass. 18, 54 Am. Rep. 436; McDonald v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital, supra.

These cases are not based upon statute or common law but rely upon precedent alone.

Trustees of Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507; Holliday v. St. Leonard, 11 C. B. N. S. 192, two English cases, but these English cases were overruled.

Mercy Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H.

tient at a city hospital for injuries resulting from negligence and misfeasance of officers.

Again in Ogg v. Lansing, 35 Iowa, 493, 14 Am. Rep. 493, the city was held not liable for the negligence of its sanitary officials, whereby a dangerous disease was communicated to the plaintiff.

The same decision was made in respect to the negligence of selectmen, whereby such a disease was communicated, in Brown v. Vinalhaven, 65 Me. 402, 20 Am. Rep. 702.

And a county is held not liable for the improper treatment of a patient in a county hospital. Sherbourne v. Yuba County, 21 Cal. 112, 81 Am. Dec. 151.

Somewhat akin to these cases is the decision in Clark v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 48 Kan. 654, to the effect that a railroad company is not liable for alleged negligence of its local surgeon in delaying the amputation of an injured limb of an employé, where it did not appear that the company was under any legal obligation to provide medical or surgical aid for him.

The liability of a physician for negligence, in case of gratuitous services, is considered in Du Bois v. Decker (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 429, and note.

That a county which employs physicians to attend poor persons is not liable for his negligence in treatment of them is decided in Summers v. Daviess County Comrs. 108 Ind. 232, 53 Am. Rep. 512.

But this decision is based, like those about city hospitals, on the broad ground that public corporations are not responsible for the negligence of their officers in the exercise of governmental powers, and therefore has little bearing on the present question of liability of charitable institutions.

A school district is held in Pennsylvania to be merely a public agency in the administration of the great public charity of education, and therefore not liable for the negligence of its officers, agents, or employes. Ford v. School Dist. of Kendall Borough (Pa.) 1 L. R. A. 607; but this case, although it considers the charitable nature of the enterprise, is based chiefly on the ground of the public character of the corporation, and recites an exception to the doctrine in respect to highways.

A corporation called the fire insurance patrol and supported by voluntary contributions of insurance companies is held in Fire Ins. Patrol of Philadelphia v. Boyd (Pa.) 1 L. R. A. 417, to be a charitable corporation, which is not liable for negligence of its employes in throwing bundles from a burning building, whereby a person on a sidewalk is injured.

But a somewhat similar corporation in Massachusetts, which is organized under a statute giving it power to levy assessments on insurance companies, and giving such companies each a representation and right to vote at the annual meeting of the corporation, is held to be a private corporation and not a public charity, and therefore to be liable for the negligence of its servants in driving through the streets. Newcomb v. Boston Protective Department (Mass.) 6 L. R. A. 778.

The court distinguishes this case from that of Fire Ins. Patrol of Philadelphia v. Boyd, on the ground that in the latter membership was open to everybody, and the expenses were wholly paid by voluntary contribution. This case, however, does not in any way discredit the other Massachusetts cases above cited, but denies the exemption on the ground merely that the corporation is not a charity.

Another Massachusetts case holds the town liable for injuries resulting from negligence in conducting a poor farm, where it is managed not only to support its paupers but also to board paupers of other towns for pay, and to board persons employed on the highways, while the managers were also overseers of highways and selectmen, and the surplus income is used for general town purposes. Neff v. Wellealey (Mass.) 2 L. R. A. 600.

This case is also based on the law applicable to towns rather than that governing charities.

So in Maxmillan v. New York, 62 N. Y. 160, 20 Am. Rep. 463, a city was held not liable for negligence of commissioners of public charity, or of other subordinates, where such commissioners were appointed by the mayor and paid from the city treasury, but were really officers of the state government regulated by state statute. This decision also turns on the law applicable to public corporations, and not that concerning charities.

The claim that a cemetery corporation was a charity within the law exempting a charity from liability for negligence, was made in a Massachusetts case, in which plaintiff claimed damages for burying a stranger in his lot, but the court held that the corporation was not a charity within this rule, although it actually applied its funds to charity to a considerable extent. Donnelly v. Boston Catholic Cemetery Asso. 146 Mass. 163.

A congregational church corporation was held liable for negligence in respect to the condition of a passageway by which a person attending a public meeting at that church in the evening was injured, but nothing was said in the case about an exemption from liability on the ground that the corporation was a charity. Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. of Jamaica Plains, 129 Mass. 367, 37 Am. Rep. 366.

The rule that a municipal corporation is not liable for negligence of its fire department, which is the subject of a note to Dodge v. Granger (R. I.) 15 L. R. A. 781, is held applicable also to the acts of a volunteer association of firemen. Torbush v. Norwich, 38 Conn. 225, 9 Am. Rep. 365.

Excluding from consideration the cases incidentally mentioned above, which decide as to the liability of municipal corporations, it will be seen that the clear weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine of the main case, which exempts a charitable institution from liability for negligence of officers or agents.

B. A. R.

L. 98, 119; Foreman v. Canterbury, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 214; Ruck v. Williams, 8 Hurlst. & N. 321; Gibbs v. Liverpool Docks Trustees, Id. 164.

As those American cases were based upon neither common law nor statute law but upon English precedents, and as those English precedents were overruled, therefore the American decisions are not entitled to much if any weight.

Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675, holds that charitable organizations are liable for the torts of their servants and disapproves of the Massachusetts cases.

Where a duty not discretionary is imposed upon a municipality it is liable for the tort of its servant in the performance of that duty.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 752; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 698.

If it is shown that the defendant is a public corporation, then it is not liable for tort. If, on the other hand, it is shown that it is a private corporation, it is liable.

A public corporation is one which has for its object the municipal government of a portion of the people (e. g. a city or a county), or which is founded for other public, although they be political purposes, and which belongs wholly to the government.

1 Minor, Inst. 8d ed. *508.

The main distinction between public and private corporations is, that over the former the legislature, as the trustee or guardian of the public interest, has the exclusive and unrestrained control. Private corporations, on the other hand, are created by an act of the legislature, which, in connection with its acceptance, is regarded as a compact, and one which, so long as the body corporate faithfully observes, the legislature is constitutionally restrained from impairing, etc.

Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. 9th ed. § 81.

Private corporations are created for private, as distinguished from purely public purposes, and they are not, in contemplation of law, public because it may have been supposed by the legislature that their establishment would promote, either directly or consequentially, the public interest. They cannot be compelled to accept a charter or incorporating act. The assent of the corporation is necessary to make the incorporating statute operative, etc.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 29, 80.

The Louisville Industrial School of Reform is not a public corporation, for as said by Minor, Angell & Ames, and Dillon, all its interests and property must belong exclusively to the government, and it must be entirely controlled by the government. The school of reform may hold, purchase, and convey real estate. It owns the property, not the state. Again, having received its charter, it controls and governs itself.

Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495.

Mr. T. L. Burnett for appellee.

Haselrigg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, the Louisville Industrial School of Reform, was created a body corporate by an Act of the General Assembly in 1854, under the name of the Louisville House of Refuge. Its object and business was to take charge of such youths as might be committed to it, and care for their moral and physical training and education. It was a charity, and its purpose was reformation by training its inmates to habits of industry, and by instilling into their minds the principles of right living, to the end that they might become useful citizens of the state, rather than fill its prisons and poor-houses. The incorporators and their successors are under the control and oversight of the legislature, and are mere instrumentalities of the commonwealth. The state interposed in behalf of neglected and abandoned children within its confines in its capacity of parens patriæ, and assumed the guardianship of such children as were committed to the institution. It was an agency of the state, and maintained by taxation and state aid. The appellant, a boy of ten years of age, was committed to the care, control, and restraint of the institution, and his petition, brought by his next friend, Thomas, alleges that without fault on his part one of the servants and employes of the appellee, and known by it to be incompetent and unfit for such service, struck and beat the appellant in such cruel and inhuman manner that he was caused great suffering in mind and body, and was permanently injured and damaged, etc. To this petition a general demurrer was sustained, and the petition dismissed. The correctness of this judgment is the question on this appeal, and, while it has not been determined directly, the general principles are well established. The functions of the institution are governmental. As said in Farnham v. Pierce, 141 Mass. 203, 55 Am. Rep. 452: "It is a provision by the commonwealth, as parens patriæ, for the custody and care of neglected children, and is intended only to supply to them the parental custody which they have lost." In Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495, it was held that an action does not lie against a state house of refuge for an assault on an inmate by an officer thereof. It is there said: "Youths, in whom the seeds of vice have already germinated, are placed there under proper restraint, so that the growth of crime may be arrested or eradicated in its incipency. Funds are contributed by individuals impelled by philanthropic motives, and donations are obtained from municipal and state treasuries. These are the funds of the institution, contributed by the managers, not for their own profit or benefit, but solely for the charitable purposes designated by its organic law. . . . Several of the most eminent judges in England expressed themselves with much emphasis in opposition to an allowance of damages out of a fund so held by fiduciary agents;" and the principle determined in a number of English cases, that "damages are to be paid out of the pocket of the wrongdoer, and not from the trust fund," was approved. It is contended that these cases followed the older decisions in England, and that the latter have been since overruled. Be this as it may, the principle announced seems entirely just and reasonable. If the funds of these institutions are to be diverted from their intended beneficent purposes by lawsuits and judgments for damages for negligent or malicious servants, their usefulness—indeed, their existence—will soon be a thing of the past.

The judgment dismissing the petition is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Emma ANDERSON, Admx., etc., of Fred Anderson, Deceased, Resp.,

CHICAGO, ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS & OMAHA R. CO., App.

(.....Wis.....)

1. Evidence that for a few days after an accident on a railroad trestle trains were run quite slowly and afterwards the former alleged dangerous speed was resumed is inadmissible on the question of negligence in the speed of the train.
2. One who, while intoxicated, walked out on a railroad trestle to a position of great peril and was there killed by a train cannot be held free from contributory negligence.
3. An implied license to cross a railroad trestle so narrow that there is no room on it outside of a passing train, and over which at least twelve regular trains cross each day besides special trains and switch engines, is contrary to public policy, especially where the statutes prohibit walking on railroad tracks, except along public roads.

(February 23, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ashland County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

This action was brought to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant on the 19th of November, 1892. It was alleged that, at the time mentioned, the said Fred Anderson was lawfully traveling along and crossing a portion of the track of the defendant which was used for several years, and down to the time of the accident, with defendant's knowledge and consent, for the purpose of a footway by foot travelers at or near the intersection of Sixteenth avenue west and Third street, in the corporate limits of the city of Ashland; that the defendant, by its servants, etc., carelessly and negligently caused one of its locomotives, with a tender and two passenger cars, to pass over and across said railway track and said traveled way at the rate of about thirty miles an hour, and negligently failed to give any signal by bell or whistle of its approach, so that the said Anderson was unaware of the approach of said engine and cars; and by reason of such fault and negligence of the defendant, while so traveling along said footway upon said railroad, without fault or negligence on his part, said Anderson was struck by said locomotive and killed. And the complaint contained other appropriate averments, and claimed damages in the sum of $5,000. The defendant admitted that Anderson was walking on its track at the time in question, and across one of its bridges, and was struck by a locomotive and train of cars of defendant, and killed, but denied all other material allegations of the complaint. At the trial before a jury, it was testified, in substance, by one Swanson, on the part of the plaintiff, that on the morning in question, about half past 6 o'clock, Anderson came to his house, and they went down town to see if there were any lumber boats in; that they went across the bridge to Swan Swanson's, on Second street, where they had some whisky and hot water to drink, and then went to the bay, and in about half an hour returned to Swanson's, where they had two more drinks of the same kind, talked together, and read a paper, and started for home; that they got another drink at the billiard hall,—straight whisky,—and went right out, thence up Fourteenth avenue, to the railroad, and then took the railroad track west. In going home they went the usual way, and crossed the trestle; "used it all the time. People crossed it most every hour,—men, women, and children. When we got to the trestle, I turned around to look behind, and I looked ahead. Did not see any train, nor hear any bell or whistle sounded, before we got on the trestle. We walked out on the trestle, and the bell was rung. I looked ahead, but did not see any locomotive, and I turned partly around to see if the train was coming on the Northern Pacific track. Saw no train there, and I turned around a little more: Looked behind me again. I did not see any train there. Turned clear back. I looked ahead, and saw the train coming about 200 feet from us. That is the first I saw of it. I said: 'Anderson, the train is coming. We will have to jump.' I leaned myself over the edge of the bridge, and hung onto the bridge. Anderson, as far as I could see, turned sideways to try to get off, and one of his feet slipped, and he got between the ties.

Rylee (Ga.) 13 L. R. A. 634, in respect to an implied license to go upon a railroad track. Also Chenery v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Mass.) 23 L. R. A. 575.

Then he went down, and did not get away from that place before the train struck him. I did not turn and run back, because I thought I hadn't time. He was dead when I next saw him. The train was the 'Bayfield Scoot.' I knew that train came along every morning about a quarter to ten o'clock. When on the railroad track, did not think of the train. Thought it had got to the depot already. Anderson was walking on the left hand, and I on the right. I think he had hold of my arm. Was about thirty-three feet on the bridge when I heard the bell ring. It is not a fact that Anderson and I were quite full that morning. He was not staggering as he went along with me. He had hold of my left arm. Sometimes, when walking together, he used to take hold of my arm, but not because he was drunk. We were friends. He lived on 16th avenue, in sight of this trestle, near 5th or 6th street. I lived on 4th street, only a short distance from the west end of the trestle. I was not so drunk but what I knew what I was about, and Anderson was not. He was able to walk. The train was running as it usually did. Cannot tell how many miles an hour.

Considerable evidence was given to the effect that it was a common occurrence for everybody to travel over this trestle every day, and all classes of people, at the time of the accident, and had been for some four years; that the ordinary rate of speed in passing over it was about thirty to thirty-five miles an hour. The plaintiff was allowed, against objections of the defendant, to show by one Weed, and also by one Oleson, that, for two or three days or so after the accident, the train ran very slowly over the trestle, and that in a couple of weeks they ran at their former rate of speed again. There was no planking or footway on this bridge; simply the open trestle. They had to step from tie to tie in crossing it. It was 120 feet long, and Anderson was killed 33 feet from the east end, on the east side of Fifteenth avenue, as he and Swanson were going towards the train approaching from the west. The ravine at the deepest point was 23 feet deep. There was another like trestle over a deep ravine to the west, 189 feet long, and the interval between the two was 139 feet—both on the main track or line of defendant, and used by pedestrians to about the same extent. Going west from the east end of the first trestle, there is a curve in the track to the right, and both are embraced in the curve. The view from the east to the westward along the track was somewhat obstructed by a bank of earth and a building. But it was shown that a person in an engine cab, coming from the west, could see persons on the trestle work at the point where Anderson was struck for a distance of 456 feet. That the whole of the man and the entire track could be seen, and the ties distinguished. There was a plank crossing at the east end of the first trestle, and one could go from there down to Third street with a wagon. That Fifteenth avenue, within the limits of which Anderson was struck, had never been opened, nor had Sixteenth, Seventeenth, Eighteenth, and Nineteenth avenues to the westward. The train, at the time of the accident, had not passed all the traveled streets of Ashland. The railroad crossed the avenue nearly at a right angle, and the streets were at right angles with the avenues. The plaintiff having rested, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that there was not sufficient proof of negligence on the part of the defendant, and that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence, but the motion was denied. It was testified on behalf of the defendant, among other things, by the engineer, that the train, at the time in question, was running along at the rate of eight or ten miles an hour. That the first he saw of Anderson was when he was within six or eight feet of him. That he could not see him before from the west end of the trestle, on account of the curve and the engine being in the way, but could see from the east end of the trestle westward 350 feet. That the first information he had that there was anything on the track was when the fireman gave the signal to stop and apply the brakes; and, just about the time he had applied the brakes, the fireman said, "Man on the track!" and then he reversed the engine, and blew the whistle, and reached for the sand lever, and then he saw the man on the track six or eight feet ahead. That he was somewhere between the two trestles, about the middle, when the fireman gave the signal to stop. Made a good stop. Could stop that train at about 150 to 200 feet from getting the signal, when going at the rate of six or eight miles an hour; at twenty miles an hour, about 400 feet; and at thirty-five miles, between 700 and 800 feet. There was testimony on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that the train might have been stopped in a shorter distance. The fireman testified, among other things, that the rate of speed was five or six miles an hour, and he was ringing the bell all the time. When he first saw the men, it was difficult to tell where they appeared to be, on account of the curve. First discovered they were on the trestle when he gave the signal to stop. Was then in view of the whole bridge. It was admitted that no warning had been put up to keep the public off of the bridge, and it was shown that no gates had been put up to keep people from crossing; that there were gates on some streets west of the depot towards the junction. The evidence tended to show that the running time, between Ashland and the junction was fifteen minutes, and the distance four and three tenths miles. The conductor testified, among other things, that on this occasion they were running at about the usual rate of speed after they left the switch where they bring lumber onto the track from the Bay Front line, which it was admitted was 2,250 feet west of the east end of the trestle on which Anderson was killed; and from the plat in evidence it appeared to be somewhat further than that distance from Ashland station to where Anderson was struck. Evidence was given tending to show that, at the time, Anderson was drunk, so that he staggered; and, in rebuttal, to show that he was not drunk; that he had a swaggering gait; that he and Swanson were intimate friends, and sometimes walked arm in arm. Defendant asked the court to direct a verdict in its favor, on the same grounds that it had moved for a nonsuit, but this was denied. The court charged the jury that: "The evidence of the plaintiff tends to show that the track or trestle had been dedicated to the public at the point where the deceased lost his life, and that there had been no objection to such use made by the defendant. That, if you find that the track at such point had been so dedicated, it was the duty of the defendant to keep a careful lookout when approaching said point with the train, and while crossing the same, and to keep its train, as far as practicable, under reasonable control, so that there would not be any injury done to any person crossing which might be prevented by due caution on the part of the defendant. That it was the duty of the engineer and fireman, if you find that this point was used by the public as alleged, to keep a careful outlook to avoid injury to any person crossing the said point which could be prevented by said outlook. The fact, if it be a fact, that Anderson was under the influence of intoxicating liquors did not relieve the defendant in any particular, but could only be considered for the purpose of showing that there was contributory negligence on the part of the deceased; for the defendant, if there were no contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, would be liable even if the deceased were intoxicated at the time he lost his life, the same as it would be if he were sober." The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000, and also that, at the time of the accident, the train was running seventeen miles per hour.

Messrs. Tompkins & Merrill and S. L. Perrin, for appellant:

Both these men had lived near this bridge for years, knew that trains were continually and frequently crossing the same, and that this particular train was due about this time. It was negligence upon their part not to take immediate steps to put themselves in a place of safety as soon as they heard the alarm of the bell.

Deceased knew that the train was then due, that the bridge was not constructed for use as a footway, and that it was not necessary to use it as such; he was clearly guilty of some want of ordinary care in going where he did at that time. He was cognizant of the usual rate of speed of the train and of the dangers incident to the use of the bridge as a footway.

The court allowed the plaintiff to introduce evidence that the trains were run slower immediately after the accident than before. This is certainly error.

Lang v. Sanger, 76 Wis. 71; Baird v. Daly, 68 N. Y. 547; Castello v. Landwehr, 28 Wis. 524.

Messrs. John F. Dufur and Cate, Jones & Sanborn for respondent.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiff's contention was that the defendant had been guilty of negligence in running its train at a dangerous and unlawful rate of speed, and in not keeping a proper outlook, and for failure to give timely warning of the approach of the train. It was error, we think, to admit the testimony of the witnesses Weed and Oleson to the effect that for a few days after the accident, the defendant ran its trains over the trestle quite slowly, and afterwards ran them at its former alleged dangerous rate of speed, of 30 or 35 miles an hour. The tendency of the testimony was to show, by implied admission, that the defendant habitually, down to the time of the accident, had been guilty of negligence, in not using reasonable and ordinary care towards those who crossed the trestle, and towards the plaintiff's intestate as well; that the conduct of the defendant after the accident was an implied admission of fault on its part, and it soon after, in disregard of its alleged duties, returned to its former dangerous, if not reckless, course of conduct. The question is the same in principle as in the case where an injury has been caused by defective machinery or an insufficient highway, and repairs have been made immediately or soon thereafter. A party may have exercised all the care which the law required, and yet, after an accident, he may think it well to use additional caution or safeguards: and it is unjust to hold that the fact that he had done so is an admission of previous negligence, or that his return to previous methods evinced a disposition to persist in a negligent and dangerous course of conduct. Castello v. Landwehr, 28 Wis. 530; Lang v. Sanger, 76 Wis. 75; Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 80 Minn. 485; Columbia & P. S. R. Co. v. Hawthorne, 144 U. S. 202, 36 L. ed. 405, 406; Shinners v. Proprietors of Locks & Canals, 154 Mass. 168, 12 L. R. A. 554.

2. The question whether a party injured or killed on the track was drunk at the time, and whether his being drunk was contributory negligence, is, as a rule, a question of fact for the jury. The court stated to the jury that the fact, if it was a fact, that the plaintiff's intestate was under the influence of intoxicating liquors at the time he lost his life, "did not relieve the defendant in any particular, but could only be considered for the purpose of showing that there was contributory negligence on his part," adding: "For the defendant, if there were no contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, would be liable even if the deceased were intoxicated at the time he lost his life." This instruction, as given, is somewhat obscure and contradictory, and fails to express the idea the court probably intended to convey. The instruction left the jury to infer that, although drunk when he went into this position of great danger, as detailed in the evidence, the defendant might be liable "the same as it would be if he were sober." The instruction was not called for by the facts, and was, we think, misleading. We do not think that the plaintiff's intestate can be held free from contributory negligence if he was intoxicated, and in that condition walked out upon the trestle to a position of great peril to life or limb, and, in attempting to cross it, lost his life at the time and under circumstances given in evidence, and about which there is really no dispute. The instruction left it to the jury to conclude that there could be a recovery, although he was drunk at the time, and it was therefore misleading and erroneous, and it was erroneous in leaving the jury to conclude that there could be any recovery at all.

3. Walking upon the track of a railway has been held in many cases to be negligence per se, and sufficient to defeat a recovery in case of injury to the party by a passing train (Moore v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 99 Pa. 801, 44 Am. Rep. 106; Breenahan v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 49 Mich. 410; McClaren v. Indianapolis & V. R. Co. 83 Ind. 319; Harty v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 42 N. Y. 468; Tennenbrock v. Southern Pacific Coast R. Co. 59 Cal. 269; Yarnall v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 75 Mo. 575); but in general it is held that the question as to such an act, in the event of any injury, is one proper to go to the jury. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 211; Townley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 53 Wis. 626; Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 56 Wis. 274. Courts universally characterize such an act as dangerous, and "a civil wrong of an aggravated nature, as it endangers not only the trespasser, but all who are passing and being carried over the road." Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375, 84 Am. Dec. 457. The use of a railroad is exclusively for its owners, or those acting under its authority, and the company is not bound to the exercise of any active duty of care or diligence towards mere trespassers on its track, to keep a lookout to discover or protect them from injury, except that, when discovered in a position of danger or peril, it is its duty to use all reasonable and proper effort to save and protect them from the probable consequences of their indiscretion or negligence. The company is also bound to provide for a careful outlook, in the direction in which a train is moving, in places where people, and especially children, are likely to be on the track, as in and about station grounds, depots, and regular crossings. This rule has been laid down in Townley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 53 Wis. 626, and Whalen v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 75 Wis. 654, and other cases; but its limit is best understood in view of the character of the places where the injuries in such cases occurred, that is to say, such as are above indicated. The rule, manifestly, has no application to the main track of the company in other places; for, as to them, it is not bound to act upon the assumption that the public or way-farers will trespass upon its rights. But after discovery that a party is on its track, and in a position of danger, it is bound to the exercise of reasonable and appropriate care to prevent his injury even though wrongfully on its track, and to take as prompt and active measures as possible, if the person is helpless or unconscious or unable to escape. It has frequently been held in this and other states that where the grounds of a railway are used by pedestrians for a considerable time without objection, or with acquiescence on the part of the company, a pedestrian crossing over the same thereby becomes a licensee, and is no longer to be considered as a mere trespasser, acting at his peril, and that it is the duty of the company to exercise increased prudence and caution in operating its road at such point, and to keep a reasonably vigilant lookout to prevent injury or accident to those so crossing its grounds. Townley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 53 Wis. 626; Whalen v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 75 Wis. 656; Davis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 58 Wis. 646, 46 Am. Rep. 667; Delaney v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 53 Wis. 67; Johnson v. Lake Superior Terminal & Transfer R. Co. 86 Wis. 64.

In all these cases the injury occurred at the station or on the depot grounds or yard where parties would naturally resort and cross over the same, and where the agents and servants of the company could exercise a proper degree of care and watchfulness under the circumstances; but we have not met with any case, in which the point was necessary to the decision, where it has been held that a license can be implied from such acts of frequent use by pedestrians or wayfarers of the main track or bridges or trestles distant from such places as a pathway for travel, though we find that in other states the rule of implied license has been applied to parties frequently crossing the track at particular points, other than regular crossings. In the case of Hooker v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 76 Wis. 542, it was reasonably clear, and was so found, that the company was guilty of negligence that caused the accident; and it appeared that "from a point 1,168 feet north of the bridge on the west side of the track, at the height of an engine cab, the whole track could have been plainly seen southward through the bridge, and to Main street beyond, without any obstruction whatever." The case was rightly decided, and whether the injured party was a licensee or not was not material or necessary to sustain the judgment. In the Davis Case, 58 Wis. 646, 46 Am. Rep. 667, the party injured was walking between the main track and a side track, across a public street, when he was injured by the explosion of the boiler of a locomotive that had been left unattended on a side track. In the case of Mason v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 27 Kan. 83, 41 Am. Rep. 405, where the company had constructed a trestle or bridge over a creek and street on the plat of a city, and where the street had not been graded or improved, with a span of 160 feet over a stream of 65 feet wide, and 80 feet above the water, and there were no railings to the trestle or bridge, and no foot planks on it, and the only way of crossing was by stepping from tie to tie, and the railway company was constantly using the track for the operation of its engines and cars, it was held that, in an action by a person injured while crossing the bridge by a collision with a hand-car, no license could be implied from the custom of foot passengers to cross over the bridge, and evidence to show such user was held to have been properly stricken out. In Tennenbrock v. Southern Pacific Coast R. Co., 59 Cal. 269, in a similar case, it was held that one injured while walking over the bridge or trestle by a train was guilty of contributory negligence. In the present case the defendant company had done nothing to invite or induce the public to use this trestle for a footway. It was on the main track, over which at least twelve regular trains crossed each day, and there were occasionally special trains, and trains and switch engines besides passed over it from the Bay Front track to bring lumber upon the main line. It was impossible to meet or have a train pass one on the trestle without almost certain death, or the greatest possible injury to the pedestrian. It was not planked over in any part, and was so narrow as to leave no room on it outside of a passing train, and was so built as rather to repel than induce or invite foot travel over it. If the deceased was intoxicated, that was his own fault; and, if not, there was still less excuse for his being on the trestle. It did not become any the less dangerous on account of the frequency of its use, and we think that it would be contrary to sound public policy and a due regard to the safety of passengers over the road and operatives to hold that there can be any implied license to use the track along or between the rails or over trestles or other bridges as a way for foot travel. But the statute of the state has declared the public policy of the state upon this subject beyond cavil or dispute. It is provided by Rev. Stat., § 1811, that "it shall not be lawful for any person, other than those connected with or employed upon the railroad, to walk along the track or tracks of any railroad, except when the same shall be laid along public roads or streets; provided, that this section shall not be construed to prevent any person from driving across any such roads from one part of his own land to another." "This legislation is justified," it was held in McDonald v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 75 Wis. 128, in construing the previous clause of the same section, as "not only being for the protection of the lives and property of those owning and engaged in the operation of the railroad, but also for the protection of the lives of those traveling upon it;" and a violation of the act was held to be contributory negligence. The consequence is that the plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser and unlawfully upon the trestle bridge at the time he came to his death. There could be no license that would be of any avail to allow him or others to walk over and along the track upon this bridge. The law forbids such use of the track, and makes the alleged implied license relied on nugatory, and of no avail. Any other conclusion would entirely defeat the manifest purpose of the statute, and render it wholly inoperative. The company was only bound to exercise the care and caution towards the deceased that they are required to exercise in the case of a trespasser, after it has been discovered that he is on the track, and in a position of probable or actual peril. It follows from these views that the instructions of the circuit court in respect to the right of the plaintiff's intestate to cross the trestle bridge, and the duty of the defendant towards him while crossing, were erroneous. Upon the case as made by the plaintiff, we think that the plaintiff's intestate, at the time he was killed, was guilty of negligence contributing to the result. Comment on the facts is unnecessary. They speak for themselves. The evidence on the subject of contributory negligence is clear and decisive. For these reasons the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

Orton, Ch. J., dissenting:

The undersigned respectfully dissents from the decision or intimation in this case that a person walking along a railroad track, and injured by a passing train, cannot set up and prove an implied license of the company for his walking in such a place, except where the track shall be laid along a public road or street. The Statute (Rev. Stat. § 1811) which makes it unlawful for any person to walk along the track of any railroad has been in force since 1872, and yet there have been in this court numerous cases since that time, in which it is held that, notwithstanding that statute, a person so injured may set up an implied license of the company to show that he was not a trespasser. The last case in which it has been so held was that of Johnson v. Lake Superior Terminal & Transfer R. Co., 86 Wis. 64. The opinion was written by the same learned justice. The person injured was walking along the center of a switching track when injured by the train, the most dangerous track of the railroad. The question of the plaintiff's implied license to walk there was submitted to and found by the jury, and this was approved by this court. To now hold otherwise will overrule a great many cases of this court, which ought to stand protected by the maxim, "stare decisis et non quieta movere."

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

William ELLIOTT
v.
NEWPORT STREET R. CO.

(.....R. I.....)

1. A trolley railway company should foresee the possible danger to which passengers on the foot-boards of its cars may be exposed by slight movement of the body, when trolley poles are placed from ten to twelve inches from the edge of the foot-board.
2. A passenger is not bound to anticipate the danger and be on the lookout for trolley poles while riding with permission on the foot-board of a street-car, unless he has knowledge of the proximity of such poles to the track.
3. It is not prima facie the fault of a passenger where he is injured by riding on the foot-board of a trolley car.

(November 8, 1893.)

APPPLICATION by plaintiff for a new trial, after verdict in favor of defendant, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Patrick J. Galvin and Charles Acton Ives, for plaintiff, in support of the motion:

It is not per se negligence for passengers to ride upon the platform or foot-board of crowded street-cars or railway cars, and when in such position even voluntarily, the care required of the passenger is only increased to the extent of the obvious, and naturally to be expected dangers connected with the position; but if the position be taken with the consent or invitation expressed or implied of the carrier, the normal duty of the carrier is in no way abated.

Bowie v. Greenville Street R. Co. 69 Miss. 196; Germantown Pass. R. Co. v. Walling, 97 Pa. 55, 39 Am. Rep. 796; Topeka City R. Co. v. Higgs, 38 Kan. 875; City R. Co. v. Lee, 50 N. J. L. 435; Spoooner v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 54 N. Y. 230, 18 Am. Rep. 570; Fleck v. Union R. Co. 134 Mass. 480; Geitz v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 72 Wis. 307; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 135, 93 Am. Dec. 495; West Philadelphia Pass R. Co. v. Gallagher, 108 Pa. 524; Lehr v. Steinway & H. P. R. Co. 118 N. Y. 556.

It is not even negligence per se for passengers to board or leave moving cars, and when they do so the question of contributory negligence is in most cases for the jury.

Murphy v. Union R. Co. 118 Mass. 228; Spoooner v. Brooklyn City R. Co. supra; Noian v. Brooklyn C. & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 73, 41 Am. Rep. 345; Lehr v. Steinway & H. P. R. and Fleck v. Union R. Co. supra. See also Booth, Street Railway Law, §§ 836, 837, and cases there cited.

The maintenance of a line of poles by the carrier close to its car tracks is not one of the obvious and naturally to be expected dangers against which a passenger standing on the platform of, boarding, or alighting from a moving car is bound to protect himself.

See North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 275, and cases there cited.

In Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co., supra, a verdict was sustained against the carrier for injuries sustained by a passenger who was driven against a cart by a horse-car of the defendant, on the steps of which the passenger was by the implied permission of the conductor, the car being crowded.

In Spoooner v. Brooklyn City R. Co. supra, a passenger was standing upon the foot-board along the side of a sleigh of the defendant and was in precisely the position and under almost the precise circumstances of the plaintiff in this case, he was injured by the sleigh running close to a passing vehicle for which he was not looking out and a direction of nonsuit was reversed.

Messrs. Darius Baker, David S. Baker, Jr., and William C. Baker for defendant, contra.

Matteson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by defendant's negligence. The case was tried at the March term of the supreme court for Newport county. When the testimony on the part of the plaintiff had been submitted to the jury, the court directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff thereupon excepted to the direction, and filed this petition for a new trial. The testimony shows that the plaintiff was injured September 1, 1892, while riding on one of the defendant's electric cars in Newport. The facts attending the injury were these: The plaintiff boarded the car a few minutes past 8 o'clock in the evening, at the foot of Toura street, on Spring street, with the intention of riding to Morton Park, in the southern part of the city. The car was an open one, with seats running crosswise, and with steps or foot-boards on each side lengthwise of the car. This car had in tow another car. All the seats in both cars, and also the platforms, were filled with passengers, and passengers were standing on the foot-boards. The plaintiff took a position on the foot-board of the first car, on the left hand or easterly side of the car as it was going south, between the second and third seats from the rear end of the car, standing with his face turned towards the opposite side of the car, and holding onto the two stanchions supporting the roof of the car on either side of him. Instead of standing on the foot-board,

NOTE.—As to the difference in the care required of passengers on railroad and street-cars, see the decisions as to how far placing the arm on the window sill is negligence in the respective classes of cases collected in the note to Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Scott (Va.) 16 L. R. A. 91.

the plaintiff might have stood, if he had seen fit, between the seats inside of the car. Shortly after the car had started, while the plaintiff was reaching for his money to pay his fare, he was thrown from the car by coming in contact with a trolley pole, fell to the ground, and was run over by the wheels of the car in tow. No objection was made by the conductor to the plaintiff's standing on the foot-board, nor was he warned that there was any danger in doing so. Between Touro and Franklin streets the defendant's track ran close to the curbstone on the easterly side of Spring street. The cars were propelled by the trolley system. Between Touro and Franklin streets the poles supporting the trolley wire were located on the edge of the curbstone, so that the distance from the rail to the inner side of the pole varied from 26 to 28 inches. The distance between the inside of the poles and the outer edge of the foot-board of a passing car varied from 10 to 12 inches; the distance in the case of the pole by which it is alleged the plaintiff was struck being 10½ inches. The plaintiff did not know of the location of the pole at the point where he was injured. He did not notice any poles from the time he got onto the car until he was struck, and could not have seen them, in the position in which he stood, because they were behind him. He had never ridden over that part of the defendant's road prior to the accident, and was familiar with the street only as he had occasionally driven through it. From the point where the plaintiff got onto the car, to the point where he was thrown off, the car had passed eight poles, that by which the plaintiff was struck being the ninth.

The question raised by the plaintiff's exception is whether, on these facts, the court was justified in directing a verdict for the defendant. To have warranted the direction it must have clearly appeared,—so clearly that the court could say as a matter of law,—either that the defendant was not negligent, or that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident. We do not think that either of these propositions was sufficiently clear to warrant the court in taking the case from the jury, and directing a verdict for the defendant. Common carriers of passengers are required to do all that human care, vigilance, and foresight reasonably can, in view of the character and mode of conveyance adopted, to prevent accident to passengers. Tuller v. Talbot, 28 Ill. 357, 76 Am. Dec. 695; Meier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 64 Pa. 225, 8 Am. Rep. 581; Topeka City R. Co. v. Higgs, 38 Kan. 875; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 468, 486, 14 L. ed. 502, 509. It is a matter of common knowledge that railway companies daily undertake to carry, as did the defendant on the occasion in question, passengers greatly in excess of the seating capacity of their cars; that they stop their cars and take on passengers so long as there is standing room on platforms or foot-boards, and collect fares from those on platforms or foot-boards as well as from those within the cars. Ought not the defendant, in view of the rule prescribing the duty of carriers of passengers to have foreseen the possible danger to which passengers on the foot-boards of its cars might be exposed by a slight turn of the body sidewise, or by a slight inclination of it backward, in consequence of the proximity of its track to its trolley pole at the point where the plaintiff was injured? We think so. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 275; Topeka City R. Co. v. Higgs, supra; Gray v. Rochester City & B. R. Co. 61 Hun, 212; Lehr v. Steinway & H. P. R. Co. 118 N. Y. 558.

But the question which has been chiefly argued is whether, on the facts recited, it sufficiently appeared that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence to justify the direction of the court. The defendant concedes that it is not negligence in se for a passenger to ride on the foot-board of an open car, but contends that, as the outside of a car is obviously more dangerous than the inside, it is incumbent on any one who rides there to exercise care commensurate with the danger. This proposition is doubtless correct. But we do not assent to the defendant's further contention that, if the passenger is injured while riding on the foot-board, it is prima facie his own fault. Undoubtedly, by the law of this state, the burden is on him who sues for an injury to show that he was in the exercise of due care, and the question whether he was in the exercise of due care is to be considered with reference to the fact that he was riding in a dangerous situation. But the question of contributory negligence is generally for the jury, the exceptions being where the facts are not controverted, or it clearly appears what course a person of ordinary prudence would pursue, or where the standard of duty is fixed, or the negligence is clearly defined and palpable. Clarke v. Rhode Island Electric Lighting Co. 16 R. I. 463, 465; Chaffee v. Old Colony R. Co. 17 R. I. 658, 668. A passenger who rides on the foot-board of a car necessarily takes on himself the duty of looking out for and protecting himself against the usual and obvious perils of riding there,—such, for instance, as injury from passing vehicles, or by being thrown off by the swaying or jolting of the car; assuming, of course, proper management of the car, and proper construction and condition of the road. We do not think, however, that the danger of being hit by a trolley pole is such a peril as a passenger whom the railway company has undertaken to carry on the foot-board of its car is bound to anticipate and be on the lookout for, unless, indeed, it appear that the passenger had knowledge of the close proximity of the track to the trolley pole. He has a right to assume that the railway company has performed its duty in so constructing its road that its passengers, even on the foot-boards of its cars, riding there by its permission, shall not be exposed to injury by the unsafe construction of its road. City R. Co. v. Lee, 50 N. J. L. 435, 439. The testimony does not show that the plaintiff knew of the close proximity of the defendant's track to its trolley poles. Moreover, the accident occurred in the evening, when, on account of the darkness, the danger of being struck by the pole would not be so apparent as in the daytime. Nor does the testimony show that the posture of the plaintiff on the foot-board was an unusual one, or any movement of his which would naturally expose him to danger. The defendant's counsel argues that it is a necessary inference from the fact that he was struck that he was leaning backward at a considerable angle. The plaintiff's testimony was that he was in the act of taking his fare out of his pocket. The defendant's counsel, in argument, stated that the plaintiff illustrated his testimony by raising his arm as though to take his money out of his vest-pocket. If this be so, the plaintiff's elbow, as he stood with his back to the trolley poles, would naturally project several inches beyond the line of his body, and a slight inclination would suffice to bring it into contact with a pole only ten and a half inches from the edge of the foot-board. The fact that the plaintiff had already safely passed eight poles gives probability to the theory that the accident was due to the lifting of his arm in the manner stated.

Plaintiff's petition for a new trial granted.

SINGER MANUFACTURING CO., Plf.
in Err.,

v.

Charles R. FLEMING.

- *1. The act to provide for the better protection of the earnings of laborers, servants, and other employes of corporations, firms, or individuals engaged in interstate business, (Laws 1889, chap. 25), is not in conflict with the constitution of Nebraska, either as being broader than its title or as being prohibited class legislation.
2. Nor does the act seek to impose a penalty for the benefit of an individual. The recovery provided for in the act of the debt, costs, expenses, and attorney's fee is simply a recovery of compensatory damages, and not a penalty.
3. Whether the act is valid in so far as it makes its violation a crime is not decided; that portion of the act not being so connected with the rest as to affect the validity of the whole act.
4. Nor is the act in conflict with section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, requiring that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state.
5. A foreign corporation having a place of business in Nebraska, which institutes, in another state, attachment proceedings, and seizes the earnings of a citizen of Nebraska, exempt under the laws of Nebraska, is subject to the operation of the act; the contract out of which the proceedings arose having been made in Nebraska, and being here performable.
6. While under the laws and decisions of Iowa, a judgment in a proceeding by foreign attachment, whereby earnings of the defendant, a resident of Nebraska, earned in Nebraska and payable there, are seized and applied to the payment of the defendant's debt, must be treated as within the jurisdiction of the Iowa courts, still, the status of said earnings, for the purpose of determining the right to exemption, is Nebraska.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount of a debt, costs and expenses, which had been collected by defendant in violation of the Nebraska statutes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Breckenridge, Breckenridge & Crofoot, for plaintiff in error:

The penalties provided are clearly beyond the scope of, and not indicated by the title of the act, for no protection in any legitimate, lawful sense is given any debtor, by subjecting his creditor to penalties, forfeitures, and fines. White v. Lincoln, 5 Neb. 505; Ex parte Thomason, 16 Neb. 288; Messenger v. State, 25 Neb. 674; Toussain v. Omaha, 25 Neb. 817.

Legislative authority cannot reach the life, liberty, or property of the individual, except when he is convicted of crime.

Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 37, 29 Am. Rep. 356.

Exemplary or punitive damages are not allowed in this state, in an action for a tort; and attorneys' fees, which in such an action can be regarded only in the nature of punitive damages, ought not to be recovered.

Uppinghouse v. Mundel, 103 Ind. 238.

By the common-law rule of comity in force throughout the United States, each state extends to all duly incorporated foreign corporations a legal right to carry on business within its jurisdiction. It may therefore be said to be a general rule, that a corporation can legally carry on its business in the usual way, and by the usual agencies, wherever it may find it convenient and profitable to do so.

This action is for a tort, certainly not being founded upon contract, and the tort, if any was committed, was committed in Iowa. The proceeding was innocent and legal in Iowa, and if it is a tort here, it is tortious because the Nebraska statute has made it so.

In order to maintain an action of tort, founded upon an injury to person or property, and not upon a breach of contract, the act which is the cause of the injury and the foundation of the action must at least be actionable or punishable by the law of the place in which it is done, if not also by the law of the place in which redress is sought.

The legislative authority of every state must spend its force within the territorial limits of the state.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 151.

The money collected in Iowa in satisfaction of the judgment there, was not property in this state, for wherever the domicile of defendant in error may have been, when the court in Iowa, by its regular procedure, acquired the custody of the money, it was assuredly property in Iowa and subject to the control of the court, and the fact that it may have been due for wages earned in Nebraska makes no difference.

Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 346.

State laws have no extraterritorial validity. The moment a state attempts to lay its hands upon the rights of those whose domicile and whose affairs are beyond its boundaries, its acts are null.

Messrs. Kennedy, Gilbert & Anderson for defendant in error.

Irvine, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff in error is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey. It has a place of doing business styled a "general agency," at Denver, Colo. It has also agencies in Iowa and Nebraska, and does business in both of those states. The agents there report to the general agent at Denver. The defendant in error is a resident of Nebraska, the head of a family, and an employé of the Union Pacific Railway Company, whose lines extend into both Iowa and Nebraska. Fleming bought from the Singer Company a sewing machine upon credit. The agent of the Singer Company in Omaha, after some efforts to collect the bill, returned it to the general agent at Denver, who in turn sent it to the agent in Council Bluffs, Iowa. The agent at Council Bluffs brought an action in Pottawattamie county, Iowa, against Fleming, on behalf of the Singer Company proceeding by process of foreign attachment, and garnished the Union Pacific Railway Company. The result of this proceeding was that wages of Fleming, to the amount of $38.05, due him from the railroad company, were seized by the Iowa court, and appropriated to the payment of the judgment there rendered against Fleming. Fleming then instituted this action in Douglas county, Neb., under section 531c-531f of the Code of Civil Procedure to recover from the Singer Company the debt so garnished, with costs, expenses, and attorney's fees. The wages reached by garnishment were earned within sixty days prior to the commencement of the action in Iowa. Judgment was rendered in favor of Fleming in the district court of Douglas county in the sum of $95.55 and costs, from which the Singer Company prosecutes error. No question is raised as to the sufficiency of evidence to support a judgment for that amount, but the judgment is sought to be reversed upon three grounds: First, that the statute under which the action was brought is contrary to the constitution of Nebraska; second, that it conflicts with section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, requiring that full faith and credit shall be given to each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state; third, that, if the law be constitutional, it does not apply to foreign corporations.

The statute referred to is as follows: "That it be, and is hereby declared, unlawful for any creditor, or other holder of any evidence of debt, book account, or claim of any name or nature against any laborer, servant, clerk, or other employé of any corporation, firm, or individual, in this state, for the purpose below stated, to sell, assign, transfer, or by any means dispose of any such claim, book account, bill, or debt of any name or nature whatever, to any person or persons, firm, corporation, or institution, or to institute in this state, or elsewhere, or to prosecute any suit or action for any such claim or debt against any such laborer, servant, clerk, or employé by any process seeking to seize, attach, or garnish the wages of such person or persons earned within sixty days prior to the commencement of such proceeding for the purpose of avoiding the effect of the laws of the state of Nebraska concerning exemptions. That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person or persons to aid, assist, abet, or counsel a violation of section one of this Act for any purpose whatever. In any proceeding, civil or criminal, growing out of a breach of sections one or two of this Act, proof of the institution of a suit or service of garnishment summons by any persons, firm, or individual, in any court of any state or territory other than this state or in this state to seize by process of garnishment or otherwise, any of the wages of such person as defined in section one of this Act shall be deemed prima facie evidence of an evasion of the laws of the state of Nebraska and a breach of the provisions of this Act on the part of the creditor or resident in Nebraska causing the same to be done. Any persons, firm, company, corporation, or business institution guilty of a violation of sections one or two of this Act shall be liable to the party injured through such violation of this Act, for the amount of the debt sold, assigned, transferred, garnished, or sued upon, with all costs and expenses and a reasonable attorney's fee, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction in this state; and shall further be liable by prosecution to punishment by a fine not exceeding the sum of two hundred dollars and costs of prosecution."

1. Three arguments are made upon the proposition that the statute is in conflict with the constitution of Nebraska. In the first place, it is said that the act is broader than its title. The title is as follows: "An Act to Provide Better Protection for the Earnings of Laborers, Servants and Other Employés of Corporations, Firms, or Individuals Engaged in Interstate Business." We are somewhat at a loss to appreciate the argument based on this proposition. It seems to be the theory of counsel that that portion of the act which provides for the recovery of the debt, costs, expenses, and attorney's fee, and which enacts a penalty for the violation of the law, is not expressed in the title. These features are not distinctly expressed; but the title to the act need not amount to an analysis or complete abstract of its text. It is sufficient if the title, by general language, fairly expresses its subject matter. Where a bill has but one general object, it will be sufficient if the subject is fairly expressed in the title. People v. McCullum, 1 Neb. 182; State v. Ream, 16 Neb. 681. The title of this Act is comprehensive. Merely to declare the doing of certain acts unlawful would be nugatory, unless the act itself, or other provisions of the law, provided a redress for injuries inflicted by reason of its violation. Without the section providing a remedy, the act would not provide "for the better protection of the earnings" of the persons sought to be protected. Both a substantial enactment of law and a remedy for its violation are fairly included in the title, and the act would not be complete in the absence of either provision.

It is next urged that the act is unconstitutional because imposing a penalty which does not go to the school fund. The last section of the act undertakes to provide two remedies. One is that the person violating it shall be liable, by prosecution, to punishment by fine. It is not necessary to here consider whether that portion of the act is valid. If it is, the fine imposed is like all other fines in criminal cases, and is not subject to the objections urged. If it be not valid, the whole act is not, therefore, unconstitutional. Where a part of an act is void, and a part in its nature valid, the whole is not void unless it appears, from an examination of the act itself, that the invalid portion was designed as an inducement to pass the valid, so that the whole, taken together, will warrant the belief that the legislature would not have passed the valid portion alone. State v. Lancaster County Comrs. 6 Neb. 474; State v. Lancaster County Comrs. 17 Neb. 85; Trumble v. Trumble (Neb.) 55 N. W. Rep. 869. But counsel say the provision permitting the recovery not only of the debt, but of costs, expenses, and attorney's fees, is in the nature of a penalty; and we are cited, upon that subject, to Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 87, 29 Am. Rep. 356. In that case an act was held void because it sought to give, to the owner of livestock injured upon a railroad, double the value of his property. This double recovery was clearly in the nature of a penalty. It has no element of compensation, but, in the statute we are considering, the damages awarded are purely compensatory. Nothing is allowed by way of vindictive damages or as a penalty, but the injured party is made whole by being permitted to recover the amount of money wrongfully taken from him, together with the exact costs and expenses by him incurred, and a reasonable attorney's fee which is also an item of expense for which he should be compensated, and which, probably, would have been included as costs and expenses, even though not otherwise expressed. The law is for none of the reasons urged in conflict with the constitution of Nebraska.

2. Is the act in conflict with the Constitution of the United States? It is said, in support of this proposition, that the courts of Iowa have held that a nonresident of Iowa or a foreign corporation may have an attachment in that state against a nonresident upon precisely the same grounds, and upon the same conditions, as a resident. The case of Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co., 60 Iowa, 846, is cited as sustaining that contention. The case cited certainly goes that far; and that case, and later cases which might have been cited, carry the doctrine further, and go to the extent of holding that a citizen of Nebraska may sue another citizen of Nebraska in the courts of Iowa, and obtain jurisdiction by attaching and garnishing the wages earned by defendant in Nebraska, and there payable to him by a railroad company which happens to operate in both states; and that in such case the defendant, being a nonresident of Iowa, is not entitled to the benefits of the Iowa exemption laws, and that the Iowa courts will not, even upon principles of comity, give effect to the Nebraska exemption laws, and that by such a device the defendant is absolutely deprived of his exemptions under the law of either state. The question presented is whether the courts and the legislature of this state are required, in order to give full faith and credit to the judicial proceedings of Iowa, to sanction such a proceeding. We think not. The section of the Federal Constitution referred to requires, not only that full faith and credit shall be given to the judicial proceedings of another state, but also that full faith and credit shall be given to the public acts of such state. The laws of Nebraska make sixty days' wages of laborers, mechanics, and clerks, who are heads of families, exempt from attachment execution and garnishee proceedings. Where the wages are earned in Nebraska, and are there payable to the laborer residing there, Nebraska is the situs of the debt. Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19 Neb. 175; Mason v. Beebe, 44 Fed. Rep. 556. As pointed out in the case of Mason v. Beebe, last cited, there is a marked distinction between the situs of a chose in action for the purpose of jurisdiction and its situs for determining the rights of the parties thereto. The case of Mason v. Beebe contains a well-reasoned discussion of the whole subject by Judge Shiras. The opinion is too long to quote entire, and the whole of it is so closely applicable to the case at bar that we could not select one portion as more proper for citation than the rest. Suffice it to say that the case of Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co. is there discussed in extenso, its fallacies laid bare, and the monstrous injustice and disregard of the laws of other states which would result, from following the Mooney Case are there demonstrated. If the situs of the debt was Nebraska, and not Iowa, then it follows that no legislative or judicial interposition in Iowa could rightfully sustain the jurisdiction of Iowa courts in such a case. If the courts of Iowa should seek to prosecute a citizen of Nebraska who does not come within their jurisdiction, and to reach over into Nebraska, and take from this state the property of that citizen here located, can any one for a moment urge, or seriously consider, that our legislature and courts, in order to give full faith and credit to the judicial proceedings of Iowa, must stand idly by and countenance such a proceeding? Must we permit our laws to be nullified and evaded, in order to sustain the courts of another state in overreaching their jurisdiction, in refusing to exercise the comity elsewhere accorded sister states, and in seizing the property in Nebraska of citizens of Nebraska who have not brought themselves within the lawful reach of Iowa courts? To quote from the brief of the plaintiff in error a citation from Black on Constitutional Prohibitions: "The moment a state attempts to lay its hands upon the rights of those whose domiciles and affairs are beyond its boundaries, its acts are null." And to quote again from that brief: "Where, at the place of commission, the act is legally innocent, it cannot be elsewhere made a delict;" a principle which, if correct, must give rise to another principle,—that, where at the place of commission the act is legally wrong, it cannot be elsewhere made right. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in no wise militates against this view. In Green v. Van Buskirk, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 810, 18 L. ed. 600, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 189, 19 L. ed. 109, the decision, so far as it is applicable to this case, we think directly tends to support our view. In that case one Bates, a citizen of New York, owned certain iron safes in Chicago, upon which he gave a mortgage to Van Buskirk and others, which was executed and delivered in New York. The laws of Illinois required for the validity of a chattel mortgage, as against third persons, that it should be recorded, and the property delivered to the mortgagee. These conditions were not complied with. The laws of Illinois further permitted attachments against a nonresident debtor. A creditor of Bates sued by attachment in Illinois, and levied upon and sold the safes. Van Buskirk then sued this creditor in New York state, and the creditor pleaded in bar the attachment proceedings in Illinois. The New York courts held that the transaction was governed by the laws of New York, and the case was then taken by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, which held that the attaching creditor had been denied a privilege accorded him by the Constitution of the United States; that the property, to wit, the safes, were situated in Illinois; and that the Illinois law must govern them. That is precisely the position of the defendant in error here. His property which was seized was in Nebraska, and subject to the jurisdiction of our courts, and not those of Iowa.

In Cole v. Cunningham, 188 U. S. 107, 88 L. ed. 588, it was held that it was not in violation of the Constitution of the United States for a court in one state, in which proceedings have been begun to distribute the estate of an insolvent debtor among his creditors, to enjoin a creditor of the insolvent, a citizen of the same state, from proceeding to judgment and execution in a suit against the insolvent in another state by an attachment of his property which property the insolvent law of the state of the domicile of the parties required the debtor to convey to his assignee.

It is true that in Cole v. Cunningham there was a strong dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Miller, concurred in by Justices Field and Harlan; but the dissent there was upon the ground that the opinion of the majority was contrary to Green v. Van Buskirk, the status of the debt in Cole v. Cunningham, which it was sought to reach by attachment, being in the state where the attachment was levied, and not in the state of the residence of the parties, where the injunction was granted. So that, taking either the majority opinion or the dissenting opinion in Cole v. Cunningham, we think that the case lends force to the views we have expressed. Even the courts of Iowa have refused to apply to their own citizens the rules which they seek to enforce extraterritorially against the citizens of other states, and have restrained a citizen of Iowa from prosecuting a suit by attachment in Minnesota against another citizen of Iowa by garnishment reaching a debt due for wages earned in Iowa. Teager v. Landsley, 69 Iowa, 725. As said by Judge Shiras in Mason v. Beebe: "Is it consistent for the courts of Iowa to forbid, by injunction, its own citizens from suing in Illinois for the purpose of evading the exemption laws of Iowa, and at the same time entertain suits by citizens of Illinois brought here for the purpose of evading the exemption laws of Illinois?" If full faith and credit have, in these proceedings, not been given to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of another state, it is certainly not the Legislature or courts of Nebraska which have been in fault. The conclusion reached does not conflict with the decision in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Moore, 81 Neb. 639. It was there held that earnings so seized in Iowa could not be recovered from the garnishee, the Iowa courts having acquired jurisdiction so far as to require the garnishee to pay the money, and the judgment binding the parties to that extent. It is for that reason that a cause of action arose against the creditor for wrongful proceedings in evasion of our exemption laws.

Finally, it is urged that, if the law be constitutional, it cannot be made to apply to foreign corporations. It is stipulated in the bill of exceptions that the Singer Sewing-Machine Company was and has continued doing business in Nebraska. It is stipulated that the debt out of which the controversy arose was contracted in Nebraska. As said by this court in Turner v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 19 Neb. 241: "There is great force in the argument that the exemption existing where a debt is contracted is a vested right in rem, which follows the debt into any jurisdiction in which an action may be brought; that is, that the law in force when and where a debt is contracted should govern as to the rights of the creditor and debtor in that case." See, on this subject, Dorrington v. Myers, 11 Neb. 888; De Witt v. Wheeler & W. Sewing Mach. Co. 17 Neb. 583. It is only upon a principle of comity that a foreign corporation is permitted to here do business. When it does come here and do business, it does so with reference to our laws. It claims the rights and privileges of our laws, and it cannot evade its obligations. It would be monstrous to permit a foreign corporation to hold property here, to conduct business here, to enforce contractual rights obtained under our laws, and at the same time to avoid the contractual obligations imposed by the same laws.

But it is said that the judgment complained of grew out of an act committed elsewhere, and innocent where it was committed. The general principle is conceded that the law of the place where an act is done determines its validity; but the tort complained of was not committed in Iowa. The tort consisted in seizing property in Nebraska, exempt under the laws of Nebraska. The plaintiff in error was enabled to do this by instituting proceedings in another state. But the tort consisted not in instituting those proceedings in Iowa. A suit might rightfully be begun there in personam had Fleming brought himself within the jurisdiction of the Iowa courts. No action would have arisen had the property attached been situated in Iowa, or in a state other than Nebraska; but the wrong was in seizing the debt situated in Nebraska, payable in Nebraska, to a citizen of Nebraska. The statute in this respect is not confined to actions begun in another state, but extends to every attachment or garnishment of exempt wages, whether the proceeding be instituted in this state or elsewhere. It is true that, if the proceeding had been instituted in Nebraska a partial redress could have been had by way of defense in the original action; but that consideration only affects the quantum of damages. The tort—the cause of action—would have been precisely the same. There is no question raised as to the jurisdiction of the court over the person of the plaintiff in error. It has committed an act here which is a tort, and it must here answer for that tort. A somewhat similar question was presented in the case of O'Connor v. Walter (Neb.) 55 N. W. Rep. 867. It was there said: "In extending credit, every one dealing with the head of a family must take into account this right of exemption, and, presumably, in every extension of credit, this right is recognized. It therefore in no way operates to the injury of the law abiding creditor. The rapacity which respects neither implied contract obligations nor statutory enactments must, in damages, respond for this, as for any other act of misappropriation."

We neglected, perhaps, in the proper place, to notice one objection to the act, but it is one which can be appropriately noticed in closing,—that is, that the act is "a vicious example of class legislation;" and Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 87, 29 Am. Rep. 356, is cited in support of that proposition. The act under discussion in that case applied to one class only, and there was, perhaps, no basis, founded upon any reasonable distinction, for selecting that class as the recipient of that peculiar privilege. Here the case is different. The act we are now considering applies to every one who falls within the purview of the law exempting wages. The validity of that exemption cannot be doubted, and, if it were proper for the legislature to provide that exemption, then it certainly was also proper for the legislature, by appropriate action, to enforce the rights so granted. The mischief to prevent which the act was passed is a matter of common knowledge. An extensive and thriving business was being conducted by the institution of suits precisely similar to that out of which this action arose, and having for their sole object the evasion of the laws of this state. The act was passed to prevent, and should be so construed as to prevent, the continuance of this infamous business. It is perhaps only fair to say that neither the representatives of the corporation in Nebraska nor counsel for the corporation engaged in this case is shown to have had any part in the Iowa proceedings. Judgment affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Alfred WOLCOTT, Relator,

v.

John W. HOLCOMB, Resp't.

(97 Mich. 361.)

1. The words "any asylum" at which persons are kept at public expense,

NOTE.—Acquiring residence as a voter while attending school or public institution.

Inmates of soldiers' homes, or occupants of government posts.

Some of the states, as in the main case, have a constitutional provision to the effect that a residence is not gained or lost by reason of employment in the service of the United States, or state, nor while a student at a seminary, nor while kept at an almshouse or asylum.

This leaves the question to be determined by evidence outside of the fact of presence at such institution, although a residence may be gained there.

It is generally held that the inmates of a soldiers' home do not acquire the right to vote by reason of their residence in such institutions, but there are many things to be considered in regard to the qualifications of a voter as to his acquiring a new residence; abandonment of his former residence, and the intention to make a change, are all factors in determining the question of his right to vote. People v. Hanna (Mich.) Jan. 26, 1894; Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 66, reversing 42 Hun, 116.

Nor does he acquire a new residence by being in the government service at a certain place. People v. Holden, 23 Cal. 123; People v. Riley, 15 Cal. 48.

Residence on lands ceded to the United States for navy yards, forts, and arsenals does not give the right to vote at state elections in such territory. Opinion of the Justices, 1 Met. 560; Re Highlands, 48 N. Y. S. R. 795.

And the inmates of a soldiers' home in Ohio on land the exclusive jurisdiction of which is vested in the United States government, are not entitled to vote at the state elections, notwithstanding the provision of 64 Ohio Laws, 149, to the effect that this act shall not prevent the inmates from voting, as the legislature could not confer the right of suffrage upon persons whose legal status is fixed as nonresidents. Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 306, 2 Am. Rep. 397.

But where the United States relinquishes to the state jurisdiction over that place, the persons who resided in the state asylum at that time and for a year next preceding an election, are regarded as residents of Ohio for the entire year, notwithstanding the fact that part of the year was while jurisdiction was in the United States. Renner v. Bennett, 21 Ohio St. 431.

Inmates of almshouses and hospitals.

A pauper inmate of a poorhouse does not acquire thereby residence in a township in which a within the meaning of the constitution, providing that residence for voting purposes shall not be changed by staying in such institutions, includes a soldiers' home supported by the state.

2. The residence of an elector is not changed by reason of his presence and support in a soldiers' home, which is maintained by the state, for disabled and depend-poorhouse is located, so as to enable him to vote there. Clark v. Robinson, 88 Ill. 498; Dale v. Irwin, 78 Ill. 170; Baker v. McCoy (Ohio) 6 Am. L. Rec. 694; Covode v. Foster, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 414.

But in the case of Re Elk Twp. Election, 14 N. J. L. J. 263, it was held that an aged man who had been for a year or two working for farmers in that township, and whose only home was the county poorhouse in that township, was entitled to vote in that place.

And a voter who left his place of residence with no intention of ever returning, and finally went to another township to the county infirmary, with the intention to remain there permanently, having no family and no other home, with no intention of removing, and having no settlement in any township, is entitled to vote where such infirmary is situated. Mallanée v. Hilla, 3 Week. L. Bull. 61.

So where there is no constitutional or statutory provision against an inmate of an almshouse acquiring a residence at such place, he may change his residence from his township and adopt and select one where the almshouse is located as his residence, if he is a voter and has no family in another township. Sturgeon v. Korte, 34 Ohio St. 525.

Persons at hospitals under treatment do not thereby obtain a residence there for the purpose of voting. Election Law, 9 Phila. 497.

A student at college, who is there for the sole purpose of obtaining an education, does not thereby necessarily acquire the right to vote at that place. Allentown Contested Election Case, 8 Phila. 575; Rep. of Jud. Comm. Cush. Mass. Election Cases, 436; Vanderpoel v. O'Hanlon, 58 Iowa, 246, 36 Am. Rep. 216.

And is not entitled to vote there, unless it was his intention to remain permanently, or for some indefinite time, although he abandoned his father's house as his home after he was of age, and intended to make the place where the college was situated his only home while he was to remain there. State v. Daniels, 44 N. H. 333.

And, if students come to college for no other purpose than to receive an education, intending to leave after graduating, they do not acquire a residence at that place. Fry's Election Case, 71 Pa. 302, 10 Am. Rep. 698.

There must be evidence of complete abandonment of the former residence; but absence from it will be regarded as temporary, and too much weight should not be attached to declarations of present or future purpose by a student after the ent soldiers, under a constitutional provision that "no elector shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of being employed in the service of the United States or in this state, nor while a student at any seminary of learning, nor while kept at any almshouse, or any asylum at public expense, nor while confined in any public prison."

3. Inspectors of election have no right to reject a ballot offered by a registered voter who tenders the oath prescribed by statute, where the statute says that if the person challenged shall take such oath "his vote shall be received."

(Hooper, Ch. J., and Long, J., dissent.)

(November 10, 1893.)

APPPLICATION by the prosecuting attorney for Kent County for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant, a justice of the peace, to entertain the complaint of Uriah Carpenter against the board of election inspectors of the first precinct of Grand Rapids Township for refusal to receive his ballot, and to proceed to a determination of his right to vote. Granted.

Statement by Grant, J.:

The principal question presented in this case is whether the inmates of the Soldiers' Home, situated in the township of Grand Rapids, in Kent county, are entitled to vote in that township. Section 5, article 7, of the Constitution, reads as follows: "No elector shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his being employed in the service of the United States, or in this state, nor while a student at any seminary of learning, nor while kept at any almshouse or any asylum at public expense, nor while confined in any public prison." The Soldiers' Home was erected under Act No. 152, Pub. Acts 1885, entitled "An Act to Authorize the Establishment of a Home for Disabled Soldiers, Sailors and Marines in the State of Michigan." By the act, $100,000 was appropriated from the general fund in the state treasury for its erection and equipment, and $50,000 for the purpose of maintaining it for the years 1885 and 1886. It has since been supported by annual appropriations made by the legislature. Section 11 of the Act provides the conditions for admission to the home, which are as follows: "All applicants must be honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines who served in the army or navy of the United States in the war of the Rebellion, or in the Mexican war; they must be disabled by disease, wounds, or otherwise; must have no adequate means of support; must be incapable of earning their living, and otherwise dependent upon public or private charity." The board of managers, by the same section, empowered to adopt rules and regulations to govern the admission of applicants. Among the rules adopted by the board for such admissions is one requiring the applicant to show, by satisfactory evidence, "that he has no relations of sufficient ability to maintain him, who are legally liable for his support under the laws of the state of Michigan." Another rule provides that he must produce "the certificate of the supervisor of the township or ward in which the applicant resides, the county clerk or judge of probate of the county in which he question of residence is raised; there must be other satisfactory evidence tending to show abandonment. Lower Oxford Contested Election, 11 Phila. 641.

And in the case of Granby v. Amherst, 7 Mass. 1, it was said that a student of a college does not change his domicile by his occasional residence at college. But this was not the question involved in the case.

But the fact that a student has continued to reside in the place of the college for a period of seven years, supporting himself by his own efforts and procuring a transfer of registration as a voter, voting there and never voting at any other place, shows a bona fide intention to abandon the former residence. Shaeffer v. Gilbert, 78 Md. 68.

And proofs of change of domicile so as to overcome the presumption of the continuance of the prior domicile, concurring with an actual residence of the student in the town where the public institution is situated, will be sufficient to establish his domicile, and give him a right to vote in that town. Opinion of the Justices, 5 Met. 587.

And a student who had formed the purpose of making W. his home for an indefinite period, when twenty-four years of age, and who was taxed there, and voted there for several years, is entitled to claim that place as his residence, although attending a theological institution in Massachusetts. Sanders v. Getchell, 76 Me. 158, 49 Am. Rep. 606.

And in Pedigo v. Grimes, 118 Ind. 148, it was held that where voters after entering the state university determine that place should be their residence, they have a right to vote there if their intention was formed and acted upon in good faith.

And it was held in Putnam v. Johnson, 10 Mass. 488, that a student at a theological institution, of age, qualified, and not under his father's control, 23 L. R. A.

is entitled to vote at the place of such college, notwithstanding it may not be his expectation to remain there forever. In this case, he had left his father's family several years before, and had become a resident of S. where he was taxed and permitted to vote; his father had ceased to support him, and he was at S. preparing himself for an independent living when he removed to the town where the theological seminary was, which, as he was on a charitable foundation, required a residence of three years.

If students abandon their former home and come to the town where the seminary is situated, to make that town their residence, leaving to the future to determine whether they shall enter a profession or some other business in that town, they acquire a residence there. Re Ward, 29 Abb. N. C. 187.

And under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, providing that a permanent abode is necessary to constitute a residence, students who are entirely free from parental control and regard the place of the college as their home and have no other to which to return in case of sickness or domestic affliction, are entitled to vote there. Generally, however, undergraduates of colleges are no more residents of a town in which they pursue their studies than mere strangers. Dale v. Irwin, 78 Ill. 170.

In the case of Warren v. Board of Registration, 2 L. R. A. 208, 72 Mich. 398, it was stated that the provisions of the Michigan constitution in regard to acquiring and losing a residence while a student, do not prevent persons from becoming residents if such is their purpose and if they are able to choose; but that was not the question involved in that case.

The cases concerning the right of soldiers and sailors to vote are not included in this note. I. T.

resides, that he has carefully examined the proofs, that to the best of his knowledge and belief they are true and satisfactory to him, and that the applicant is a proper person for admission." The act further provides that no applicant shall be admitted who has not been a resident of the state for one year next preceding the date of the passage of the act, unless he served in a Michigan regiment, or was accredited to the state of Michigan. Uriah Carpenter, the inmate of the home whose right to vote is here in question, was at the time of his application and admission, in 1887, a resident of the township of Woodstock, in Lenawee county. In his application he made affidavit that he was a resident of that township, and upon it is indorsed the certificate of the supervisor that he was then an "actual resident" thereof. His vote was challenged and rejected on the ground that he was not an elector in the township of Grand Rapids.

Mr. Moses Taggart, with Mr. Alfred Wolcott, Prosecuting Attorney, for relator: Carpenter's registration as an elector, in itself, constituted prima facie evidence of legal residence, and all the essentials entitling him to vote.

Harbaugh v. People, 88 Mich. 241.

The importance of the intention of a person as to where his legal residence shall be in offering to vote at an election is strongly emphasized, in Warren v. Board of Registration, 2 L. R. A. 208, 72 Mich. 402, the court saying: "It is equally true that temporary abode in a city or ward does not make a person an elector. Unless the person coming in does so with the honest and settled intention of obtaining a new domicile, he gains no rights."

The case of High, Appellant, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 523, quoting Story's Conflict of Laws, defines a domicile to "be the habitation fixed in any place, without any intention of removing therefrom."

Presence makes a prima facie case of legal residence, and shifts the burden of proof.

Kennedy v. Ryall, 67 N. Y. 386.

No authority of the highest court of any state has gone so far as to hold it impossible for any one in attendance upon an institution of learning, or an inmate of a soldiers' home, from becoming a legal resident therein.

Putnam v. Johnson, 10 Mass. 488; Re Ward, 29 Abb. N. C. 187; Sanders v. Getchell, 76 Me. 159, 49 Am. Rep. 606; Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 312, 2 Am. Rep. 897; Renner v. Bennett, 21 Ohio St. 481; People v. Riley, 15 Cal. 48; People v. Holden, 28 Cal. 125; Dupuy v. Wurtz, 53 N. Y. 582.

Vanderpool v. O'Hanton, 53 Iowa, 248, 36 Am. Rep. 216, involved the right of a student at the state university, at Iowa City, to vote there or at a former residence, and it was held to be simply a question of intent, whether he had changed his former residence, "that the intent and fact must concur," citing,—

Opinion of the Justices, 25 Met. 587; Fry's Election Case, 71 Pa. 302, 10 Am. Rep. 698; Hinds v. Hinds, 1 Iowa, 36; State v. Menntek, 15 Iowa, 128. See also Sanders v. Getchell, supra; Shaeffer v. Gilbert, 73 Md. 66.

The Statute of 1891 is so clear as to the duty imposed upon the board of inspectors of election, both as to the administration of oaths to parties offering to vote who are challenged, and as to the duty of the board when such oath has been administered, that it would seem impossible for members of such board to be lacking in knowledge as to what it imperatively requires.

People v. Cicott, 16 Mich. 283, 97 Am. Dec. 141; Goetcheus v. Mattheusson, 61 N. Y. 420; People v. Bell, 119 N. Y. 175; Spragins v. Houghton, 3 Ill. 377; State v. Robb, 17 Ind. 586; People v. Pease, 30 Barb. 598; Gillespie v. Palmer, 20 Wis. 544; People v. Gordon, 5 Cal. 235; Com. v. McHale, 97 Pa. 897, 39 Am. Rep. 803. Mr. Henry J. Felker for respondent.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Soldiers' Home is purely eleemosynary in character. To hold otherwise would be contrary to sound legal principle and good sense. The title to the act shows it. It is not the character of the beneficiaries, nor the cause of their inability to earn a living, nor the reason for granting the bounty, which determines whether such an institution is charitable in its character. An institution established and maintained for the support of indigent persons who became blind or deaf in the service of their country or state is as much eleemosynary as one established for the support of those who are born blind or deaf, or who have become so from other causes. All institutions in this state, established and maintained at the public expense, for the care, education, and support of the unfortunate, belong to this class of institutions, and are included in the term "asylum," used in the above clause of the constitution. It is immaterial whether they are called "schools," "retreats," "homes," or "asylums." It is equally immaterial what the feeling is which prompts their erection and maintenance. An "asylum" is defined by Webster to be "an institution for the protection or relief of the unfortunate." Such is its meaning as used in the constitution. It follows that one's entry and residence in such an institution partake of the same character as the institution itself, and are likewise eleemosynary in character. One entering them cannot, under the constitution, gain or lose his residence. Inmates of the home enter it for one purpose, only, and the constitution solemnly and clearly declares that their status as to residence when they enter must control while they remain there. When Mr. Carpenter entered the home, he was a legal resident of the town of Woodstock. He entered the home upon his own application, solely as a beneficiary, and a resident of that township, to accept a well-bestowed and deserving charity. He did not by this act lose his residence there, and his intent is wholly immaterial. To permit his intent to control would result in the practical annulment of this provision of the constitution. The mischief intended to be avoided is as apparent in this case as in any. The inmates of the home own no home, pay no local taxes, do no work in or for the benefit of the municipality, and have no pecuniary interest in its local affairs. In fact, they have no connection with, and stand in no relation to, the local municipal government. They occupy state property, and are exclusively under the control and management of the state.

The provision of our constitution was evidently copied from that of New York, for the two are identical in language. The court of appeals of that state, in an opinion concurred in by the entire court, held that the inmates of the Soldiers' Home of that state were not entitled to vote in the municipality where the home was located. Silvey v. Lindsey, 107 N. Y. 55. The facts in that case and in this are substantially identical. After stating the facts, the court says: "These reasons satisfied the conscience of the plaintiff [the inmate], and enabled him to say he was a resident of Bath, but in reality they bring the case within the prohibition of the constitution. He could not gain a residence by being an inmate, which means nothing more than his presence in the home; and, excluding that, there is nothing in the case to show that a residence in Bath had been acquired. It follows that he had not lost the right to vote in the place of his legal residence,—New York. As to that city, he is to be regarded as temporarily absent and his residence as a citizen is still therein. We have no doubt that the institution in question is within the purview of the constitutional provision. It is an asylum supported at the public expense, and its members are within the mischief against which that provision is aimed,—the participation of a body of unconcerned men in the control, through the ballot box, of municipal affairs, in whose further conduct they have no interest, and from the mismanagement of which, by the officers their ballots might elect, they sustain no injury." This language is applicable to the present case, and we quote it with approval. But it is insisted that that case still leaves the question open to depend upon the intention of the elector, by reason of the following language: "But the question in each case is still, as it was before the adoption of the constitution, one of domicile or residence, to be decided upon all the circumstances of the case. The provision (art. 2, § 3) disqualifies no one; confers no right upon any one. It simply eliminates from those circumstances the fact of presence in the institution named, or included within its terms. It settles the law as to the effect of such presence, and as to which there had before been a difference of opinion, and declares that it does not constitute a test of a right to vote, and is not to be so regarded. The person offering to vote must find the requisite qualifications elsewhere." Mr. Carpenter, as above stated, was a resident and elector in the township of Woodstock, which was then his domicile of citizenship, when he made his application, and was admitted to the home. There was no indication in his application of any intention to change his residence for the purpose of voting, or for any other purpose than that for which the home was established. In his complaint against the respondent, he states that he had always lived with his father prior to his death, in 1887; that he was unmarried; that, by the death of his father, the home was broken up; that since that time he had had no home with any relative or friend; and "that he always intended, and in fact made, the township of Grand Rapids, and that part of it in which the Soldiers' Home is located, his home, subsequent to his entry therein." His father was living at the time he entered the home. If he entered as a resident of Woodstock, and that was then his actual residence, can he gain a new residence while kept in this asylum at public expense, except in violation of this plain provision of the above article? Would not this be losing one residence, and gaining another, while kept in an asylum at public expense? In the New York case, the inmate had been in the home for six years, and swore that it was his intention, at all times, to make his residence in said institution, so long as he should be permitted to do so. Is Mr. Carpenter's statement, in fact, any stronger than this? Does he swear to any residence or domicile of citizenship, aside from that which attached to him as an inmate of the home? That case gives us no light upon the requisite qualifications, which must be found elsewhere. It determined the one question before the court, and held that one who had been for six years an inmate, and who swore that he intended to remain there the rest of his life, if permitted to do so, was not an elector in the township where the home was located. If the inmate was a resident of the township where the home is located, at the time of his admission, the requisite qualifications of an elector would be found in that fact, and his right to vote would be undoubted.

We are of the opinion that the terms, "by reason of," and "while," were understood by the framers of the constitution to have a different meaning. In the former case, the intention would very largely, if not entirely, govern the question of domicile, while in the latter it would not. It was clearly the intention of the former provision to give the citizen the right, if he chose, to carry his residence with him to the place where he was employed in the service of the United States or of the state, and in that latter case it seems equally clear that it was the intention not to give that right. What object, otherwise, could there have been in the use of these two terms? While the results of the adoption of one construction of the fundamental law of the state are not conclusive, nor of much force, where the construction is otherwise clear, still they are important considerations in determining the intent and purpose of the law. If the construction contended for by the relator be correct, it follows that all the inmates of county almshouses and of prisons and jails are electors, at their option, in the townships and cities where those institutions are located. In the township of Haukin, in Wayne county, where the almshouse of that county is located, there were, in the year 1891, 1,851 male inmates,—more than twice the whole number of voters in the township. Ann. Rep. Supt. Poor, 1891, p. 2. Furthermore, students in all institutions of learning, although they are in attendance there for the sole purpose of obtaining an education, might, at their own will, become electors in the places where such institutions are located. We think the constitution prohibits a change of residence, under such circumstances, and that, when one's presence in any of the institutions named is due to the sole purpose of receiving the benefits conferred, his former residence must be considered his domicile, for citizenship.

We are cited to the language of Mr. Justice Campbell in Warren v. Board of Registration, 72 Mich. 398, 2 L. R. A. 203. That language is conceded to be a dictum. It is not, therefore, binding in this case. It has often been said by this and other courts that the language of a decision must be construed with reference to, and confined to, the facts of that case. The sole question in that case was whether the lodging room or boarding place of the voter should govern. Applied to that question, the language was appropriate, and the reasoning conclusive.

No question of disfranchisement is involved. The inmates of the home are no more disfranchised than were the soldiers when absent from their domicils, and in the army. The people, in that case, amended their constitution, providing that they might cast their votes when absent from home, in the service of their country. So, in this case, the people may amend their constitution, either making these inmates electors in the township where the home is located, or providing for casting their ballots at the home, to be counted in the township from which they came.

Another question, of no little importance, is also involved. Are inspectors of election clothed by the law with judicial, or only ministerial, functions? Have they the right to reject a ballot, when the voter is registered, and tenders the oath prescribed by the statute? Mr. Carpenter was registered, took the prescribed oath, and tendered his ballot, which the inspectors refused to receive. Section 24, Act No. 190, Laws 1891,* determines the conditions under which a challenged voter may have his vote received. This section is the same as those in former laws, and was referred to in People v. Cicott, 16 Mich. 302, 97 Am. Dec. 141, where it was said that "the inspectors cannot reject a registered voter, who takes the proper oath." The statute is clearly mandatory. It says that, "if the person so challenged shall take such oath, his vote shall be received." Inspectors are sometimes partisan, and sometimes corrupt, and the clear purpose of the act is to take from them all discretionary and judicial power, and confer upon them a purely ministerial function. The qualification of the voter is no concern of theirs. Upon taking the oath, his vote must be received. If he swear falsely, the law provides a way to deal with him. Mr. Cooley states the rule as follows: "Where, however, by the law under which the election is held, the inspectors are to receive the voter's ballot if he takes the oath that he possesses the constitutional qualifications, the oath is the conclusive evidence on which the inspectors are to act, and they are not at liberty to refuse to administer the oath, or to refuse the vote after the oath has been taken. They are only ministerial officers, in such a case, and have no discretion but to obey the law, and receive the vote." Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 777. For this reason, it was the duty of the respondent to entertain the complaint, issue a warrant, and proceed to an examination.

The writ must issue.

McGrath and Montgomery, JJ., concurred with Grant, J.

Hooker, Ch. J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the proposition that article 7, section 5, of the Constitution of this state should be construed as to deprive a citizen of his right to choose his own residence, or to compel him to avail himself of the privileges of asylums or schools, at the cost of a citizen's privileges, by requiring him to retain a former residence, unaccessible, and to which he does not intend to return. It should not be assumed that those who inhabit almshouses or asylums are unworthy people, or that they have no interest in elections, or that they are disqualified from discharging the duties of the citizen understandingly and properly. It cannot be claimed that these men are disfranchised because, under the section, no one is denied the right to vote at his residence. Inmates formerly residing in the township where the asylum is situated do not lose their residences by reason of being such inmates, and, clearly, others retain their residences and the right to vote at their former domicils, if they choose to do so. The only reason given for the construction contended for is that these classes are undesirable voters at the place of the asylum; that they pay no taxes, do no work for the benefit of the municipality, and have no interest in local affairs. The same may be said of many persons in all localities, and was probably as true of these before their admission as after. It is as true of those admitted from the locality of the asylum, who may vote under this section, as of those who come from a distance who may not vote, under this construction. It never has been a requisite to electoral rights that the citizen should pay taxes, do work for the benefit of the municipality, or evince interest in municipal affairs. Nor does the right depend upon a wise, or even honest, exercise of the privilege of the ballot. Doubtless, there are many whose votes could be dispensed with, to the profit of all local municipalities, and the state as well, but the electoral franchise is based upon broader principles. There is no man so poor or low that he is not richer and manlier for his political equality, and the ballot is essential to the protection of the rights of all classes. Immediately a class or race is disfranchised, its members are deprived of an equal chance with their fellows.

*If any person offering to vote shall be challenged, as unqualified, by any inspector, the chairman of the board of inspectors shall declare to the person challenged the constitutional qualifications of an elector, and shall tender to him such one of the oaths enumerated therein as he may claim to contain the grounds of his qualification to vote, and, on his taking such oath, his vote shall be received.

This proposition is so important a part of the foundation of our institutions that it should not be eliminated or weakened by any unnecessary construction of a constitution based upon civil liberty and political equality. Under this construction, a student who goes to our state university for a term of years, abandoning his residence, taking his family with him, residing in a house of his own, with no intention of living elsewhere after his education shall be finished, cannot gain a residence there, or lose his former one. It cannot be said that he is an undesirable voter, that he has no interest in local concerns, or that he is not a taxpayer there. The true construction of this section should be just what its language imports, i. e. that being kept in an almshouse, or attendance at college, or service in the employment of the United States, or the navigation of the lakes or high seas, does not work a change of residence, against the intention or desire of the individual. I have an acquaintance, the intelligent master of a great lake steamer, who is at home only occasionally; who comes home the day before election to vote,—a right which this section secures to him,—though absent most of the year. Will it be said that he cannot change his residence so long as his employment continues? It would seem that these things cannot have been intended, and that the rule indicated is the reasonable one, viz, that the section was designed for the benefit of, and to enlarge and protect the rights of, these classes, not to deprive them of privileges common to all. The opinion of the late Mr. Justice Campbell is in accord with this view, as appears from a dictum in the case of Warren v. Board of Registration, 72 Mich. 401, 2 L. R. A. 203, where he cites this section after stating that: "Our own constitution is full on this subject, where it lays down expressly, what would perhaps be implied, that certain continuous presences or absences shall have no effect on elective residences." And he adds: "These provisions do not prevent such persons from becoming residents, if such is their purpose, and if they are able to choose."

The case of Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, which is relied upon as authority by counsel for respondent, is reconcilable with this view, and does not appear to go to the extent of holding the doctrine contended for. In that case, a vote was rejected because the voter did not show himself to be a resident of the township. His vote being challenged, he answered as follows: "I answer that I reside in the town of Bath, for the reason that I was admitted an inmate of the New York Soldiers' and Sailors' Home, in this town, by the authorities thereof. In the year 1880, and have remained such inmate from that time to the present, with the intention, at all times, of making my residence in said institution, so long as I shall be permitted to remain such inmate. At the time of my admission to said institution, I was an honorably discharged soldier of the United States, and a resident and voter of the city of New York. I therefore answer that I am a resident of the town of Bath. In becoming an inmate of said institution, I intended to change my residence from the city of New York to the fifth election district of said town of Bath." It will be observed that after stating the facts of his former residence, and his admission to the Soldiers' Home, and his intention of making his residence in said institution as long as he should be permitted, he argues, "I therefore answer that I am a resident of the township of Bath." The opinion says: "It is obvious that his narration of an intention to change his residence to Bath, and his assertion that he resided in Bath, can be accepted only as conclusions from the circumstances detailed in connection with them. They were his conclusions, and the defendants, in view of his whole statement, were not bound by them. They were bound by the facts stated, and were required to say, upon those facts, whether the plaintiff was qualified in the necessary particular: and, undoubtedly, they were to determine the question at their peril. The constitution, in the section referred to supra, specifies the qualifications necessary to the elective franchise, and provides who shall have the right to vote; and one duly qualified cannot be deprived of that right by an inferior tribunal. But the Constitution also provides (art. 2, § 3): 'For the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence, by reason of his presence or absence, while employed in the service of the United States; nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this state, or of the United States, or of the high seas; nor while a student of any seminary of learning; nor while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense; nor while confined in any public prison.' And the decision of the inspectors of election was that, in their opinion, the intending voter was in Bath as a mere inmate of the institution, and for a temporary purpose, and not as a resident of the voting district, or with intent to make the town a fixed or permanent place of residence, and so it would seem. His presence there was eleemosynary in its character. He was there as a dependent, because he had no means of support, or relatives to maintain him, and liable to be discharged whenever the board of trustees were satisfied that he was of sufficient ability or means to support himself. Rules and regulations of the home. As to the home, he was a beneficiary, and nothing else. As to Bath, his residence was a beneficiary's residence, and no other. His relations were not with the village, but with the institution, which was situated within its borders. His intention to remain was conditioned upon, and limited to, the duration of the charity which he enjoyed. His intention to remain in Bath depended upon his expectation to remain at the home. This gave no residence, for he was there only in the character of a beneficiary, for a temporary purpose. His only intention, in going to Bath, was to be an inmate of the home; and it was only as such inmate that his residence was to be continued. He was not there as a citizen changing his residence, but as an object of well-bestowed and deserving charity. He was, as is clear upon his statement, present in Bath, and at the institution, because he was then kept (that is, supported) at public expense. 'I reside in Bath,' he says, 'for the reason that I was admitted to the home as an inmate.' He continues there with the intention of making his residence in the institution 'so long,' he says, 'as I shall be permitted to remain an inmate.' These reasons satisfy the conscience of the plaintiff, and enable him to say that he was a resident of Bath; but, in reality, they bring the case within the prohibition of the constitution. He could not gain a residence by being an inmate, which means nothing more than his presence in the home; and, excluding that, there is nothing in the case to show that a residence in Bath had been acquired. It follows that he has not lost the right to vote in the place of his legal residence.—New York,—for the provision of the constitution in question also declares that he shall not lose his residence by reason of such presence in the institution. As to that city, he is to be regarded as temporarily absent, and his residence as a citizen still therein. We have no doubt that the institution in question is within the purview of the constitutional provision (art. 2, § 3) above referred to. It is an asylum supported at the public expense, and its members are within the mischief against which that provision is aimed,—the participation of an unconcerned body of men in the control, through the ballot box, of municipal affairs, in whose further conduct they have no interest, and from the mismanagement of which, by the officers their ballots might elect, they sustain no injury." If this language should create the impression that the section of the constitution does more than to negative an implication of a change of domicile from the fact of residence in the institution, the next paragraph of the opinion settles the question, clearly showing that the court did not intend to hold that inmates of a soldier's home could not acquire a residence in the locality of the home, and, to my mind, clearly implying that, had the voter stated that he entered said home with the intention of abandoning his former domicile, and making a new one in the locality of the home, the decision would have been different, and that, instead of supporting respondent's contention, the case contains a plain dictum to the contrary. It is as follows: "But the question in each case is still, as it was before the adoption of the constitution, one of domicile, or residence, to be decided upon all of the circumstances of the case. The provision (art. 2, § 3) disqualified no one, confers no right upon any one. It simply eliminates from those circumstances the fact of presence in the institution named, or included within its terms. It settles the law as to the effect of such presence, and as to which there had before been a difference of opinion, and declares that it does not constitute a test of a right to vote, and is not to be so regarded. The person offering to vote must find the requisite qualifications elsewhere. We think, therefore, the question submitted by the parties, viz.: 'Did James Silvey gain a residence in the town of Bath, so as to entitle him to vote at said town meeting, by reason of his presence as an inmate of said institution?'—should have been answered in the negative; and it is so answered by this court."

In my opinion, the writ should issue as prayed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, Resp't.,

Carson J. SHELTON et al., App'ts.

(130 N. Y. 251.)

An organization of coal dealers intended to prevent competition in prices, in pursuance to which the price of coal is raised, is a conspiracy condemned by N. Y. Penal Code, § 168, making it a misdemeanor to conspire to commit any act injurious to trade or commerce; and raising the price of coal is a sufficient overt act.

(October 3, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the general term, of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Sessions for Niagara County convicting them of conspiring to commit acts injurious to trade, and also affirming an order denying a motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Statement by Andrews, M. J.:

Appeal from the affirmance by the general term, fifth department, of judgment of conviction in the Niagara county sessions on indictment for conspiracy. The indictment set forth an agreement between the defendants and others, comprising all the retail coal dealers in the city of Lockport, except one, entered into in March, 1892, to organize the Lockport Coal Exchange, which agreement was as follows:

"Constitution and By-Laws,

"Name. The name of this exchange shall be the Lockport Coal Exchange.

"Objects. The objects of this exchange shall be to foster trade and commerce in coal, wood, and all the products appertaining to the same; to protect and secure freedom from unjust and unlawful exactions; to diffuse accurate and reliable information as to the retail coal trade, and of the responsibility and standing of customers, and other matters, among its members, for their mutual protection and benefit; to settle differences between its members; to produce uniformity and certainty in the customs and usages of such trade; to promote a more enlarged and friendly intercourse between merchants and dealers in coal and wood; and to provide, establish, and maintain such rules and regulations as may be proper and necessary for the mutual co-operation, interest, and protection of the retail dealers in coal and wood in the city of Lockport, and in furthering the coal trade interests generally. It shall be the duty of all members to strictly obey all the provisions of the constitution, by-laws, and resolutions of the exchange, and permit to the secretary the free exercise of the duties imposed upon him in enforcing them.

"Officers. The officers of the exchange shall be a president and a vice-president, who shall be elected by the exchange, and who shall be members of the exchange, and also a secretary and treasurer, elected by the exchange. The officers shall hold office for the term of one year, and until their successors are elected and shall have duly qualified; and any officer may be removed from office by the five-sixths vote of all the members of the exchange, at any regular or special meeting thereof.

"Committees. There shall be such committees as the president or the board of trustees may from time to time designate.

"President and Vice-President. The president shall preside at all meetings of the exchange, or, in his absence, the vice-president. In the absence of the president and vice-president, a presiding officer shall be chosen from the members of the exchange. The president shall be, ex officio, a member of all committees.

"Secretary. The secretary shall not be a member of the exchange, nor in any manner personally interested in the coal trade. He shall be elected by at least a five-sixths vote of all the members of the exchange at a regular or special meeting, due notice of said intended election having been sent by mail to each member, at his regular business address, at least five days previous to the meeting. The secretary shall keep a record of the meetings of the exchange, a register of its members, officers, and committees, and conduct all correspondence of the exchange, and perform such other duties in connection with his office as may be imposed upon him by the exchange. He shall instantly investigate all charges preferred against the members of the exchange, on all well-founded suspicions, without fear or favor, and conduct the investigation, both to obtain proof, and when presented before the exchange, and shall render his decision in each case to the exchange within ten days from the date on which charges are made, unless further time is given him by the exchange. He shall be permitted to see any portion of the books of any member, when in pursuit of evidence of wrongdoing, and may demand an affidavit, when he thinks necessary to refute or sustain a specific charge. He shall also collect material for, and compile, a list of persons who are poor pay, for the mutual protection and benefit of the members of the exchange. He shall also be the keeper of the seal of the exchange, and receive such salary as may be determined upon by the exchange. Before the secretary shall enter upon the duties of his office, he shall make oath that he will honestly and fearlessly perform the duties prescribed by the constitution and by-laws, and that he will keep, in honor and secrecy, any and all information by him acquired, regarding the business of the various members, as he from time to time may investigate them, except any facts connected with any violation of the laws of the exchange which the exchange or any member is entitled to know. If practicable, the secretary shall be a notary public. The secretary shall not disclose to any member of the exchange any information regarding any investigation, while he is making the same.

"Treasurer. The treasurer, who shall also be the secretary, shall have charge of the funds of the exchange, disburse the same on the order of the board of trustees, countersigned by the president, and shall report at all regular meetings, and his accounts shall be open for proper inspection at all proper times. He shall give bonds for the proper protection of the exchange.

"Membership. The exchange shall be composed of active and associate members. Active members shall comprise any retail coal dealer, firm, or company who has a yard or dock, and the usual appliances for doing a coal business, in the city of Lockport. Associate members shall comprise any individual, company, or firm that sells coal in the villages around Lockport, and who approves the objects of, and agrees to co-operate with, the exchange. Associate members shall pay an annual fee of five dollars, and shall have all the privileges of active members, except the right of voting.

"Discipline. If a member is charged with violating any provision of these by-laws, or any rule or resolution of the exchange, or of being guilty of conduct unbecoming a member, or prejudicial to its interests, or of giving short weight or overweight, he shall be summoned before the secretary to answer the charge. If, upon the charge and defense being heard by the secretary, he shall decide to sustain the charge, the member shall be declared 'in default'; and the member shall be considered to be 'in default' until five sixths of all the members, at a regular or special meeting, shall vote to reinstate him as a member of the exchange, in good standing. A member who shall be declared 'in default' shall absolutely and irrevocably forfeit all rights to all money, property, or other value held by the exchange, as its own or in trust, and shall also forfeit all rights of membership in the exchange, unless he be reinstated in good standing; and no member shall be so reinstated except by a five-sixths vote of all members of the exchange at a regular or special meeting assembled after proper notice, and only after depositing with the treasurer $100 as fee for renewal of membership. When a member shall be accused by the secretary, in any open meeting of the exchange, of having violated any provision of this constitution and by-laws, or of any resolution, and evidence is lacking to absolutely refute or sustain the charge, it shall be obligatory upon such member to make proper affidavit that he has in no instance sold or delivered coal for which he has not received the full price at which the majority of the other members were selling coal of the same size at the same time, and that he has not, directly or indirectly, given any rebate, commission, or other concession equivalent to cash, thereby actually reducing the established market price made by the Lockport Coal Exchange, and that not less than two thousand and not more than two thousand pounds have, in his knowledge, been sold by himself, his partner, or his employes, or delivered as a ton. Resignations shall be made in writing to the president or secretary, and be referred to the board of trustees for their action; but no resignation will be accepted until all dues, fines, charges, and penalties against such member shall have been paid and settled. When the exchange, or secretary thereof, shall declare a member 'in default,' the secretary shall notify every member of the exchange by mail, and such notice shall be authoritative. When a member defies the exchange by persistent wrongdoing, and is declared 'in default' and persistent, the secretary shall notify the shippers of coal to the Lockport market that the said member is 'in default' and persistent, and for this reason is not entitled to the privileges of membership in the Lockport exchange.

"Election of Members. A candidate for membership shall be proposed in writing by a member at a regular meeting of the exchange, and be recommended by two members in good standing, and at the next succeeding regular meeting be voted upon. A two-thirds vote of the members of the exchange shall be requisite to elect.

"Price of Anthracite Coal. The price of coal at retail shall, as far as practicable, be kept uniform, and it shall require a five-sixths vote of all members of the exchange, at any meeting, to advance or reduce the retail price of coal, and no price shall be made at any time which amounts to more than a fair and reasonable advance over wholesale rates, or that is higher than the current prices of the exchanges at Rochester or Buffalo, when figured upon corresponding freight tariff; but at no time shall the price of coal at retail exceed one dollar above the costs of the same at wholesale, except by the unanimous vote of all the members of the exchange. All votes upon the price of coal shall be visa voce. The sale of coal shall be through the nominal channels of the trade. Soliciting shall be discouraged, and no club orders of associated buyers, to reduce prices, shall be considered or accepted. No member shall employ any person temporarily to solicit orders, either on salary or on commission, and no signs indicating, 'Orders taken for coal,' shall be displayed at groceries or other 'outside places,' and no habitual orders for second parties shall be received or filled when sent in by such agencies, whether on commission or other form of reciprocity, or only as a matter of friendship. Except that each member may have one place for taking orders, in addition to his regular yard office.

"Meetings. The annual meeting of the exchange shall be held on the first Monday of April of each year. The regular meeting shall be held on the first Monday of each month. Special meetings may be called by the president, or upon the written request of three members, which request shall be sent to the secretary, stating the object of such meeting; and the notices of any special meeting shall state the object of the same, and no other business shall be transacted at such meeting. At all meetings of the exchange, seven members shall constitute a quorum; but this shall not authorize them to transact any business which, under the constitution and by-laws, requires the vote of a greater number of the members. Any member may be represented at a meeting by an authorized person connected with his business, and such person shall be entitled to the privileges of such member. Any vacancies in any of the official positions of the exchange shall be filled by the board of trustees, when ordered by the president (or in his absence by the vice-president), within two weeks after such vacancy occurs, or as soon thereafter as practicable.

"Membership Fee. There shall be a membership fee of one hundred dollars to be paid to the secretary by each member at the time of signing the constitution and by-laws, and during the first week of each month the further sum of five dollars for current expenses. At the end of the year, upon vote of the exchange, there shall be returned to such member the full amount of such monthly payment, so paid in by the members, less the proper proposition due for each member for the current expenses of the exchange, which amount shall be deducted from each by the secretary. Any member of the exchange, retiring from the coal business in Lockport in good standing with the exchange, shall be entitled to receive from the treasurer the original amount paid in by said member for membership,—that is, one hundred dollars,—less any assessment for expenses or dues that may properly belong to such member to pay, upon filing an affidavit with the secretary that the said member has absolutely withdrawn from all direct or indirect interest in coal business in Lockport, and that during his term of membership he has not violated any of the provisions of the constitution and by-laws or resolutions of the Lockport Coal Exchange.

"Order of Business. At all meetings of the exchange, the order of business shall be: Calling of roll; reading of minutes; proposal of membership; reports of committees; communications, bills, or notices; unfinished business; miscellaneous business. This order of business may be suspended at any meeting of the exchange by a vote of two thirds of the members present.

"Records and Minutes. The minutes and records of the exchange shall be open at all times to the inspection of members.

"Amendments. This constitution and by-laws may be amended by an affirmative vote of five sixths of the members of the exchange at a regular meeting, provided that notice of such proposed amendment shall have been presented in writing at a previous regular meeting.

"We, the undersigned, agree to abide by the above constitution and by-laws of the Lockport Coal Exchange. James Lennon & Son. Angevine & Hoover. P. H. Tuohy. Charles Whitmore & Co. J. Marc. Fowler. Sheldon N. Cook. Upson & Stevens. E. S. Brown. M. W. Carr. Ferrin Bros. Co., Inc. M. McManus. Edward B. Jelly."

The indictment, among other things, alleged that the agreement constituted an unlawful conspiracy to raise, increase, and augment the rates and prices of coal, at retail, in the city of Lockport, and to destroy free competition among the signers of the agreement and others, in the sale of coal in said city, and to compel the consumers of coal to pay therefor the prices fixed by the coal exchange. It alleged that, in pursuance of said conspiracy, the defendants and others, members of said exchange, organized the same, elected officers, and by resolution did "fix, determine, and establish the rate and price of anthracite coal at retail, in said city, at four dollars and seventy-five cents per ton for egg, chestnut, stove, and grate coal, and three dollars and seventy-five cents per ton for pea coal, and other higher rates for small quantities of the same; said rates and prices so fixed, determined, and established being over seventy-five cents per ton higher and in advance of the then market price of such coal at retail in said city." The indictment alleged an unlawful intent, and concluded by an averment that the "conspiracy as aforesaid, so carried into execution as aforesaid, is of grievous injury to trade and commerce, prejudicial to the public good and welfare, against the form of the statute," etc. The proof established the execution of the agreement as alleged; the organization of the exchange by the election of officers; the fixing of the price of coal at an advance beyond the then market price, which price was thereafter charged therefor; the notification of the wholesale dealers, by the secretary, of the organization of the exchange, with the names of the members. Other facts are set forth in the opinion.

Mr. E. M. Ashley, for appellant:

The agreement between the members of the Lockport Coal Exchange sought to regulate the prices merely, for which the members of that association should sell coal. They did not seek to limit the supply, they did not endeavor to close the field of operation against the public. They employed no coercive measures. They did not interfere with the rights of any person outside their association, who was trading in coal. It was no combination to prevent any other dealer from exercising his right to sell for less than the price fixed for them. It was a mutual agreement amongst themselves to stop a cutting of prices which threatened them all with ruin, and restore the condition of affairs that existed before the war of prices had begun. Such an agreement carried out is not a conspiracy.

Master Stedore's Assn. v. Walsh, 2 Daly, 1.

A partnership would not be illegal on account of any number of associates, no matter how great, or a large number of persons unconnected in business might legally agree to charge uniform prices.

Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229; Chappel v. Brockway, 21 Wend. 157.

Upon the old cases an additional element has been engrafted, in effect that no such agreement shall contemplate the withdrawal from market, or the limiting of the supply, of any article of necessity which is the subject of general trade. The reason of this rule is, that such an agreement, when carried out, affects the trade, not only of those who agree together, but of all persons engaged in the business, and as it shortens or limits the general supply, it is a general restraint of trade and affects the entire field of operations.

Leslie v. Lorillard, 1 L. R. A. 456, 110 N. Y. 519.

Mr. P. F. King, Dist. Atty., for respondent:

When any two or more persons combine to do any act injurious to trade and commerce, they are each guilty of a misdemeanor. These defendants confessedly combined to overthrow and destroy competition among themselves in the retail coal business in the city of Lockport, and are each, therefore, properly convicted of conspiracy.

The courts of our sister states recognize the value and importance of free competition in articles of trade and emphatically condemn any combination formed for the purpose of overcoming and destroying it.

There was nothing to prevent that exchange from gradually, from time to time, forcing up the price of coal, little by little, that it might not attract public attention or put the people in alarm, until it reached an exorbitant figure; and in cold winter weather, when everybody must have fuel to live, there was nothing to prevent this combination from committing the most outrageous extortion upon the people in the price of coal. They destroyed competition; and thereafter trade in coal did not freely exist. This was sufficient to invoke the power of the law.

United States v. Goldberg, 7 Biss. 175.

The unlawful combination is the gist of the crime of conspiracy, and proof of any act toward carrying the conspiracy into effect is an overt act.

Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111, 88 Am. Dec. 847;

United States v. Goldberg, supra.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 168 of the Penal Code makes it a misdemeanor for two or more persons to conspire (subd. 6) "to commit any act injurious to the public health, to public morals, or to trade or commerce, or for the perversion or obstruction of public justice, or of the due administration of the laws." The Revised Statutes contained a similar provision. 2 Rev. Stat. p. 692, § 8, subd. 6. The fact that the defendants subscribed the constitution and by-laws of the Lockport Coal Exchange, and participated in its management, was not controverted on the trial. Nor was there any dispute that the object of the organization was to prevent competition in the price of coal among the retail dealers, acting as the Lockport Coal Exchange, by constituting the exchange the sole authority to fix the price which should be charged by the members, individually, for coal sold by them. Nor is there any dispute that, in pursuance of the plan, the exchange did proceed to fix the price of coal, and that the parties to the agreement were thereafter governed thereby in making sales to their customers. Nor is it questioned that the price first established was 75 cents in advance of the then market price, and that there was afterwards a still further advance. The defendants gave evidence tending to show (and of this there was no contradiction) that before and at the time of the organization of the exchange the excessive competition between the dealers in coal in Lockport had reduced the price below the actual cost of the coal and the expense of handling, and that the business was carried on at a loss. It was not shown that the prices of coal, fixed from time to time by the exchange, were excessive or oppressive, or were more than sufficient to afford a fair remuneration to the dealers. The trial judge submitted the case to the jury upon the proposition that if the defendants entered into the organization agreement for the purpose of controlling the price of coal, and managing the business of the sale of coal, so as to prevent competition in price between the members of the exchange, the agreement was illegal, and that if the jury found that this was their intent, and that the price of coal was raised in pursuance of the agreement to effect its object, the crime of conspiracy was established. The correctness of this proposition is the main question in the case.

If the confederacy into which the defendants entered was an act "injurious to trade or commerce," irrespective of its results in the particular case, then there is no difficulty in maintaining the conviction. If a combination between independent dealers, to prevent competition between themselves in the sale of an article of prime necessity, is, in the contemplation of the law, an act inimical to trade or commerce, whatever may be done under and in pursuance of it, and although the object of the combination is merely the due protection of the parties to it against ruinous rivalry, and no attempt is made to charge undue or excessive prices, then the indictment was sustained by proof. On the other hand, if the validity and legality of an agreement having for its object the prevention of competition between dealers in the same commodity depend upon what may be done under the agreement, and it is to be adjudged valid or invalid according to the fact whether it is made the means for raising the price of a commodity beyond its normal and reasonable value, then it would be difficult to sustain this conviction, for it affirmatively appears that the price fixed for coal by the exchange did not exceed what would afford a reasonable profit to the dealers. It was said by Parker, Ch. J. (Lord Macclesfield), in his celebrated judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, which was the case of a bond taken from the defendant on the sale by him to the plaintiff of the lease of a bake house, claimed to be void as in restraint of trade: "In all restraints of trade, where nothing more appears, the law presumes them bad. But if the circumstances are set forth that presumption is excluded, and the court is to judge of these circumstances, and to determine accordingly; and if, upon them, it appears to be a just and honest contract, it ought to be maintained." If this agreement, and what was done under it, is to be judged as an isolated transaction and its rightfulness is to be determined alone upon the particular circumstances, whether it did or did not produce an injury to trade, we might well hesitate. The obtaining by dealers of a fair and reasonable price for what they sell does not seem to contravene public policy, or to work an injury to individuals. On the contrary, the general interests are promoted by activity in trade, which cannot permanently exist without reasonable encouragement to those engaged in it. Producers, consumers, and laborers are alike benefited by healthful conditions of business. But the question here does not turn on the point whether the agreement between the retail dealers in coal did, as matter of fact, result in injury to the public, or to the community in Lockport. The question is, Was the agreement one, in view of what might have been done under it, and the fact that it was an agreement, the effect of which was to prevent competition among the coal dealers, upon which the law affixes the brand of condemnation, and which it will not permit? It has hitherto been an accepted maxim in political economy that "competition is the life of trade." The courts have acted upon and adopted this maxim in passing upon the validity of agreements, the design of which was to prevent competition in trade, and have held such agreements to be invalid. It is to be noticed that the organization of the "exchange" was of the most formal character. The articles bound all who became members to conform to the regulations. The observance of such regulations by the members was enforced by penalties and forfeitures. A member accused by the secretary of having violated any provision of the constitution or by-laws was required to purge himself by affidavit, although evidence to sustain the charge should be lacking. The shippers of coal were to be notified, in case of persistent default by the member, that "he is not entitled to the privileges of membership in the exchange." No member was permitted to sell coal at less than the price fixed by the exchange. The organization was a carefully devised scheme to prevent competition in the price of coal among the retail dealers, and the moral and material power of the combination afforded a reasonable guaranty that others would not engage in the business in Lockport except in conformity with the rules of the exchange. The cases of Hooker v. Vandewater, 4 Denio, 840, 47 Am. Dec. 258, and Stanton v. Allen, 5 Denio, 484, 49 Am. Dec. 282, are, we think, decisive authorities in support of the judgment in this case. They were cases of combinations between transportation lines on the canals to maintain rates for the carriage of goods and passengers, and the court, in those cases, held that the agreements were void, on the ground that they were agreements to prevent competition; and the doctrine was affirmed that agreements having that purpose, made between independent lines of transportation, were, in law, agreements injurious to trade. In those cases it was not shown that the rates fixed were excessive. In the case in 5 Denio, the judge delivering the opinion referred to the effect of the agreement upon the public revenue from the canals. This was an added circumstance, tending to show the injury which might result from agreements to raise prices or prevent competition. See also, People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 10, 28 Am. Dec. 501; Arnot v. Pittston & E. Coal Co. 68 N. Y. 558, 23 Am. Rep. 190.

The gravamen of the offense of conspiracy is the combination. Agreements to prevent competition in trade are, in contemplation of law, injurious to trade, because they are liable to be injuriously used. The present case may be used as an illustration. The price of coal now fixed by the exchange may be reasonable, in view of the interests both of dealers and consumers, but the organization may not always be guided by the principle of absolute justice. There are some limitations in the constitution of the exchange, but these may be changed, and the price of coal may be unreasonably advanced. It is manifest that the exchange is acting in sympathy with the producers and shippers of coal. Some of the shippers were present when the plan of organization was considered, and it was indicated on the trial that the producers had a similar organization between themselves. If agreements and combinations to prevent competition in prices are, or may be, hurtful to trade, the only sure remedy is to prohibit all agreements of that character. If the validity of such an agreement was made to depend upon actual proof of public prejudice or injury, it would be very difficult, in any case, to establish the invalidity, although the moral evidence might be very convincing. We are of opinion that the principle upon which the case was submitted to the jury is sanctioned by the decisions in this state, and that the jury were properly instructed that, if the purpose of the agreement was to prevent competition in the price of coal between the retail dealers, it was illegal, and justified the conviction of the defendants.

There is a single remaining question. The trial judge was requested by the defendants' counsel, in substance, to charge that the overt act required to be proved to sustain a conviction for conspiracy must be one which might injuriously affect the public, and that the act of the defendants in raising the price of coal was, of itself, not such an overt act as was required. The request was, we think, properly refused. The offense of conspiracy was complete at common law on proof of the unlawful agreement. It was not necessary to allege or prove any overt act in pursuance of the agreement. 3 Chitty, Crim. L. 1142; O'Connell v. Reg. 11 Clark & F. 155. In this state this rule of the common law was changed by the Revised Statutes; and, with certain exceptions, it was provided that no agreement should be deemed a conspiracy "unless some act beside such agreement be done to effect the object thereof by one or more of the parties to such agreement." 2 Rev. Stat. p. 692, § 10. And this principle was re-enacted in the Penal Code, § 171. The object of the statute was to require something more than a mere agreement to constitute a criminal conspiracy. There must be some act in pursuance thereof, and done to effect its object, before the crime was consummated. A mere agreement, followed by no act, is insufficient. The overt act charged in the indictment, and proved, was the raising of the price of coal. The raising of the price of coal by a dealer, unconnected with any conspiracy, is not unlawful; but if there is a conspiracy to regulate the price, and that conspiracy is unlawful, then raising the price is an act done to effect its object, whether the price fixed is reasonable or excessive. The object of the statute is accomplished when it is shown that the parties have proceeded to act upon the agreement, and done anything towards effecting its object. We think there is no error in the record, and the conviction should therefore be affirmed.

CONNECTICUT COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Fairfield County).

Frederick MEAD
v.

Hugh STIRLING.

(62 Conn. 586.)

1. The remedies afforded by the Constitution, laws, and regulations of the order must be exhausted before a worshipful master and presiding officer of a local lodge of ancient, free, and accepted masons can invoke the aid of the courts against the grand master of the grand lodge of the state to prevent suspension.
2. Wrongful acts for the prevention of which injunctions will be granted are those which affect property or its healthful and beneficial use, and never those which affect reputation merely.
3. An allegation of irreparable injury, without stating the facts on which it is based, is not sufficient for an injunction.
4. An allegation of irreparable injury to financial credit, without stating that plaintiff has any credit, or needs any credit, or is engaged in any occupation in connection with which credit would be convenient, is insufficient to obtain an injunction.
5. The fact that a person cannot be reinstated in his office in the masonic order by reversal of a judgment of suspension until after the term of his office has expired is not ground for an injunction against the suspension, the office not being one of profit.
6. The fact that the grand master of a lodge, who is to try the question of misrepresentation as ground for the suspension of a worshipful master of a local lodge, is also the complainant, is not sufficient ground for an injunction from the courts to prevent the exercise of such quasi judicial authority.

(November Term, 1892.)

ON DEMURRER to an application for an injunction to restrain defendant from suspending petitioner from his office as worshipful master of a masonic lodge. Demurrer sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. Warner and J. B. Hurlbutt for plaintiff.

Messrs. M. W. Seymour and G. W. Wheeler for defendant.

Perry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint herein alleges, in substance, that the plaintiff is worshipful master and presiding officer of a local lodge of ancient free and accepted masons, to which office he was elected on an undesignated day in December, 1891, for the term of one year thereafter, and until his successor should be chosen. That said office is one "of honor and position in the lodge and in the order generally outside of the lodge." That the defendant is grand master of the Grand Lodge of Masons of Connecticut, within the jurisdiction of which said local lodge is. That the plaintiff, at a communication of his lodge, truthfully and fairly stated to its members the substance of a certain important conversation relative to their order which he had theretofore held with the defendant, and received and submitted for their consideration, as he believed he was bound to do, certain resolutions, with preambles, which were thereupon offered. That on the day of the date of the complaint, between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock in the forenoon, the plaintiff received a summons from the defendant, acting as grand master, to appear before him on the next day at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause why he should not be suspended from his said office "for having made the statement and receiving said resolutions, charging said statement to be a willful misrepresentation of said conversation." That the defendant proposes to himself determine the question of veracity between them, and "to judge the plaintiff upon such finding, and suspend him from his said office; in other words, to act as judge in his own cause, and further the carrying out" of an ulterior point which he had in view. That, in making the statement complained of, the plaintiff violated no masonic obligation or pledge or any rule of gentlemanly and proper conduct or intercourse. That the defendant has no authority by any masonic law, constitution, or by-law of the grand lodge to try and depose the plaintiff from his said office of honor and trust. That by masonic rules and law the plaintiff is entitled to a trial before an unbiased tribunal of his peers, upon testimony of competent witnesses, and upon charges properly preferred. That no charges have been preferred against the plaintiff or served upon him, as masonic law and rules require. That until charges have been preferred, the defendant, neither as grand master nor in any other capacity, has jurisdiction or authority to suspend the plaintiff as he threatens to do. That the plaintiff has no remedy except by injunction from a court of equity. That the only redress which the plaintiff would have from a decision of the defendant, acting in his capacity of grand master, would be by an appeal, through him, to the Grand Lodge of Connecticut, over which he presides, which "would not, by reason of the bias and determined disposition of the defendant to accomplish his purpose, have before it, to give the plaintiff that fair position before his fellows in his order that he is entitled to, the full question and attendant circumstances which the grand master and himself propose to try, but simply the decision of the grand master." That the grand lodge does not meet until January, 1893, after the plaintiff's term of office has expired; "so that no order of reinstatement upon an overruling of the decision of the grand master can be made, or adequate relief to the plaintiff be granted." And the apprehended damage is then stated as follows: "That an order of suspension of the plaintiff by the defendant would disgrace the plaintiff in the opinion of all regular masons, work him an irreparable injury to his reputation, character, and business, and be published in masonic circles, and otherwise most extensively circulated, injuring his financial credit, and be an impeachment of veracity." An injunction is claimed restraining the defendant from hearing and determining as to the guilt of the plaintiff, and from suspending him from his said office. It will be observed that no specific allegation is made that a grand master has jurisdiction to suspend a worshipful master. On the contrary, the opposite would seem to be really claimed in the complaint. But the case was argued by both parties upon the assumption that such jurisdiction in fact existed, and as if it had been so alleged. The questions herein will therefore be considered as if it affirmatively appeared that the defendant had jurisdiction over the subject-matter in dispute, or, in other words, that he had authority to suspend the plaintiff for a sufficient cause properly proved. If the defendant had no jurisdiction in the premises in any event, then, of course, an injunction would be plainly unnecessary, and should not be granted. To this complaint the defendant demurs, virtually, on three grounds: (1) Because the plaintiff and defendant are bound to conform to the constitution, laws, and regulations of the order to which they both belong; and the remedies thereby afforded, as indicated in the complaint, must first be exhausted before recourse can be had to this tribunal. (2) Because no property rights of the plaintiff are alleged to be threatened by the defendant, and, this being so, the first ground of demurrer is certainly valid, even if invalid otherwise. (3) Because no facts showing such irreparable damage as would warrant an injunction are set forth in the complaint.

Although the circumstances in which the civil courts can be called upon to afford relief where property rights are not threatened must be rare indeed, still it seems to be well settled that, if any such in fact exist, the remedies within the order must first have been exhausted before other relief can be obtained. Accordingly, inasmuch as the plaintiff expects to be deprived merely of "an office of honor and position" in his order, with which no pecuniary emoluments or property benefits are alleged to be connected, the first ground of demurrer might well be disregarded, and the second considered in its place. But a few cases decided by tribunals in high repute hold that the same is true even where property rights are involved, and that, therefore, the first ground of demurrer is well taken also. If the first be sound, the second certainly must be, and therefore those cases will be briefly considered.

Bacon, in his work on Benefit Societies & Life Insurance (sec. 104, top of page 127), says: "There is a great array of judicial authority in favor of the proposition that, where members are expelled from religious societies, social clubs, benevolent societies, and other voluntary organizations incorporated or unincorporated, the judicial courts will not interfere to reinstate them, or to revise the judgment of expulsion, until the expelled member has exhausted all the remedies available to him within the organization itself, by appealing to a higher judicatory provided by the rules of the society, or otherwise." The same rule would of course apply with far greater force to a case of threatened suspension from a mere office in the order, and therefore authorities sustaining the proposition just quoted will control the case at bar. In the case of Lafond v. Deems (1880), 81 N. Y. 507, it was sought to dissolve a voluntary charitable association, and divide its assets, on the ground that the misconduct of its members and their mutual bitterness of feeling and irreconcilable hostility made a winding-up of its affairs and division of its assets necessary. The rules of the order provided for the trial of its members for misconduct, and in that connection for appeals from one tribunal to another within the order. These remedies have not been tried. The court denied the application, and said: "As the members who are claimed by the plaintiffs to have been chargeable with a violation of the rules of the association were not called upon to answer so as to correct the evils complained of, and as the power to remedy the same was ample and complete, the plaintiffs are not in a position to seek the interposition of a court of equity."

... Courts should not, as a general rule, interfere with the contentions and quarrels of voluntary associations so long as the government is fairly and honestly administered, and those who have grievances should be required, in the first instance, to resort to the remedies for redress provided by their rules and regulations. This had not been done in the case considered, and under such circumstances no action lies. None of the authorities cited by the plaintiff's counsel sustain the position that the remedy is at law or in equity, unless there is well-grounded cause for complaint; and even then an opportunity should be given to correct the cause of complaint within the organization where it can be properly done." I understand this to mean that, even if there is "well-grounded cause for complaint" on account of the methods adopted or the result reached by the first tribunal, still the means provided by the rules of the organization for the correction of such errors must first be pursued, before recourse can be had to the courts of the state. And if it be answered that the complaint shows that an appeal from the threatened action of the defendant to the grand lodge could not avail the plaintiff, because of the defendant's "bias and determined disposition" to be unfair to the end, still it surely must be an adequate and proper reply to say that the demurrer cannot be taken to admit that such a court of appeals is unable to and will not rectify any unfairness of the defendant at any stage of the case. Its disposition and ability to do so will be presumed, and, according to this authority must first be tested. In Poultney v. Bachman (1888), 81 Hun, 49, the plaintiff sued the treasurer of a lodge of odd fellows to recover benefits, and recovered judgment in the lower court. The general term, in reversing this judgment, says (page 58): "Again, there is another very important question, namely, whether the plaintiff has any right to bring this action until he has exhausted all remedies by appeal to the superior authorities of the society. . . . It may well be said that the contract, whatever it may be on the part of the lodge, includes in itself a provision for the decision by the appellate tribunals of the society of the matter in dispute; and therefore it may be argued that not until these appellate tribunals have decided against the plaintiff can he say that he has been injured. . . . Without discussing the question whether or not the decision of the highest appellate tribunals of the society is conclusive, we are of the opinion that the contract into which the plaintiff entered requires him first to seek redress within the society itself by carrying the question to the highest tribunal, for it is evident that every part of the constitution and lawful by-laws enter into his contract, and are to be considered therewith." It should be noticed that the rules of the order in this case, as stated and referred to in the report, do not require dissatisfied members to appeal. They only provide for and permit appeals, which the case, in common with others, treats as equivalent to a requirement. In Oliver v. Hopkins (1887), 144 Mass. 175, the plaintiffs, as members of a subordinate council of the Order of United American Mechanics, sued the defendants in equity, as officers of the state council, to recover possession of certain property formerly belonging to the subordinate council, which had been appropriated by the state council after a decree, by annulling the charter of the subordinate council, which decree was claimed to be illegal. An appeal from this decree of the state council was allowed by the rules of the order to the national council, but no appeal had been taken. The court says: "Until the plaintiffs have exhausted the remedies prescribed in the constitution and laws of the national council, this bill in equity cannot be maintained. . . . We are of opinion that the judgment of this court cannot be invoked by the plaintiffs until they have first sought the relief for which they pray from the tribunal provided by the association to try and determine questions of this nature." The case of Chamberlain v. Lincoln (1880), 129 Mass. 70, is an action of the same general character as the above, relates to property rights, and is similarly decided. In McAtee v. Supreme Sitting Order of The Iron Hall (Pa. 1888), 18 Atl. Rep. 755, a member of the defendant order sued it for benefits without first exhausting the remedies provided by the rules of the order in that connection. The court says: "We have often held that a member of a beneficial society must resort for the correction of an alleged wrong to the tribunals of his order, and that the judgment of such tribunals, when resulting fairly from the application of the rules of the society, is final and conclusive." This, of course, means that the society remedies must be pursued to their very end first, and that ultimate unfairness alone can be remedied by outside tribunals. In a dissenting opinion in a similar case in the same court, Mr. Justice Green and an associate say (agreeing in this particular with the majority of the court) that "it is, of course, the duty of the members to exhaust the remedies afforded by the constitution and by-laws of his order or association before resorting to the courts." Sperry's App. 116 Pa. 891. Actions brought by a shareholder against the officers of his corporation are in important respects akin to the cases under consideration, and in such actions it is held that he "must show to the satisfaction of the court that he has exhausted all the means within his reach to obtain within the corporation itself the redress of his grievances or action in conformity to his wishes." Hawes v. Oakland (1881), 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827.

It ought to be added to what has already been said that respectable adjudications exist wherein it appears to be held that, even when property rights are involved, the ultimate decision of the tribunals of the order having jurisdiction not only must be sought, but, when obtained, is final and binding upon the party, even if "not in accordance with its by-laws, or for causes that had no foundation in fact." Schmidt v. Abraham Lincoln Lodge (1886), 84 Ky. 490; Hall v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. (1885), 24 Fed. Rep. 450.

The cases above cited, together with many others in them referred to, are usually quoted as precedents for the doctrine that all remedies within the order must be first exhausted, even if property rights are involved. If they are good law, the first ground of demurrer is, of course, well taken. But although of great, and possibly of controlling, weight, they are not everywhere followed. The doctrine, however, that, where property rights are not threatened, the remedies within the order must first be exhausted, seems to be universally accepted (as has been already stated), which would make the second ground of demurrer unquestionably effective. No decision to the contrary was referred to by the plaintiff. A leading case in which the doctrine of the cases hereinbefore cited is questioned, but the rule relied upon in the second ground of demurrer conceded, is Bauer v. Samson Lodge, K. of P. (1885), 102 Ind. 262, in which the plaintiff sued for benefits. The defendant claimed that he should have first proceeded through its committee on appeal and grievances, which had jurisdiction to grant him the relief asked for. The court says: "The reasonable rule is that such an organization may provide methods for redressing grievances and deciding controversies, and may compel members to resort to the prescribed method of procedure before invoking the power of the courts, but that it may not entirely prohibit members from suing to recover benefits accruing to them under the by-laws of the organization. Men voluntarily enter such organizations, and, in becoming members, subscribed to their laws; and, if these laws make provision for trying controversies, the member aggrieved must pursue the course prescribed before resorting to the courts to enforce his claims. There is no valid reason why he should not be compelled to do what he has agreed, and the harmony and efficiency of such organizations require that all measures provided and required by their by-laws should be exhausted before appealing to the courts to settle the controversy. . . . Claims for money due by virtue of an agreement are unlike mere matters of discipline, or questions of doctrine or of policy, and are not governed by the same rules. . . . One who asserts a claim to money due upon a contract occupies an essentially different position from one who presents a question of discipline or of policy, or of doctrine of the order or fraternity to which he belongs. All the decisions, from first to last, recognize a broad distinction between the two classes of cases, and the one before us belongs to a class where property rights are involved, and is a member of a class cognizable by the courts." The case of People v. Board of Trade (1875), 80 Ill. 134, a leading case in that state, seems to hold, not only that, unless property rights are involved, the plaintiff must pursue his remedy within the order first, but also that he is confined to that. The question under consideration does not appear to have been decided in our own state. The general subject was incidentally referred to in Connolly v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Assn., 58 Conn. 557, 9 L. R. A. 428, but none of the expressions therein used contravene the position taken in the second ground of demurrer.

To briefly recapitulate, then, we have a case in which it is alleged that a superior officer in the order of Masons, having jurisdiction over the subject of the removal of inferior officers, proposes to remove such an inferior officer in an irregular way, and after a partial trial, from which order of removal an appeal lies, by the rules of the order, to a superior tribunal, and to prevent which primary removal an injunction is sought. Upon authority and upon reason it would seem both necessary and eminently proper that the plaintiff should emerge into the domain of the state courts, if at all, from the confines of this order, and not per saltum from its midst. The diligence with which he searches in his complaint after the darkest possible colors in which to paint his impending future would seem to indicate that in all ordinary cases he himself conceives such to be the rule, but believes that the peculiar hardships of his case justify an exception. Right here the third ground of demurrer takes issue with him. The authorities which lay down the rule above proved do not exempt cases of exceptional hardship from it. If such an exception should be made, the defendant claims that this is not such a case, and, further, that, to justify the extraordinary remedy prayed for herein, a case of threatened irreparable injury must be alleged, whatever the rule in other cases may be. While it is difficult to understand how the plaintiff can possibly know what the grand master will eventually do, and while it is impossible to believe that the grand lodge cannot accord to him a fair trial upon appeal if it wishes so to do, which wish is not denied, still certain broad and definite assertions are made in that connection, which to some extent, although I think not to all, must be taken to be admitted pro forma by the demurrer. Even then the defendant claims that a case of "great and irreparable mischief, where adequate relief cannot be had at law" (Whittlesey v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co. 23 Conn. 433), is not made out. I am also of that opinion. The wrongful acts for the prevention of which injunctions will be granted are those which affect property, or its healthful or beneficial use, and never those which affect reputation merely. The only allegations of an apprehended injury to property are that the threatened act will (1) "work him an irreparable injury to his . . . business;" and (2) "be published in masonic circles, and otherwise most extensively circulated, injuring his financial credit." As to the first, it is enough to say that an allegation of "irreparable injury" is never sufficient. "It is well established that the mere allegation of irreparable injury will not suffice to warrant an injunction, but the facts must appear on which the allegation is predicated, in order that the court may be satisfied as to the nature of the injury." High, Inj. § 34; Carlisle v. Stevenson, 3 Md. Ch. 499; Waldron v. Marsh, 5 Cal. 119. As to the second, it should be remarked at the outset that the allegation is argumentative, and not direct, and "merely argumentative allegations or inferences from the facts stated will not suffice to meet the requirements of the rule." High, Inj. § 34. It is nowhere alleged that the plaintiff has any credit, or needs any credit, or is engaged in any occupation in connection with which credit would be even convenient. That he has in fact ample credit is doubtless true. It simply is not so alleged, and therefore does not legally so appear. Clearly, such allegations of apprehended injury are insufficient to bring the plaintiff within the familiar rule relative to injunctions, or to take him without the rule first above considered. If it be sought to infer the danger of substantial or exceptional damage from the earlier allegations of the complaint, it is not easy to see how the publication of the exact facts could possibly injure the plaintiff, or why a garbled or untrue statement of them—the probability of which is not alleged—might not be adequately offset by a counter publication of the truth, while the knowledge that the decree of suspension had been appealed from should, and doubtless would, operate to suspend the judgment of those whose conclusions could ever be of weight or work an injury. The fact that a judgment of reversal by the grand lodge, owing to lapse of time, could not reinstate him in his former office, affects his enjoyment of that office only, which is not one of profit.

The defendant, in his argument, claimed that the position and character, from acting in which he was sought to be enjoined, was judicial, or at least quasi judicial, and that injunctions will not be granted to restrain one so acting. This aspect of the matter is not presented by the demurrer, but was considered by the plaintiff, and merits notice. In Gregg v. Massachusetts Medical Soc. (1872), 111 Mass. 185, 15 Am. Rep. 24, the plaintiff sought to restrain the officers and "Board of Trial" of the defendant society from trying and expelling him from its membership, whereby pecuniary injury would be inflicted upon him. The court, in the course of its opinion, says: "Injunctions issue against parties, and not against courts. And the jurisdiction in this respect has legal limits which apply to proceedings in all courts and tribunals. The general principle is that a court of chancery is not the proper tribunal to correct the errors and irregularities of inferior tribunals, and that in ordinary cases the court should not interfere. . . . The plaintiffs have cited no authority, and we have not been able to find any, which extends to a case like the present, where the inferior tribunal has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the object of the bill is to correct and restrain alleged irregularities in the pleadings and procedure, or in the constitution of the body of triers. In this respect a court of chancery has no more power over the proceedings of a court of special and limited jurisdiction than over the proceedings of courts of general jurisdiction. They might as well issue an injunction to restrain and correct irregularities that are alleged to have occurred in the superior court . . . as in this case." This case, with those herein cited and others of a similar character which may readily be found, would seem to substantiate the defendant's claim. Whatever the remedy may be, it does not seem to be by injunction against the trier. If it be said that in the case at bar the complainant and the trier appear to be one and the same person, it may be applied that such must often be practically the case in contempt proceedings in our state courts, where it would hardly be claimed that irregularities of procedure could be restrained by injunction.

The demurrer is sustained and the foregoing reasons therefor, by request of the defendant, are ordered on file.

NOTE.—Liability of a consolidated railroad company for the debts of its predecessor.

A consolidated railroad company is liable on an implied assumption, for the debts and obligations and torts of the constituent companies. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Boney, 3 L. R. A. 435, 117 Ind. 501; Paine v. Lake Erie & L. R. Co. 31 Ind. 238; Indianapolis, C. & L. R. Co. v. Jones, 29 Ind. 465, 95 Am. Dec. 654; Columbus, C. & I. Cent. R. Co. v. Powell, 40 Ind. 37; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Moffitt, 75 Ill. 524; Coggin v. Central R. Co. 62 Ga. 635; State v. Baltimore & L. R. Co. 77 Md. 439.

Other cases also hold that the consolidated company is liable for the obligations of the original companies, without giving the reasons for imposing such liability. Philadelphia v. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co. 143 Pa. 444; Root v. Oil Creek & Allegheny River R. Co. 31 Phila. Leg. Int. 140; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 37 Ohio St. 232.

Where there was a transfer by one to the other, and a creditor claimed a consolidation and liability, it was held that the first was dissolved, and that a court of equity would consider the assets as a trust fund, to be followed into the hands of a purchaser if he was not bona fide for a good consideration. Powell v. North Missouri R. Co. 42 Mo. 63.

And under an act authorizing "a complete or partial union, and either of joint or separate or absolute, or limited liabilities to third parties," and the union made no provision limiting liabilities to third parties, the effect would be that the new company assumed all the liabilities of the old.

Cayley v. Cobourg P. & M. R. & Min. Co. 14 Grant, Ch. 571.

And in Cashman v. Brownlee, 123 Ind. 206, it was stated that the consolidated company assumes all the liabilities of the original companies; but this was not the question involved in that case.

And a part of a statute of consolidation, repealing all the provisions of their charters not included in the act, which charters imposed a liability for care of streets, was held invalid as not embraced in the title of the act and the liability of the former attached to the new company. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 124 Pa. 219.

A railroad employing an attorney for services in relation to the construction of the connecting line, built with a view to consolidation or operation by the former, will be liable for the same. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Kirkpatrick (Kan.) Oct. 7, 1893.

As to implied liability, see also Berry v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. infra, and heading "Pleading and practice."

Although a purchaser of a consolidated road under decretal sale takes the same free from the conditions, imposed by a county in granting aid to one of the companies, that trains should stop at a station, the new company, by common law and statute, is bound to stop sufficient trains to do the business required. People v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 120 Ill. 48.

These cases fully sustain the doctrine of liability asserted in the main case.

3. A common-law remedy is not taken away by a statutory remedy for the same right, unless the statute expressly denies it, or is so clearly repugnant to the exercise of it as to imply a negative.
4. A license coupled with an interest is irrevocable.

(September 22, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Tippecanoe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover compensation for land taken from plaintiff, over which defendant's road was built. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. H. Spooner and W. H. Lyford, for appellant:

This case was a common-law action for damages resulting from the alleged tortious act of the defendant. Unless the allegations of the complaint establish the wrongdoing of appellant, this action, which presupposes a wrong, cannot be maintained.

Defendant's predecessor was put in lawful possession of appellee's land, under an express license, appellee postponing damages until after the road was constructed.

Could plaintiff revoke a license granted as this was, and after the expenditure of large sums of money, and the building of a railroad under such license? If he could not, then the license was a continuing, irrevocable, valid authority for all acts done by the original company or its successors, in consonance with that license. Where a licensee relying upon the grant, has with the knowledge of the licensor expended large sums of money, although the license was a naked parol one, it cannot be revoked.

Buchanan v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 71 Ind. 265; Miller v. State, 89 Ind. 267; Lane v. Miller, 27 Ind. 534; Ogle v. Dill, 55 Ind. 180; Snouden v. Wilas, 19 Ind. 10, 81 Am. Dec. 870; Stephens v. Benson, 19 Ind. 887.

Can a suit be maintained that is predicated upon a wrong, which this rule says under the facts of this case cannot exist? We say: If there was a contract for the damages which would accrue to you by the building of this road, sue on the contract; or, if there was no contract, then proceed under the ad quod damnum statute, and have your damages assessed in the way provided by the statute.

Stowell v. Flagg, 11 Mass. 364; Summy v. Mulford, 5 Blackf. 202.

The consent of defendant in this case was as effective as a legislative authority would have been, and is as perfect a protection to appellant as though it had taken this land without prior compensation under a constitutional statutory authority. The doing of what the law gives one the right to do cannot be imputed as a tort.

Dill v. Bowen, 54 Ind. 208.

If the theory of the complaint was not to recover damages for tort, but was for the recovery of a debt created by an agreement between plaintiff and defendant, then under the well-settled rules of law, from the facts alleged in the complaint, he could not recover against this defendant. The agreement for the pay-

Assumption of liability by contract.

A consolidated railroad company assuming the debts of the original companies is liable thereon for damages to lands caused by one of the constituent companies. Smith v. Los Angeles & P. R. Co. 98 Cal. 210.

Or for labor performed for a prior company. Western U. R. Co. v. Smith, 75 Ill. 497.

And it is bound by an agreement, allowing other roads to use a right of way. Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843.

Where the contract of consolidation provided that the new company shall not be liable but that the property received by it shall be liable and that the original companies shall continue in existence in order to adjust all claims, a creditor of one of the original companies must reduce his claim to a liquidated demand before he can enforce such claim against the consolidated company. Whipple v. Union Pac. R. Co. 28 Kan. 474.

But under such a consolidation, a contract for the exchange of land, entered on the books of the constituent company, is binding on the new company. McAlpine v. Union Pac. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 168, affirmed Union Pac. R. Co. v. McAlpine, 129 U. S. 305, 32 L. ed. 673.

And this consolidated company is liable in equity for the debt of the former to the extent of assets received, where the former has ceased to exist. Harrison v. Union Pac. R. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 522; Harrison v. Arkansas Valley R. Co. 4 McCrary, 264.

And an agreement of consolidation that the bonds of one of the constituent companies shall be "protected" gives a lien good against all persons except subsequent purchasers without notice. Tyeen v. Wabash R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 768; Compton v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 522.

But where the consolidated company had previously purchased a franchise and roadbed under a deed of trust, assuming only liability on a construction contract, it was not liable for other debts. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Shirley, 54 Tex. 126.

And a contract made by the former Missouri Pacific Railroad Company to use Pullman cars on its road and on roads controlled by it, is binding on the present Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, only as to all roads owned or controlled at the time of consolidation. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 115 U. S. 587, 29 L. ed. 499.

A creditor of one of the constituent companies cannot attach a debt due to it, where his claim accrued after consolidation, and the contract of consolidation bound the new company for the debts of the former companies. Bishop v. Brainerd, 23 Conn. 239.

Statutory liability.

Where the statute of consolidation preserves the rights of the creditors of the constituent companies, the new company is liable for the debts and torts of the original companies. Warren v. Mobile & M. R. Co. 49 Ala. 582; New Bedford R. Co. v. Old Colony R. Co. 120 Mass. 397.

And in adding to the liability imposed on a consolidated company by Taylor's Kan. Stat., par. 1263, such company is liable for the debts and torts of the old companies in the absence of stipulations to the contrary. Berry v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (Kan.) Nov. 11, 1893.

And a successor of a railroad company cannot claim the benefits of the acts of succession without also being subject to the liabilities imposed by the act. Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. v. Boring, 51 Ga. 582.

Bondholders of the consolidated company are bound by an unrecorded contract of an original company, to have a flag station and allow use of land to grantor of right of way, where the statute ment of damages was with the agents of this company's predecessor, and this company is not liable for the ordinary debts of that company.

Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 92 Ind. 487; Gilman v. Sheboygan & F. du L. R. Co. 87 Wis. 817; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 107 Ind. 471; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, 118 Ind. 581; Midland R. Co. v. Smith, Id. 283; Campbell v. Indianapolis & V. R. Co. 110 Ind. 490; Chicago & G. S. R. Co. v. Jones, 103 Ind. 886; Buchanan v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 71 Ind. 265; 2 Rorer, Railroads, §§ 741, 750, 751.

Appellee has mistaken his remedy, assuming he has a cause of action as alleged, and should have proceeded, if he had a valid claim, by the writ of ad quod damnum as provided by the statute.

The statutory remedy was exclusive.

Kimble v. White Water Valley Canal Co. 1 Ind. 287; Conwell v. Hagerstown Canal Co. 2 Ind. 589; Null v. White Water Valley Canal Co. 4 Ind. 485; Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Smith, 6 Ind. 249; Levinson v. Junction R. Co. 7 Ind. 599; New Albany & S. R. Co. v. Connelly, Id. 82; Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Srinney, 97 Ind. 599; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Kinney, 87 Ind. 514.

Where the railroad company, without the consent of the owner, takes possession of his real estate, the owner may resort to any or all the usual remedies known to law, and where the owner does consent, and the company takes possession under his license, he cannot avail himself of all of these remedies; and if this is true, then he must be restricted to some one remedy. The remedy provided by the statute under the ad quod damnum act is ample, and will protect to the fullest extent the interests of the landowner. This being true, he is not remediless, if he is not permitted to avail himself of any but this ample and sufficient remedy.

Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Beck, 119 Ind. 124; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Soltwedde, 116 Ind. 258; Graham v. Columbus & I. Cent. R. Co. 27 Ind. 260, 89 Am. Dec. 498; Bravard v. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. 115 Ind. 1; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 607, and cases cited.

Mr. John R. Coffroth, for appellee:

In Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 107 Ind. 464, the court said: "In such case, the appellant's liability does not rest upon the judgment against the old corporation, but upon the principle that, having adopted and ratified the original appropriation, it is bound in equity and good conscience to make compensation."

"He who derives the advantage ought to sustain the burden."

Broom, Legal Maxims, 706.

The original company had acquired, by license, the right to build its road upon the land in question, without being guilty of trespass, or remitted to the writ of ad quod damnum; and the measure of damages was afterwards to be ascertained by agreement; and when appellant took possession of appellee's land, it affirmed the agreement, and, in equity, made itself liable to pay the damages.

Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Kinney, 87 Ind. 514; Bloomfield R. Co. v. Grace, 112 Ind. 128; consolidating preserves all the rights of the creditors of the original companies. Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Gilmer, 85 Ala. 422.

The New York Act of 1869 saved the rights of all creditors and bondholders of any company embraced in the consolidation authorized by the act, and the respective status of each separate company as respects creditors and bondholders was unimpaired. Vilas v. Page, 106 N. Y. 439.

A consolidated railroad company is personally liable on a mortgage bond and coupon of the former company, under N. Y. Laws 1869, chap. 917, providing that the rights of all creditors and liens upon the property of either shall be preserved, and all debts and liabilities incurred by either of said corporations, except mortgages shall attach to the new one as if it had incurred the debt. Poilemus v. Fitchburg R. Co. 128 N. Y. 502, affirming 50 Hun, 397, in effect overruling Janes v. Fitchburg R. Co. 60 Hun, 810.

In Miller v. Lancaster, 5 Coldw. 514, it was stated that the consolidation of companies pursuant to an act of the legislature imposing liabilities on the new, implies as between the companies the acceptance of the liabilities as declared by the act. But this was not the question involved in that case.

But where a statute protects the creditors of the old company in consolidation, the creditor having a remedy at law, cannot sue in equity to enforce a mere legal right. Arbuckle v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 81 Ill. 429.

In Shaw v. Norfolk County R. Co., 16 Gray, 407, it was held that a statute providing that a constituent company shall not be released from liabilities by consolidation, and providing that all the privileges, property, and liabilities imposed on the two shall appertain to the united corporation as if acquired under an original charter, does not require the assumption of liabilities incurred by the former companies, but confers the privileges and imposes the obligations of all railroad companies under the general law, and the company acquiring the franchise of another, subject to the rights of its creditors, might also purchase the outstanding bonds and hold them like any other creditor, or pay and discharge them to relieve their own from the mortgages.

And a consolidated company is not liable for the debts of a former company on an act passed after consolidation, which act made consolidated companies liable for prior debts of old companies, and where the company creating this debt had been sold under a deed of trust prior to consolidation. Hatcher v. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. 62 Ill. 477, 6 Am. Ry. Rep. 405.

As to statutory liability, see "Liens and priorities."

Liens and priorities.

A prior lien against an original company is not lost or prejudiced by consolidation. Hamlin v. Jerrard, 72 Me. 62; Rutten v. Union Pac. R. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 480.

And this is so where the consolidating act preserved their rights. Spence v. Mobile & M. R. Co. 79 Ala. 576.

And a vendor's lien on one of the original companies is binding on the property of the company in the hands of the consolidated company. North Carolina R. Co. v. Drew, 8 Woods, C. C. 662.

A purchaser of land at judicial sale, on a judgment against the consolidated company, will not acquire a superior title over a purchaser under a subsequent judgment on a prior unrecorded mortgage made by one of the original companies, of which the consolidated company had notice by implication, and assumed all the liabilities of the former. Mississippi Valley Co. v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. 68 Miss. 346.

Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, supra; Bloomfield R. Co. v. Van Slike, 107 Ind. 480; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, 118 Ind. 308.

The remedy by ad quod damnum is not exclusive.

Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Clifford, 113 Ind. 467; Harshbarger v. Midland R. Co. 131 Ind. 177; Lane v. Miller, 22 Ind. 104; Summy v. Mulford, 5 Blackf. 202; Toney v. Johnson, 28

Dailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted in the Benton circuit court, but on change of venue was tried in the Tippecanoe circuit court. The first

A statute of consolidation providing that "all rights of creditors and all liens upon the property of either of said corporations shall be preserved unimpaired" clearly distinguishes debts secured by liens from debts not so secured, and does not create a lien in favor of bonds of one company not secured before consolidation and issued thereafter. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Ham, 114 U. S. 587, 29 L. ed. 235.

A sale of a consolidated railroad was ordered, as a whole, where mortgage liens were on the several original roads, the decree providing for an equitable distribution of the proceeds according to the liens. Gibert v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 33 Gratt. 586.

As to liens, see also Compton v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 522; and Tysen v. Wabash R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 763.

Pleading and practice.

A complaint against a consolidated company on a debt of a prior company, alleging such liability and the consolidation and the resulting liability of the consolidated company, was sufficient. Collins v. Chicago, St. P. & F. du L. R. Co. 14 Wis. 492.

And the same was held, where it did not state the implied liability of the consolidated company. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Prewitt (Ind.) 54 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 198.

And failure to allege that the tort was committed by one of the constituent companies in a petition against the consolidated company will be disregarded on appeal. Indianapolis, C. & L. R. Co. v. Jones, 29 Ind. 466, 95 Am. Dec. 654.

After consolidation where the new company is liable for the debts of the old, an action therefor must be brought against the new one by name. Indianola R. Co. v. Freyer, 56 Tex. 609.

And an action on a note made by one of the prior companies may be against the new company by its new name, where the consolidation act so provides. Columbus, C. & I. Cent. R. Co. v. Skidmore, 69 Ill. 566.

But it was held in Selma, R. & D. R. Co. v. Harbin, 40 Ga. 706, and Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. v. Langton, 32 Mich. 251, that some showing must be made setting out such facts as will indicate a liability of the consolidated company for a debt of one of the prior companies.

Where companies are consolidated pending an action against one of them, and the new company is liable for the debts of such constituent company, the petition may be amended setting up the consolidation and alleging the liability of the new company. Kinton v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 39 Mo. App. 574; Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Hendricks, 41 Ind. 48.

And in the latter case it was held that such amendment did not state a new cause of action as affected by the statute of limitations. See Boardman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. infra.

And such an amendment was proper. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Murphy, 46 Tex. 360, 28 Am. Rep. 272.

This was on the ground that the presumption is that the new company succeeds to all the rights, powers, and privileges of the former,—citing Stephenson v. Texas & P. R. Co. 42 Tex. 162.

And an order allowing plaintiff to file a supplemental complaint bringing in the new company, which had assumed all of the contracts, liabilities, and obligations of the original companies, was properly granted. Prouty v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 85 N. Y. 272.

Although an order made on a motion substituting a new company after a report of a referee as to liability of old, was error as the liability of the new one must be on its assumption of liabilities of others, and not by a summary process of a motion to insert the name as defendant—where such company did not participate in the proceedings before the referee. Prouty v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 52 N. Y. 363.

The writ was properly amended so as to show that the proper party defendant to an action against a railroad company as common carrier was the consolidated company, which was confessedly liable for the loss, as this amendment simply held in court the party already brought there under a wrong name. Hosford v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 47 Vt. 583.

An action against a company does not abate by reason of its consolidation with another company. Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Musselman, 2 Grant, Cas. 348; East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. Evans, 6 Heisk. 607; Gale v. Troy & B. R. Co. 51 Hun. 470.

And in Mississippi the plaintiff in an action pending is not prejudiced by a consolidation of the defendant with another company, as the original corporation exists as to him until after judgment, and he can take judgment against the same by its former name. After judgment scire facias may be the appropriate remedy to charge the new corporation on its legal obligation, but he cannot have scire facias until after judgment. Schackelford v. Mississippi Cent. R. Co. 52 Miss. 15.

But it was held in Kansas, O. & T. R. Co. v. Smith, 40 Kan. 192, that all proceedings by or against the original company by its original name after consolidation, in an action then pending, are void as the company ceases to exist, and an appeal by the original company in condemnation proceedings, was dismissed; and section 40 of the Code providing that in case of transfer of interest the action may be continued in the name of the original party, was held inapplicable, as that part of the section only applies where such original party still exists.

The obligation to pay, by the consolidated company, does not give priority on the calendar of the court, under N. Y. Code, § 791, subsec. 8, giving priority to an action against a corporation founded upon a note or other evidence of debt for the absolute payment of money. Polhemus v. Fitchburg R. Co. 118 N. Y. 617.

A foreign corporation cannot plead the statute of limitations and where there is a consolidation, and in New York the statute does not run until the date of consolidation. Boardman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 157. See Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Hendricks, 41 Ind. 48.

Matters relating to, "Liability of purchasing railroads;" "Liability of lessee;" "Rights of stockholders;" "Exemption from taxation",—are omitted from this note.

paragraph of complaint is a common action for ejectment. This was dismissed before trial. The second paragraph is substantially as follows: "And said plaintiff above named, further complaining of defendant above named, says that he is now, and for ten years last past has been, the owner in fee of the following real estate in Benton county, Indiana, to wit, the southeast quarter of section 7, township 24 north, range 7 west, containing 160 acres, and at the time of the happening of the grievances hereinafter complained of he was, and for a long time prior thereto had been, using all of said land as one farm; that on the — day of August, 1881, the Chicago & Great Southern Railway Company, a corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Indiana in that behalf enacted, desired to construct its road through a part of said land, to wit, the southwest quarter thereof, and applied to plaintiff to pay him for a right of way through the same; that plaintiff then informed said company that it would be impossible for him to state what damage the construction of the road through his premises would be to him or his land until the same was constructed; that thereupon it was agreed between plaintiff and said company that the latter should construct its road across plaintiff's said land, and that as soon as said road was completed said company would pay him the damages occasioned; that pursuant to said agreement said company, in 1882, constructed its road over the southwest quarter of said real estate, occupying a strip fifty feet wide, beginning sixty-six and one-half rods north of the southwest corner of said 40-acre tract; thence in a southeasterly direction through said premises, leaving the same at a point 78½ rods east of the southwest corner thereof, which is now occupied and covered by the roadbed of this defendant; that defendant afterwards operated its trains over the same, thereby greatly injuring and damaging plaintiff, in this; that the strip of land is, and was at the time it was taken, of the value of $300; that plaintiff's said farm of 160 acres is cut into two pieces, thereby decreasing the value thereof, and the fields are carved into odd and inconvenient shapes, requiring a large amount of additional fencing, greatly interfering with the use of said farm in raising and handling stock, and rendering the property liable to be burned, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $2,500; that said Chicago & Great Southern Railway Company refused to pay said damages, though he demanded the same, and said license theretofore given said company became and was revoked by plaintiff; that on November 1, 1890, and April 9, 1893, said company executed to John C. New, trustee, two certain deeds of trust upon all the franchises, rights, and privileges, and all the real and personal property of said company, of every kind and character, the first one to secure the payment of 2,000 bonds, each for the sum of $1,000, which said mortgages were duly recorded in the Record of Mortgages in the recorder's office of said Benton county, the first one on November 28, 1891, in Record 11, page 455; that afterwards Henry H. Porter, holder of a majority of said bonds so issued, brought an action against said maker and others, in the United States circuit court for the district of Indiana, to foreclose said mortgage, but this plaintiff was not a party thereto; that such proceedings were had in said court; that on February 16, 1886, a decree of foreclosure was entered, and on March 27, 1886, said Chicago & Great Southern Railway Company, its property, franchises, etc., was sold by William P. Fishback, master commissioner, under order of said court, at public auction, and that said Porter purchased the same, and received a deed therefor by order of said court, and said New, trustee as aforesaid, also conveyed the property covered by said deeds to said Porter on April 20, 1886; that afterwards Porter, together with others, organized a company for the purpose of operating the said railway, said company being organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Indiana in that behalf enacted, under the name of the Indiana Railway Company, and said Porter conveyed and transferred to the last-named company the property, rights, and privileges so purchased by him; that the Chicago & Indiana Railway Company was a railway company duly organized under the laws of Indiana in that behalf enacted; that afterwards said Indiana Railway Company and said Chicago & Indiana Coal Railway Company were consolidated, said consolidated company taking the name of the last-named company, and said company is now occupying the last above described real estate of plaintiff under and by virtue of said proceedings, and none other; that after said Chicago & Great Southern Railway Company had constructed its track across plaintiff's aforesaid land, it used, occupied, and enjoyed said premises, and operated its trains over the same, for more than two years, and that defendant company is now, and for more than one year last past has been, using, occupying, and enjoying the same, and operating its trains over it, without right, and during all of said time has unlawfully kept the plaintiff out of possession thereof; that said Chicago & Great Southern Railway Company is, and was at the time of the foreclosure and sale, and ever since has been, insolvent; that prior to the commencement of this suit he demanded of defendant the payment of said damages to his land, but it failed and refused to pay the same, and he then demanded possession of said real estate, and revoked the license under which it was using, occupying, and enjoying said land. Wherefore, plaintiff demands judgment for $5,000, for the recovery of said land, and all other proper relief." To the second paragraph of complaint, appellant answered—Firstly, the statute of limitations of six years; and, secondly, a special plea. A demurrer to each of these answers was filed, overruled to the first, and sustained to the second. The record recites that the appellant did file answers and interrogatories; that appellee did file demurrers to these answers; but neither of them is in the record, and the record also recites the ruling of the court thereon. But subsequently the ruling upon the demurrer to these answers was vacated, and appellant thereupon filed its two paragraphs of answer,—the only ones in the record. To these paragraphs a demurrer was filed, which was overruled as to the first, and sustained as to the second, but to this ruling there was no exception saved by appellant. The record reads as follows: "And the court, being sufficiently advised, now sustains the said demurrer to the fourth paragraph of answer to the second paragraph of complaint, to which ruling of the court the plaintiff then and there excepted. The court now overrules the demurrer to the second paragraph of answer to the first paragraph of complaint, and also now overrules the demurrer to the third paragraph of answer to the second paragraph of complaint, to which rulings of the court, and each of them, upon each of said demurrers, the plaintiff then and there excepted; and the plaintiff now files his reply to the second paragraph of answer to the first paragraph of complaint." The errors assigned are as follows: Firstly, the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; secondly, the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the second paragraph of complaint; thirdly, in sustaining demurrer to fourth paragraph of answer to the second paragraph of complaint; fourthly, in overruling defendant's motion to set aside default taken against appellant, and to vacate judgment; fifthly, in overruling defendant's motion for a new trial. This cause was tried by the court, and judgment rendered on the second paragraph of complaint, the first paragraph having been eliminated from the cause before trial.

Counsel for appellant discuss the sufficiency of the complaint under its first assignment of error, and upon the overruling of the demurrer to the second paragraph of the complaint, on the theory that the complaint seeks to recover for a tortious appropriation of plaintiff's lands by defendant company, and as the facts disclosed by it clearly put defendant's predecessor in lawful possession of appellee's land, under an express license, appellee postponing damages until after the road was constructed, appellant was not a wrongdoer, and for the occupancy up to this time could not have been sued in an action founded upon tort, and that having entered upon a parol license, upon the faith of which appellant expended large sums of money in constructing and equipping the road, the licensor will be held estopped from revoking the license until the licensee can be placed in statu quo, and hence that at no time could appellant have become a trespasser. Counsel quote from Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, 118 Ind. 308, in which the court says: "What we affirm is that acquiescence after public rights have intervened will prevent a landowner from destroying the line of road by wresting possession of a part of it from the company. . . . A citizen who has stood by until after the completion of a line of road has involved public interests shall not be allowed to sever the line, and destroy its efficiency, by wresting possession of a part of it from the company." It is stare decisis that a license, coupled with an interest, is irrevocable. Campbell v. Indianapolis & V. R. Co. 110 Ind. 490; Evansville 23 L. R. A.

& T. H. R. Co. v. Nye, 118 Ind. 228; Chicago & G. S. R. Co. v. Jones, 103 Ind. 886; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Solttwedde, 116 Ind. 257; Buchanan v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 71 Ind. 265; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Michener, 117 Ind. 465; 2 Rorer, Railways, §§ 741-751. "The doing of what the law gave her a right to do cannot be imputed as a tort." Dill v. Bowen, 54 Ind. 208. The authorities above cited and relied upon by appellant would be entirely pertinent to the first paragraph of complaint in ejectment, had it remained in the record, or to an action for trespass, but we think counsel are mistaken in their claim that appellant is charged as a trespasser, and by inadvertence misconstrue the pleading. The correct theory of the complaint is the one adopted by the trial court, viz.: it is a statement of facts to show the creation of an equity to damages for the taking and use of land to show that the old company entered, constructed, and operated its road over the land in dispute by consent of plaintiff, without payment of damages occasioned thereby, which were to be ascertained and paid when the road was built. The pleading negatives every fact inconsistent with the integrity of this equity, and shows circumstantially the relation of all the parties to this strip of land, and that plaintiff is without compensation. It does not seek to recover for a breach of agreement made by the old company and the plaintiff, but for a breach of equitable duty laid on the defendant by force of the facts that it has taken his land, and is using and holding it, in the same plight as its predecessor held it, and that plaintiff is entitled to, and is without, compensation. The new company is enjoying the easement under the conditions of the old company, and the benefits and burdens incident to its use are inseparable, in the absence of any relevant act or omission of the defendant. The equitable principle applicable here, as in many other cases, is that he who derives an advantage ought to sustain the burden. Mr. Brown says: "A man will be bound by that which would have bound those under whom he claims quoad the subject-matter of the claim, and no man can, except in certain cases, which are regulated by the statute law and the law-merchant, transfer to another a better right than he himself possesses. The grantee shall be in no better condition than he who made the grant." This doctrine was fully recognized in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Griffin, 107 Ind. 484, in this statement: "On the former appeal of this cause we held that if this averment were true it showed the appellant's election to adopt the original appropriation of appellee's premises by its entry upon, use, and occupation of, such premises, for the purposes of its railroad." We then said: "In such case the appellant's liability does not rest upon the judgment against the old corporation, but, upon the principle of having adopted and ratified the original appropriation, it is bound, in equity and good conscience, to make compensation, for the right of the appellees for compensation for their property is protected by the constitution, and it will not do to say that their unsatisfied judgment against the old, insolvent corporation affords them any compensation. The maxim applies 'Qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus.'" In Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bonney, 117 Ind. 501, 8 L. R. A. 435, the court says: "Where a consolidation of railroad companies takes place, in pursuance of the statute, the corporation into which the original companies are merged becomes liable for all the valid debts and obligations of the consolidated company, and a judgment in personam may be rendered against it therefor." The same doctrine is declared in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Prewitt (Ind.) 83 N. E. Rep. 867, and cases there cited. This is now settled law. The averments of the second paragraph of complaint, concerning what is styled a revocation of appellant's license and the demand for possession, are mere surplusage, in view of the chief line of averments to which we have referred.

But the learned counsel for appellant urge with much vigor another reason why this demurrer should have been sustained, viz., assuming that appellee has a cause of action, he should have proceeded by the writ of ad quod damnum, as provided by statute, and that, having misconceived his action, he must fail here; that it is a common-law remedy, and the statute provides an ample remedy, of which appellee could avail himself, to the exclusion of the common-law remedy. Counsel insist that he is probably restricted to the one specified in the statutes, and that it is exclusive. The statutory remedy is provided for in section 8958, Rev. Stat. 1881, and is in this language: "If, from any cause, there shall be any failure of the right of way, or when the title thereto has not been acquired, upon which any railroad of this state is now constructed, it shall be lawful for the company owning the road, or for the party owning such lands upon which any part of the road is constructed, to apply to the proper court for the writ for the assessment of damages, and have the damages which the owner of said property has sustained, or may sustain by reason of the taking, use, and occupancy thereof by the company for the construction and maintenance of said road; and upon the assessment and payment of the company of the damages which may be assessed or awarded, the title to such property shall vest absolutely in the company for the purposes of the said railroads," etc. In this case the appellant insists upon the broad proposition that, when any work of a public character is authorized by an act of the legislature, and a mode of obtaining compensation for private property to be taken for its construction is specifically pointed out, such compensation must be sought in the way prescribed by the act, and not otherwise. On the other hand, appellee contends that the method thus pointed out by the statute is cumulative, and does not defeat or take away the common-law remedy. It will be observed that the language of the statute is: "It shall be lawful for the company owning the road, or for the party owning such lands, upon which any part of the road is constructed, to apply to the proper court for the writ for assessment of damages," etc. It does not specify that it shall be so done, but it designates no plan other than the writ for such assessment. In no analogous cases under this statute has the point ever been decided adverse to appellee, but the court has on several occasions expressed dicta in relation to the matter in ejectment suits and actions for trespass. In Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Beck, 119 Ind. 124, which was a possessory action, the court says "that a landowner who stands by, without demanding compensation, until a railroad company has so far completed and put in operation its road as to involve the public interest, can neither enjoin the company, nor maintain ejectment to recover his land. The only remedy left to the landowner, in such a case, is to proceed, within the proper time, to have his damages assessed and enforced against the railroad company. This rule is founded upon the general principles of public policy, as well as upon the provisions of section 8958, Rev. Stat. 1881." In Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Swinney, 97 Ind. 599, the court says: "The accepted doctrine now is that where a railroad company, or other corporation possessing similar powers, takes possession and enters into the use of real estate without the consent of the owner, and without taking the necessary means to acquire the title it assumes to assert, the owner may resort to any or all of the usual remedies known to the law for the protection of his estate in the property." The doctrine thus expressed, appellant claims, leaves, by implication, the converse of the rule, namely, that where the owner does consent, and the company takes possession under his license, he cannot avail himself of all these remedies, but must be limited in his remedies to one or more of them. In Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Clifford, 113 Ind. 467, also a possessory suit, the court says: "The counsel for appellant are in error in assuming that the only remedy to the landowner is that given by statute. He is not confined to that remedy, but, in the proper case, may prosecute an action for damages or possession." In Harshbarger v. Midland R. Co., 181 Ind. 177, which was an action to recover for lands appropriated by defendant company, and acquiesced in by the owner, the court says: "It is a right of action existing in the owner at the time of the appropriation and the creation of the right of action separate and distinct from the land. The right of action occurred at the time when the ancestor might have maintained an action for damages, or instituted proceedings to have his damages assessed." In Lane v. Miller, 22 Ind. 104, the court says: "The objection made to the complaint is that, as the law on the assessment of damages has given a person whose lands are injured by the erection of a milldam a remedy by writ of assessment of damages, he is confined to that remedy, and cannot resort to his action at common law." In Snowden v. Wilas, 19 Ind. 10, 81 Am. Dec. 870, a query is raised whether he should not be confined to the statutory remedy, but the point has never been decided by this court. In Summey v. Mulford, 5 Blackf. 202, the point, after full examination, was ruled the other way. In Toney v. Johnson, 26 Ind. 352, a milldam case, the court says: "It is insisted that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, on the ground that the remedy provided by statute excludes any other proceeding. Such has not been the view taken by this court. From the organization of this court, actions like the present have been sustained. The distinction between statutes which are exclusive, and those which simply provide a cumulative remedy, is stated in Jang v. Scott, 1 Blackf. 405, 12 Am. Dec. 257. If a statute is introductory of new rights, which did not before exist in the country, and prescribes a penalty for their violation, the persons claiming under the act must depend for the security of the right thus claimed upon the provisions therein specified. When there is a pre-existing right at common law, and an affirmative statute intervenes, inflicting a new penalty, the law is otherwise." In Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, 118 Ind. 588, the court uses this language: "Our conclusion is, that acquiescence does defeat the action of ejectment, unless there are countervailing facts, or some element which nullifies the force of the acquiescence. We do not assert that it will defeat any action where only compensation is sought. . . . Compensation he may recover, possession he cannot. To the recovery of just compensation his rights are confined." These various opinions expressed by judges on points that did not necessarily arise in most of those cases, and were not directly involved in them, seem somewhat conflicting; but, taking the language employed in section 8958, "it shall be lawful for the company owning the road, or the party owning the lands, . . . to apply to the proper court for the writ of assessment," etc., excludes the idea that the common-law right of action for damages is abrogated, and supports the theory that the statute furnishes him this remedy in addition to the one with which he was vested under the common law. But, for the purposes of this case, we do not regard it necessary to decide this question. If appellant had preferred the writ of assessment, it also had a right to invoke the aid of the statute, from its very terms, and thereby avoid the direct suit for damages, of which it complains. The license, according to its theory, not having estopped appellee from asserting a claim under the writ, appellant would not be deprived of the benefits of the statutory remedy. To be denied by statute a remedy possessed before its enactment, its terms should be express, or so clearly repugnant to the exercise of it as to imply a negative. Parties are not compelled to avail themselves of statutory privileges, where they agree among themselves to adjust their own controversies in a different manner. The law fosters and encourages compromises and settlements of questions in dispute, in lieu of litigation, where conscionable terms can be agreed upon. The machinery of statutory law is at times cumbersome and unwieldy, and the administration of justice under it quite expensive. If, to avoid costs of litigation, they waive its provisions, and agree on a cheaper and more direct plan, looking to equitable relief, courts should uphold and enforce its provisions. In this case, as stated, appellant's predecessor applied to appellee, before the road was constructed, to pay him for this right of way. Appellee then informed the company that he could not tell the extent of his damage until the road was constructed. Thereupon, it was agreed that the company might construct its road across appellee's land, and when completed it would pay the damage occasioned. It occurs to us that by force of this license and agreement the parties dispensed with the writ of ad quod damnum, and agreed that the damages should be ascertained by mutual stipulation. If the original company had remained in possession, it could have been compelled to pay. Appellant got no better title under the foreclosure proceedings than its predecessor had. Why should it not be compelled to do justice to the wronged landowner? The original company had acquired the right to build its road upon the land in question without being guilty of trespass, or remitted to the writ of ad quod damnum, and the measure of damages, as suggested, was afterwards to be ascertained by agreement. When appellant took possession of appellee's land, it affirmed the agreement, and, in equity, made itself liable to pay the damages. "Acquiescence on the part of the landowner, though acting as a waiver of his right to maintain ejectment, is by no means a waiver of his right to damages such as would have been recovered in a regular condemnation proceeding." 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 860. Appellant is possessed of a license which, being irrevocable, renders it as secure in its possession as an easement, and "an easement once acquired becomes a privilege in favor of the dominant estate, and a burden imposed upon the servient estate, and subsequent grantees take it subject to the privilege or burden." Ballard, Real Estate Statutes, § 866. The appellant does not discuss the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding, and the question is therefore waived.

Judgment affirmed.

*1. Where a married woman leaves the home of herself and husband, the title to which was in the husband, and remains away nearly three years before claiming any homestead interest in the property, but the husband remains in constant occupancy of the land, keeping his home thereon, such absence alone will not constitute abandonment by the wife of her home-

Effect of divorce on homestead rights.Husband's claim to homestead, where decree of divorce is silent.

A husband liable for the support of his children does not lose his homestead rights in his land by reason of a divorce. Redfern v. Redfern, 38 Ill. 509; Byers v. Byers, 21 Iowa, 298; Biffle v. Pullam, 114 Mo. 50.

And in Doyle v. Coburn, 6 Allen, 71, it was held that a husband does not lose his homestead rights even where the custody of the child is awarded to the mother, as he may adopt other members of his household; and it is not lost by death or absence of wife and children, and it is for the benefit of the husband as well as the wife.

And the same was held in Woods v. Davis, 34 Iowa, 284, where the custody of the children was awarded to the wife, but the husband was still liable for support of his children.

These cases fairly support the doctrine announced in the main case.

But where the homestead is given to a "head of a family," and the husband has no family of his own dependent on him residing on the land, and his wife has the care and support of their child, a finding that he has abandoned the idea of having a homestead for a family, and had ceased to be the head of a family after his divorce, will be sustained. Cooper v. Cooper, 24 Ohio St. 488.

And under N. H. Laws 1868, chap. 1, giving a homestead to a "wife, widow, and children" where the custody of the children was awarded to her, his interest was subject to levy for her judgment of alimony—as his or her family did not occupy the same. Wiggin v. Buzzell, 58 N. H. 329.

And under Indiana 2 Rev. Stat. 1876, providing for exemption on "a debt growing out of or founded upon a contract, express or implied," there is no exemption to the husband on a judgment for alimony in favor of the wife. Menzie v. Anderson, 65 Ind. 230.

After divorce, a husband may convey to his former wife his interest in the homestead, and a mortgage made by her on the same after such conveyance will be valid. Grupe v. Byers, 73 Cal. 271.

A husband who believed he was divorced, and married another woman and then made a mortgage on the homestead, and after foreclosure sale obtained a decree of divorce from his first wife, cannot claim his homestead as against the purchaser. Trout v. Rumble, 82 Mich. 232.

Wife's claim to homestead, where decree of divorce is silent.

A divorced wife has no claim on her husband's homestead where the decree of divorce makes no disposition of the same. Heaton v. Sawyer, 60 Vt. 495; Stahl v. Stahl, 114 Ill. 875.

stead rights. Whether or not, in such a case, a wife could, under any circumstances, forfeit her homestead rights under our statute, not decided.

2. In divorce proceedings it is competent for the court to assign the homestead to the innocent party, either absolutely or for a limited period; but, where the decree in the divorce proceedings is silent upon the question, the homestead will, upon the dissolution of the marriage, remain in possession of the party holding the legal title thereto, discharged from all homestead rights or claims of the other party.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Steele County in

And the same was held where she was in fault, and the statute provided that any estate granted by the laws of this state to the husband and wife in the property of the other, shall be forfeited by the party at fault, in a divorce. Rendleman v. Rendleman, 118 Ill. 267.

In this case the divorce was rendered in Kansas, but the jurisdiction of that court was sustained.

So where she had not made any homestead declaration, as required by the statute, she could not resist a mortgage foreclosure on the same. Bunnel v. Stockton, 83 Cal. 319.

But under Mo. Rev. Stat., § 2689, providing that a married woman may file her claim to a tract of land occupied as a homestead if she is abandoned by her husband, and after such claim the husband cannot sell it, a claim so filed will protect the rights of the wife as against the husband's creditors even if she afterwards obtains a divorce, where she is the head of a family. Blandy v. Asher, 72 Mo. 27.

And under Mass. Gen. Stat., chap. 107, § 40, providing that on dissolution of marriage for any cause except adultery, the wife shall be entitled to the possession of her estate, she may recover property deeded to her, and in the possession of her former husband, although the deed contained a statement that it was to be held by him as a homestead, but the habendum clause was to her and to her heirs. Dunham v. Dunham, 128 Mass. 84.

In Whetstone v. Coffey, 43 Tex. 209, it was held that a divorced wife is not precluded from asserting her claim to community property occupied as a homestead, and sold by her husband without her consent, although the decree of divorce did not dispose of the community property.

And under Tex. Rev. Stat., art. 2864, providing that in a decree of divorce the court may divide the estate of the parties, but that nothing shall be construed, to compel either party to divest him or herself of the title to real estate, and the court makes no order in regard to the community property occupied as a homestead, the divorced wife residing thereon may claim one half thereof as against her former husband's creditors. Kirkwood v. Domnanu, 80 Tex. 645.

And the same was held in Craig v. Craig, 31 Tex. 203, but the other part of the decree, awarding the other half of the property to the child, was erroneous.

It was held in Sellon v. Reed, 5 Biss. 125, that where the wife resided on the homestead at the time of divorce, and by the decree was awarded the care of the child, and thus continued as the head of the family, and alimony was not awarded in lieu of the homestead, she may retain the same as against a grantee of her former husband. This decision seems against the weight of authority.

favor of defendant in a proceeding to determine adverse claims to certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. W. Ames and Carmody & Leslie, for appellant:

No order being made in the decree of divorce which dissolved the status, regarding the homestead, its disposition after the divorce must be as directed by statute, and Nelson having no lawful wife to join him in the deed, he was free to convey by his deed alone. This would certainly pass the legal title, even if a homestead right did exist.

Stahl v. Stahl, 114 Ill. 875; Waples, Homesteads & Exemptions, 265, § 6, and cases cited.

Our statute evidently contemplated that the homestead should remain with the owner of the fee simple, if he is in possession and continues his home thereon, or be disposed of by the court in the decree of divorce, as provided in section 2585 of Compiled Laws. If not so disposed of, the dissolution of the marriage dissolves all rights growing out of the relation of marriage, such as dower, etc., and they not being reserved in the decree are lost.

Wiggin v. Buzzell, 58 N. H. 329; Heaton v. Sawyer, 60 Vt. 495; Kirkwood v. Domnau, 80 Tex. 645.

No reason exists why all such rights could not be adjusted in the divorce suit.

Byers v. Byers, 21 Iowa, 268.

Mr. J. H. Bosard, for respondent:

although based on Vanzant v. Vanzant and Bonnell v. Smith, infra, but in these latter cases the wife was awarded the homestead in the divorce decree.

Decree awarding homestead.

Generally the court in rendering the decree of divorce may make an equitable distribution of the property, and may award the homestead to one of the parties. Lowell v. Lowell, 55 Cal. 316; Snodgrass v. Snodgrass, 40 Kan. 494; Cole v. Cole, 27 Wis. 581; Harran v. Harran, 85 Wis. 299; Cole v. Cole, 28 Iowa, 438; Brandon v. Brandon, 14 Kan. 842; Webster v. Webster, 64 Wis. 438.

And a decree of divorce awarding to the wife to "have and hold her present homestead as alimony, with the right to rent the same until the youngest child becomes of age," is valid, as the question of alimony is discretionary. Jolliff v. Jolliff, 32 Ill. 527.

And where the wife was awarded the custody and care of the children and the homestead, she was entitled to the same as against her husband's creditors. Vanzant v. Vanzant, 23 Ill. 536; Bonnell v. Smith, 53 Ill. 375.

And under Tennessee Code, § 2046, providing that the title to the homestead shall be vested, by decree of the court granting the divorce, in the wife, and after her death it shall pass to the children, where the property is held by husband and wife as joint owners as tenants by entireties, and the decree gives it to her, she may assert her claim to the same, as against his creditors. Shelton v. Orr, 12 L. R. A. 514, 89 Tenn. 82.

Under Texas constitution and statutes giving to a citizen, a homestead free from the power of any court to divest him of the same, the court may decree in divorce, that the wife may have the use of his homestead, but it cannot give her more than a life estate in the same. Tiemann v. Tiemann, 34 Tex. 522.

And the court has power to make a decree that the alimony awarded is a lien on the homestead, where it may give the homestead to the wife. Blankenship v. Blankenship, 19 Kan. 159; Daniels v. Morris, 54 Iowa, 399; Hemenway v. Wood, 53 Iowa, 21.

A homestead established on community property may be divided in decree of divorce by the court the same as other common property. Trigg v. Trigg (Tex.) Dec. 3, 1891; Gimmy v. Doane, 22 Cal. 635.

And in Richey v. Hare, 41 Tex. 336, it was held that if community property decreed to be divided in a divorce was a homestead, it was not subject to sale by community creditors, but if not a homestead it was liable for community debts contracted before the institution of the divorce suit.

In Zapp v. Strohmeyer, 75 Tex. 638, it was held that where the homestead was divided by the court, 23 L. R. A.

and the decree did not give the custody of the children to either, and the children except one remained with the mother, and this one sometimes visited his father, the part allotted to the father was exempt from execution for costs in the case, and the court said that "the head of the family, or the two heads of families that there may be after the divorce, are entitled to hold their homestead against the forced sale, without regard to the causes of divorce; provided, that as to creditors who were such at the date of the divorce not more than two hundred acres of the existing homestead will be included in the exemptions to both." This decision asserting that a homestead may be split in a divorce suit, and two homesteads then exist, is novel, although the reasoning of the court on the facts of the case appears plausible.

But in Shoemaker v. Chalfant, 47 Cal. 432, it was held that a decree dividing the homestead "severed the sort of joint-tenancy of the parties in the homestead premises, which had been created by the homestead declaration, the residence of the parties, etc., under the provisions of the homestead act. It also destroyed the right of survivorship. . . . The family, for whose benefit the provisions of the homestead act was mainly designed, was severed by the decree, and neither the husband nor the wife is entitled to reside on that portion of the homestead premises which was allotted to the other. All the principal qualities of the homestead estate, except that of exemption from liability for debts, etc., having been destroyed by the decree, the latter in our opinion, was also destroyed. The decree was as effectual in its results as would have been a declaration of abandonment." This evidently is on the ground that the homestead right in that state is a joint tenancy.

Under Cal. Code, § 146, providing that if the homestead has been selected from the community property, it may be assigned to the innocent party, either absolutely or for a limited period, the court cannot create a trust in assigning it but must assign it absolutely or for a limited period. Simpson v. Simpson, 80 Cal. 237.

Or if the wife has obtained the title and the decree is silent, she may retain the homestead. Burkett v. Burkett, 3 L. R. A. 781, 73 Cal. 810.

And under this statute the court may set aside to the innocent party the homestead, leaving to the other party all other property heretofore owned by the parties as community property. Boyd v. Boyd (Cal.) Jan. 14, 1893.

And the court may even award the homestead to the guilty party, where all claim to the same is released by stipulation of the other party in the case, decreeing divorce. Stookton v. Knock, 73 Cal. 423.

In this note cases where the parties had separated but no divorce was granted, are omitted. I. T.

When the respondent was divorced from her husband and given the custody of the children she became the head of the family.

Thompson, Homesteads, & Exemptions, § 82.

A wife who has been granted a divorce and given custody of the child, is the head of the family, and as such is entitled to the homestead.

Sellon v. Reed, 5 Biss. 125, 21 Myer's Fed. Dec. 639; Byers v. Byers, 21 Iowa, 268; Vanzant v. Vanzant, 28 Ill. 536; Bonnell v. Smith, 53 Ill. 375; Brandon v. Brandon, 14 Kan. 342; Rendleman v. Rendleman, 118 Ill. 257.

Bartholomew, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to determine adverse claims to a quarter section of land in Steele county. It was heard on an agreed statement of facts, from which the court made two conclusions of law: First, that plaintiff was not the owner in fee simple of the land; and, second, that defendant was entitled to the possession of the land. The judgment simply dismissed the complaint on the merits, with costs. Plaintiff appeals, and assails the conclusions as not warranted by the facts. On June 10, 1882, one Torkel Mehus, husband of the respondent, Thea Mehus, obtained a patent to said land under the federal homestead law. Torkel Mehus and respondent continued to reside on said land as their homestead until May, 1887. At that time there were living three minor children, the issue of their marriage. In May, 1887, the respondent, Thea Mehus, taking her minor children with her, left the said Torkel Mehus, and has not lived with him since that time. Torkel Mehus continued in possession of the land, and made his home thereon until the sale thereof hereinafter mentioned. In January, 1890, the respondent, as the wife of Torkel Mehus, and in behalf of herself and her minor children, attempted to file a declaration of homestead under sections 2458 and 2459, Comp. Laws, and the declaration was recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Steele county. In October, 1890, she brought an action of divorce against Torkel Mehus, on the ground of his adultery; and in January, 1891, the district court granted her a decree absolute on that ground, and gave her the custody of the three children. In her complaint she prayed the allowance of a reasonable sum for maintenance of herself and children out of the property of her said husband. The decree gave her a gross sum of $250, and $20 per month for the support of herself and children. No order whatever was made relative to the homestead, nor was it mentioned in the complaint. On the 9th day of September, 1891, Torkel Mehus executed a warranty deed of said premises to the appellant, Rosholt. Appellant was a purchaser for value, with no notice of any claim of respondent upon the land, except the constructive notice given by the record of the homestead declaration and the record in the divorce proceedings. Appellant claims under the deed, and respondent claims a homestead interest in the land.

What was the condition of this land as to the homestead character at the time of the rendition of the divorce decree? We think it was the homestead of Torkel Mehus and his family, including this respondent. The legal head of the family had remained in constant occupancy of the land as his home. This preserved its homestead character. The actual presence of the wife is not required for the inception or preservation of the homestead right, so long as the husband is the head of the family. Johnston v. Turner, 29 Ark. 280; Williams v. Sweetland, 10 Iowa, 51; Bradford v. Central Kansas Loan & T. Co. 47 Kan. 587.

Without holding that a wife can forfeit her homestead interest in her husband's home, or estop herself from claiming the same by anything short of a contract, but assuming such to be the law, it is yet certain that this record shows no such forfeiture or estoppel. The record does not disclose when the adultery upon which respondent based her action for divorce occurred. If prior to her leaving home, her absence would not imperil her rights (Earle v. Earle, 9 Tex. 630); but, if subsequent, yet it does not appear that she left her home and abandoned all intention to return. It does not appear that she left the jurisdiction, or attempted to establish a home elsewhere. Her effort to file a declaration of homestead would indicate an intention to return. It has grown to be familiar law that, in the absence of express statutory provisions, absence from the homestead for any reasonable time will not amount to abandonment when the animus revertendi always exists, and no other home is created. We repeat, respondent's homestead right existed at the date of the rendition of the decree of divorce, but it so existed by virtue of the fact that she was a member of the family of Torkel Mehus, who, with his family, had established his home and their home thereon, and whose occupancy had been continuous. Her rights were in no manner strengthened by the fact that she attempted to place a declaration of homestead on record. Such declaration does not create homestead rights (Cole v. Gill, 14 Iowa, 527; Yost v. Devault, 9 Iowa, 60); nor do we think, although we do not find the point ruled, that it takes the place of continuous occupancy after the inception of the homestead, except where, as in Minnesota, there is an express statutory provision to that effect. But even then, we suppose, the statute in no manner affects the question of actual abandonment, but might, in a subsequent contest, shift the burden of proof. In this state, when the head of a family owns land in excess of the amount allowed by law for a homestead, and the land is in one body, and the family resides thereon, the homestead may be selected in any form that may be desired up to the quantity allowed by law as a homestead. Recording a declaration of homestead gives notice to all purchasers, and all parties dealing with or extending credit to the owner, of the exact land claimed as a homestead. This, we think, is the main, and perhaps exclusive, reason for the provision because a failure to make and file the declaration does not render the homestead liable in execution. It only devolves upon the officer holding the execution the duty of selecting, platting, and recording the homestead. But since respondent's homestead rights rested exclusively upon the fact that she was a member of the family of Torkel Mehus, and since the divorce effectually severed that relation, it follows that her homestead right was destroyed, unless preserved by the statute or the decree. That decree severed the family relation theretofore existing between Torkel Mehus and Thea Mehus. She was no longer a member of his family. She was neither his wife nor his widow, and could claim none of the homestead rights given by law to the wife or widow. The occupancy which created and had preserved for her a homestead right in that land ceased instantly when she ceased to be a member of the family of Torkel Mehus.

But it is claimed that, by virtue of a new relation then created, the homestead right devolved upon her. It is urged that when respondent was divorced from her husband, and given the custody of the minor children, she became the head of the family, and that under such circumstances, when the wife is the meritorious cause of the divorce, she does not, by obtaining a divorce, forfeit her homestead right. The position thus broadly taken does not meet our approval. Whatever support it has in the books originated in Vanzant v. Vanzant, 28 Ill. 586. In that case the complainant was the divorced wife, who had been given the custody of the minor children. After asserting her right to the homestead as against the defendant, who was a creditor of the husband, the court says: "The spirit and policy of the homestead act seem to demand this concession, and to regard the complainant, for this purpose, as a widow and the head of a family." The court immediately adds: "But there are other circumstances disclosed by the record which fortify the claims of the complainant to the enjoyment of this property. In the first place, it is abundantly proved that the property was purchased with her own means, and, in the next place, that the court decreeing the divorce assigned it to her as alimony, and for which she holds the deed of the master in chancery, executed under the decree of the court." It is proper to add, also, that the premises, at the time of the divorce, were in the possession of a tenant, who immediately attorned to the divorced wife, and the court held that to be equivalent to actual occupancy by her. This case was followed by Bonnell v. Smith, 58 Ill. 376, where, also, the wife obtained the divorce and custody of the children, and was decreed the homestead absolutely as alimony, and the court, without discussing the matter, stated: "She therefore held it in a double right,—as alimony, under the decree of the court, and as her homestead, by operation of the statute." In this state a decree of divorce which granted to the meritorious wife the homestead absolutely as alimony would forever protect her possession, except in the enumerated cases, where a homestead is liable, irrespective of any construction of the homestead law. But in Sellon v. Reed, 5 Biss. 125, also 21 Myer's Fed. Dec. 639, and which arose in Illinois, 28 L. R. A.

the decree in the divorce case made no such disposition of the homestead. The fee was in the husband, or we so gather from the case. In the divorce action the meritorious wife obtained custody of the child and alimony in gross. Nothing was said about the homestead. She was in possession, and remained in possession with the child, and she was held entitled to possession, as against her divorced husband's grantee. The case is ruled on the Vanzant Case. These cases have been pressed upon us with much confidence, as being a construction by able courts of a homestead law not materially different from our own. The question is now raised for the first time in this jurisdiction. Its decision will announce a rule of property to be followed hereafter. That rule should be supported by sound judicial reasons. We are forced to say, when it is sought to carry the rule indicated in Vanzant v. Vanzant to the extent that is here claimed, that it fails to find support in sound reason, and is entirely unnecessary for the protection of the family. It is true that the homestead estate is created for the benefit of the family, and not for the benefit of the husband and father. Flora v. Flora, 2 N. Dak. 260. And it is true that courts liberally construe homestead laws, for the purpose of effectuating their wise and beneficent intentions, to the end that no family, through the misfortune of poverty or the death of its legal head, may be deprived of shelter, and where the homestead consists of a farm, as in this case, of support. But all the reasons which have induced the law to favor the wife or widow in the matter of homestead rights are entirely absent in cases of divorce. There is no action known to the law wherein the entire property of both parties is brought more directly within the grasp and control of the chancellor than the action for divorce. In this action the chancellor reviews not only the marital rights and wrongs of the respective parties, but their financial status and financial needs. He requires absolute information as to the number, age, and condition of all minor children. He knows it is the duty of the husband and father to support the family and educate the children. He knows that, in case of the death of the husband and father, the law places its hand upon so much of his property as constituted his homestead, and devotes it exclusively to the accomplishment of those purposes which it was the duty of the husband and father to accomplish while living. Where a divorce a vinculo is granted to an innocent wife, and she is given the custody of minor children, it is the duty of the chancellor, so far as the circumstances will permit,—and his power in that respect is plenary,—to compensate the innocent family for every right it has lost by reason of the legal separation from an offending husband and father. Under our statute, the court may in such cases require the husband to give security for any payments ordered to be made to the wife, or for the maintenance of the family; or the court may place the entire estate of the husband in the hands of a receiver, in order to secure such payments or maintenance, and the homestead, as such, is specially placed in the control of the court.

The Statute says (Comp. Laws, sec. 2585): "The court, in rendering a decree of divorce, may assign the homestead to the innocent party, either absolutely or for a limited period, according to the facts in the case and in consonance with the law relating to homestead." It would appear from this language that the legislature, so far from intending that the homestead should pass to the innocent party by virtue of the statute alone, thought it necessary to give the court express power to so dispose of it by decree. We are entirely unable to see any good reason why, after the chancellor, in the exercise of the broad and liberal discretion in him vested, has given the innocent family every protection the circumstances admitted or their needs required, the law should then step in, and transfer to them, at the expense of the husband, another and very material estate, to wit, the homestead owned and theretofore occupied by him. Particularly must this be true when, as in this case, the decree of divorce casts upon the husband the continuing duty of supporting that family, by compelling him to pay a certain monthly payment. It is not to be believed that the law will then grasp the very property out of which the husband must realize the money to make those payments, and transfer it to the family, and yet hold him for the payments. We deem it better for the innocent party, better for the fee owner, better as a rule of property, that the interests of the respective parties in the homestead should be fixed by the decree in the divorce proceeding; and, when that decree is silent, the homestead, like all other realty, must remain in the possession of the party holding the record title, discharged of all homestead rights and claims of the other party; and this we deem the result of the better authorities. Heaton v. Sawyer, 60 Vt. 498; Wiggin v. Buzzell, 58 N. H. 329; Biffle v. Pullam, 114 Mo. 50.

The district court for Steele county will reverse its judgment, and enter a decree granting the relief prayed for in the complaint.

Reversed.

All concur.

Corliss, J., concurring:

The respondent, in effect, claims that she had the right, after she had ceased to be the wife of the owner of the property used by them both as a homestead, to eject her former husband therefrom, notwithstanding the fact that he owned the fee. A homestead right is not property which can be sold. It possesses no value independent of the right to possession. If the respondent has a homestead right in the property in question, she has a right to occupy the premises, and she has no other or different right. She can occupy them during the balance of her life. Her right of possession is inconsistent with the husband's right of occupancy. They are divorced. The family tie is broken. Unless they remarry, it is contrary to public policy that they should live together under the same roof. The divorce was granted because the court decided that they ought not to inhabit the same home. The homestead right survives the divorce. Doyle v. Coburn, 6 Allen, 71; Biffle v. Pullam, 114 Mo. 50. In whom is it vested? It cannot belong to both parties. While the family was a unit, it belonged to the family; but, after the union of the family had been destroyed, the homestead right must then have vested exclusively in either the husband or the wife. How can it be claimed that the decree of divorce vested it exclusively in the former wife? That decree, so far from transferring the right from the husband to the wife, struck from under her the very foundation of her claim to a homestead right. This right was given to her as a wife, and after his death she might enjoy it as a widow. After the divorce, she was not his wife, and could never be his widow. The right was given to her because of the duty of the husband to provide her with a home. After the divorce the husband, as such, owed her no such duty. He thereafter owed her no duty whatever as husband. He had ceased to be her husband. Whatever a wife can claim from her former husband after divorce is not as his wife, but under the terms of the decree of divorce itself. If this gives her the homestead, she can have it. If this gives her alimony, she can have it. But she can have no more. If the decree gives her neither the homestead nor alimony, she is entitled to nothing. Her former husband is no longer bound to furnish her a home. But the decree of divorce in this case did in fact require the husband to pay the respondent monthly alimony for her support. The word "support" embraces not only food, fuel, and raiment; it also includes shelter,—a home to live in. The husband is ordered by the court not to provide her a home, much less to surrender up to her his own home. He is directed to furnish her with a certain amount of funds, with which she is to procure a home for herself. Must the husband, in addition, yield up to her his own home? The mere granting of a divorce cannot work a destruction of the husband's rights, and vest them exclusively in the former wife. Nor is it material that the divorce was for the husband's guilt. There is no statute which in the remotest manner warrants the rule that the husband's guilt should of itself, when followed by a divorce, work the destruction of his homestead right in favor of his former wife. His guilt is a circumstance which will weigh heavily with the chancellor in regulating, by his decree, the future duty of the guilty husband to the woman he has wronged. It will lead the chancellor to give the wife the amplest possible support out of the husband's estate and earnings. Frequently it will constrain the court to award to her the homestead, especially when, as in this case, the wife is given the custody of the children. Our statute expressly authorizes the court to do this: "The court, in rendering a decree of divorce, may assign the homestead to the innocent party, either absolutely or for a limited period, according to the facts in the case, and in consonance with the law relating to homesteads." Comp. Laws, § 2585.

This statute is conclusive against the theory of respondent that the mere fact of a granting of a divorce assigns the homestead right to the innocent party. The statute declares that this assignment must be embodied in the decree itself. The best possible time to settle all such matters is when all the facts and circumstances are before the court granting the divorce,—the number, age, and sex of the children; the value of the estate of the husband; his capacity to earn money; the degree of his guilt; the position of the parties in society; and such facts as bear upon the questions who should have the custody of the children, and whether it will be better to allow the wife to live on the homestead, or be supported by the husband elsewhere. There is no danger that denying to the mere granting of a decree of divorce for the husband's guilt the effect to assign the homestead right to the wife will work her any injustice. She can and will be fully protected in and by the decree. There is nothing in the fact that the decree awarded to the respondent the custody of the children. When, in such a case, the decree is silent on the point, the father is bound to support the minor children in the wife's custody the same as before divorce. They are still his minor children. The divorce in this case recognized this duty. It required the husband to pay the wife alimony for the support, not only of herself, but of the children intrusted to her care. She was to be paid money by the father to provide a home for them, as well as for herself. So far as the children themselves are concerned, it is clear that their rights depend upon the will of their parents, or the one who is entitled to the homestead. The consent of a child is not necessary to the alienation or abandonment of the homestead. The father having conveyed the fee to another, and thereby destroyed his homestead right, the derivative right of the children was by this conveyance destroyed; the consent of the mother to the conveyance being no longer necessary, she having ceased to be the father's wife. The statute gives the wife or widow the homestead right in her husband's real estate used by them as a home. When there is neither a wife nor a widow to claim a joint right with a husband, he is the sole owner of such homestead right when he is the owner of the property itself. This is true of the wife, also, as to property owned by her. Her husband's homestead rights in such property cease when he ceases to be her husband, unless continued in him by the decree of some court of competent jurisdiction.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Harry M. SPRINGER, by His Next Friend,
William G. Springer, Appt.,

v.

Norman S. BYRAM et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. On appeal from a general term decision, which held that the overruling of a motion for a new trial by the special term was erroneous, the court is not restricted to the particular points or reasons considered by the general term as the basis of its decision, but may uphold it on other grounds presented by an assignment of errors in the general term, if the conclusion was correct.
2. Disinterested bystanders may testify to statements of a party made in their presence, although they were made to his physician, in respect to the manner in which his injuries were received.
3. Slight differences between the phraseology of a motion for a new trial and that of a bill of exceptions relating to testimony will not prevent the consideration of a question as to the exclusion of the testimony, if the evidence be referred to with such certainty as to call the attention of the court to it and to the ruling in relation thereto, so that the judge cannot mistake the matter.
4. Statements of the brother of an injured person, made in his presence in an ambulance immediately after the injury as to the manner in which it was received and that it was the fault of no other person, may be proved against the injured person in an action for such injuries.

5. Evidence that a newsboy had previously been refused permission to ride in an elevator is permissible in an action by him for injuries received on such elevator, claiming the rights of a passenger, where the rules of the establishment excluded newsboys from the elevator.
6. A newsboy who attempts to ride in a passenger elevator after he has notice of the rule that newsboys are not allowed to ride although they are permitted to enter the building to ply their vocation, is a trespasser as to any use of the elevator so as to defeat his right to recover for injuries received in such attempt.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for Marion County reversing a judgment of the Special Term in his favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William V. Rooker and Hershiah Dailey, for appellant:

The duty of the court at general term is thus defined by statute: It shall, if the judgment of the court at special term be not affirmed, NOTE.—The question of the contributory negligence of children is one upon which courts will never get fully in accord. The above case is in some degree analogous to the case of children trespassing on turntables upon which question the authorities are fully collated in a note to Fort Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Robertson (Tex.) 14 L. R. A. 751.

enter of record the error or errors found therein and remand said cause to the special term with instructions as to said errors, etc. (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1860). The statute is mandatory.

When this court is advised by the presence of the opinion of the court at general term or when the record is so made up as to show the error or errors found, it proceeds thereupon to consider the errors found by the general term. It considers nothing else.

McWhinney v. Briggs, 85 Ind. 585.

Since parties have the right of appeal from the general term they must exercise that right if they would not be bound. And if, having failed to make their objections in the statutory way, this court treats them as having acquiesced in the action of the general term they will not be heard to complain that their objections to the special term record were not sufficient without a proper appeal to carry through the general term judgment and into this court.

Bartholomew v. Preston, 46 Ind. 286; McWhinney v. Briggs, supra.

This appeal involves only so much of the special term record as the general term acted on in a way objectionable to the appellant.

A motion for a new trial on the ground that particular evidence was excluded cannot be supported by showing that other and different evidence was excluded.

The bill of exceptions imports absolute verity.

Byam v. Burkam, 42 Ind. 525; Jelley v. Roberts, 50 Ind. 8; Longworth v. Higham, 89 Ind. 354.

And when any other part of the record conflicts with the bill of exceptions the bill of exceptions must prevail.

State v. Flemons, 6 Ind. 279; Carmichael v. Shiel, 21 Ind. 68.

The court did not err in excluding the evidence of the brother because he was not shown to be the agent of the plaintiff (Francis v. Edwards, 77 N. C. 271; Galbreath v. Cole, 61 Ala. 139; Central Branch Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hatham, 22 Kan. 41); nor was it shown that the brother's declaration was any part of the res gesta.

Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wright, 80 Ind. 184.

Nor was it shown that the declarations of the brother were in any manner binding on the plaintiff or such as that he should give to them any notice whatsoever.

See Conner v. Citizens Street R. Co. 105 Ind. 67, 55 Am. Rep. 177.

While the plaintiff remained helpless on the floor in the position in which he fell, the car continued to ascend until it had gone up some seven feet and while it was so ascending it could have been stopped in any space of eight inches or at the utmost in eighteen inches with perfect ease and security. During all the time of the ascent, the plaintiff's situation was known to the elevator conductor yet he made no effort to stop the car until the boy began to scream and then he stopped in a space of six or eight inches.

The case comes clearly within the principle of "the proximate cause."

As to an insane person or a child less than ten years of age the statute bears upon the person; as to the physician it bears upon the subject-matter, to the end that "the secrets of the sick chamber cannot be revealed."

The law does not permit spies or detectives to hover about the sick chamber to obtain from the delirium or the incoherent utterances of the afflicted, material on which to fabricate a story that will do them service.

The person of the physician is so remotely contemplated by the law that the physician cannot for himself use the rule of the statute as a personal prerogative.

Messrs. Stubbs & Averill for appellees.

Dailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the appellant while being transported in a passenger elevator in a public office building owned and operated by the appellees. The facts disclosed by the record in this cause, briefly stated, are these: In November, 1899, the appellees, Byram and Cornelia, were the owners of an office building situated on East Market street, in the city of Indianapolis. The north half of this building was four stories in height, including the basement, and the south half but three stories. The building was known as the "Thorpe Block," and was rented for office purposes to attorneys, and persons of other occupations. Each half of the block was provided with convenient stairways, giving access to each floor of the block; and in the north half was also situated a passenger elevator, in use for the convenience and benefit of appellee's tenants, and also giving access to each of the four floors of the block. The elevator was propelled by hydraulic pressure, and moved in a shaft built for that purpose, next to the west wall of the building. This shaft was separated from the halls on the several floors by sliding doors of open wire, the rest of the opening off the several halls being protected by either wirework or paneled woodwork. The elevator was operated by a person employed by the appellees for that purpose, who controlled its movements by means of a rope which opened and closed the valves of the hydraulic apparatus, and which passed through the car near the door of ingress and egress. The appellant, Harry M. Springer, was a boy of the age of twelve years and six months, attending the public schools, and selling newspapers in the afternoons. On the 23d day of November, 1899, the appellant was in the Thorpe block, and on what is known as the "second floor," and attempted to enter the elevator. In making this attempt, he fell partly upon the floor of the elevator, and was carried up and against the framework over the door, receiving injuries, to recover damages for which this action was brought. Appellant's complaint is in three paragraphs: First, charging negligence of defendants in the use of their property and premises in the matter complained of; second, charging willful and wanton disregard of plaintiff's situation by the defendants while he was on and using their property and premises; third, charging defendants with negligence as carriers of the plaintiff. Each paragraph shows that plaintiff was rightfully on the premises, and each also charges a resulting injury to the plaintiff without his fault. A demurrer for want of facts was filed to the second and third paragraphs of the complaint, and overruled, and defendants answered in general denial. Upon these issues the cause was tried at the March term, 1891, of the superior court of Marion county, before a jury, which returned a verdict for the appellant. Appellees filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and judgment was rendered and entered on the verdict. From this judgment at special term appellees appealed to the general term of the superior court, where the judgment at special term was reversed for error in overruling appellees' motion for a new trial. From this judgment of reversal at the general term the appellant has appealed to this court, and by proper assignment of error has presented for review the correctness of the decision of the court in general term in reversing the judgment of the special term, and directing a new trial of the cause.

From the opinion of the court in general term, it appears that the only question presented by the assignment of errors in general term, which was considered and determined by the court, was the action of the court in special term in overruling appellee's motion for a new trial. The overruling of that motion by the court in special term was held to be erroneous, and the assignment of error made in this court presents for review all matters properly assigned as errors in the motion for a new trial. Appellant's brief proceeds upon the theory that the only matters which this court can consider on this appeal are the particular points or reasons in the motion for a new trial, which the opinion of the court in general term shows were expressly considered by that court, and which that opinion shows were the basis of the action of the general term in reversing the judgment at special term. To this theory we cannot give assent. Clearly, it was not incumbent upon the court in general term, after it had found an error for which the judgment in special term should be reversed, to investigate the sufficiency of the remaining reasons for a new trial, and pass upon the questions as to whether or not they were, severally, well taken. The instructions of the general term, as shown by its judgment, required the court in special term to sustain the defendant's motion for a new trial. This, we think, clearly indicates the error for which the judgment was reversed, and appellant's assignment of error in this court brings to us for review all the questions properly presented by appellees' motion for a new trial. In other words, the judgment of the court in general term sufficiently shows the decision of that court to have been that there was error of the court in special term, in refusing to sustain the motion, as stated, of the appellees for a new trial. A new trial was ordered upon a consideration of the errors assigned by the appellees in general term, viz.: "Third, the court in special term erred in overruling appellants' motion for a new trial of this cause." The general term found this assignment of error well taken, and sustained it as a whole, not in piecemeal, and there was no ruling of the court in general term upon which these appellees had any reason to assign cross-errors. The questions presented to the general term were those presented by the assignment of errors in that court.

In the case of Wesley v. Milford, 41 Ind. 416, it is said: "The appeal to this court being allowed from the judgment of the general term only, we think it must follow that whatever errors are assigned in this court must be predicated upon the assignment of errors in the general term, and the action of that court in general term thereon." This being so, it is clear that the action of the court in general term upon the errors assigned in that court is what this court passes upon, and not the several and particular matters which may have been embraced and covered by the assignments of error in the special term. To present to this court questions which were presented in the motion for a new trial, and to separate and set apart for the consideration of the court a portion of the reasons assigned in such motion, is equivalent to presenting to this court for the first time, as grounds for reversal, matters which must be assigned as reasons for a new trial. The appellant's assignment of error in this court, and his complaint here, is "that said general term of said court erred in reversing the judgment of the special term of said superior court, and remanding said cause for another trial to said special term." The question is not whether the reasons given by the court are sound or unsound, but rather, upon a consideration of the matters presented by the assignment of errors in the general term, did the court reach a right conclusion, and enter a judgment to which these appel-lees were entitled upon the errors assigned in that court?

The first assignment in appellees' motion for a new trial embraces alleged errors of law occurring and excepted to by the defendants at the time, and comprised in subdivisions A to S, inclusive. The first three subdivisions each relate to the correctness of the ruling of the trial court in excluding the testimony of the two witnesses Scott and Goth with reference to a conversation sought to be proved between the appellant and Dr. Sutcliffe, in the ambulance, almost immediately after the accident, in the presence and hearing of the witnesses interrogated in reference thereto, and included the statement of the appellant as to the manner in which his injuries were received. The objection to the offered testimony was sustained upon the theory that it was incompetent to prove a conversation between a physician and his patient. In defining who are incompetent to testify, section 497, Rev. Stat. 1881, reads: "Third. Attorneys, as to confidential communications made to them in the course of their professional business, and as to advice given in such cases." "Fourth. Physicians, as to matter communicated to them, as such, by patients, in the course of their professional business, or advice given in such cases." It has been held that communications made through a third person from a client to a solicitor are privileged, if otherwise entitled to be so; also, whoever represents a lawyer in conference or correspondence with the client is under the same protection as the lawyer himself. The privilege extends to the attorney's clerk, interpreter, assistant attorney, or other agent, while in the discharge of his duty. 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 181, 132. At common law, confidential communications made by a patient to a physician are not privileged. The common law in this state has been changed by statute, supra. It was said in Masonic Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Beck, 77 Ind. 203, 40 Am. Rep. 295, that the object of these statutes seems to be to place the communications made to physicians in the course of their professional employment upon the same footing with communications made by clients to their attorneys in the course of their employment. "The privilege may attach notwithstanding the presence of third persons in the sick-room, where the consultation is had. Cohen v. Continental Ins. Co. 9 Jones & S. 296. If the attending physician calls in another physician for consultation, the communications made to the latter are privileged. Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Deming, 123 Ind. 884; Raymond v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 152; Renihan v. Dennin, 103 N. Y. 573, 57 Am. Rep. 770. Where there are two physicians, the patient does not, by calling one of his physicians as a witness, waive his privilege to object to the testimony of the other. Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wiler, 100 Ind. 92, 50 Am. Rep. 769; Mellor v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 105 Mo. 455, 10 L. R. A. 36; Record v. Saratoga Springs, 46 Hun, 448.

Communications made by a patient to his physician, for the purpose of professional aid and advice, are privileged, because intended to be private and confidential, and can never be divulged without the consent of the patient; it being the privilege of the patient, and not of the physician. The privilege of exemption from testifying to declarations made and facts actually known is extended to a physician who derives his knowledge from the communications of a patient who applies and makes disclosures to him in his professional character. The immunity extends to all such facts, whether learned directly from the patient himself, or acquired by the physician through his own observation or examination. 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 508. Neither can disclosures be made by other persons whose intervention is strictly necessary to enable the parties to communicate with each other. In Cotton v. State, 87 Ala. 78, the court says: "The rule as to the inviolability of professional confidences applies, as between attorney and client, only to communications made and received for the purposes of professional action and aid; and the secrecy imposed extends to no other persons than those sustaining to each other the confidential relationship, except the necessary organs of communication between them, such as interpreters and their own agents and clerks." Further it does not extend. It is settled law that if parties sustaining confidential relations to each other hold their conversation in the presence and hearing of third persons, whether they be necessarily present as officers, or indifferent bystanders, such third persons are not prohibited from testifying to what they heard. Cotton v. State, 87 Ala. 75; House v. House, 61 Mich. 69; Re McCarthy, 55 Hun, 7; Com. v. Griffin, 110 Mass. 181; Hoy v. Morris, 13 Gray, 519, 74 Am. Dec. 650; Oliver v. Pate, 43 Ind. 132, on page 142; Whart. Crim. Ev. § 398; 1 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 147.

From the record it appears that the witnesses Scott and Goth, whose testimony was rejected or excluded by the court, were employes of one C. E. Kregelo, an undertaker of the city of Indianapolis, who sent an ambulance to convey the appellant to his home, and these witnesses were in charge of it. It does not appear from the transcript that they were in the employ of either the physician or the injured party, or that even their principal was attending him for hire. Scott and Goth were, for aught that appears, disinterested bystanders, and were competent to testify, and the weight of their statements was to be determined by the jury.

Counsel for appellant seek to shut out the consideration of this question because of slight differences between the phraseology of the motion for a new trial and that of the bill of exceptions relating to the testimony offered to be proved by the appellees. The offer on the trial is in these words: "Now, we offer to prove, may the court please, by this witness [Scott], that in the ambulance, in the presence of this witness and Dr. Sutcliffe and of Mr. Goth, this boy, the plaintiff in this case, stated that he attempted to get on the elevator while it was in motion, and that that was the way in which he got hurt, and, further, that nobody was to blame; that his brother said that nobody was to blame except himself; that it was his own fault; that he tried to get on the elevator while it was in motion; and that he was playing in the halls at the time, and had been playing about the elevator." The words, as made in the motion for a new trial, are: "We offer to prove . . . that in the ambulance, in the presence of this witness and Dr. Sutcliffe and Mr. Goth, this boy [the plaintiff in this case] stated that he attempted to get into the elevator while it was in motion, and that that was the way he got hurt, and, further, that nobody was to blame except himself; that it was his own fault; that he was hurt in trying to get into the elevator while it was in motion; and that he was playing in the halls at the time, and had been playing about the elevator." In the late case of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein, 133 Ind. 243, 19 L. R. A. 783, it is said: "It is not the practice, and it is not incumbent on a party, in a motion for a new trial, to set out in detail a verbatim copy of the evidence admitted over objection, or offered and refused, or a verbatim statement of the objections made to its introduction. It is sufficient if the evidence be referred to with such certainty as to call the attention of the court to it, and to the ruling in relation thereto, so that the judge could not mistake the matter, and the ruling alluded to and complained of by the party filing the motion." We also cite Clark v. Bond, 29 Ind. 556, 557; Meyer v. Bohlising, 44 Ind. 238, 239. We think the statement of the offered evidence in the motion for a new trial was sufficiently explicit to inform the court of the question sought to be raised by the motion. The matter offered to be proved in the trial court was not objectionable because it sought to incorporate a statement of the brother, made in the ambulance in the presence of the appellant. "If statements are made in the presence and hearing of a person, affecting his rights, and under such circumstances as call for a reply, what he said, or if he failed to say anything, may be proven, as in the nature of an admission." Pierce v. Goldsberry, 35 Ind. 317; Puett v. Beard, 86 Ind. 104; Surber v. State, 99 Ind. 71; Brayles v. State, 47 Ind. 251; Conway v. State, 118 Ind. 482. In Rice on Evidence (vol. 1, p. 424), the author says: "The act or declaration of another person, and within the observation of a party, and his conduct in relation thereto, is relevant, if, under all the circumstances of the case he would have been likely to have been affected by the act or the declaration."

Subdivision F calls in question the ruling of the court in sustaining the appellant's objection to the following question propounded to Earl Spain, a witness called on behalf of appellees: "If, at any time,—say the week before the day he was hurt,—he tried to get into the elevator, tell the jury what you said to him." Appellees then offered to prove by the witness, in answer to the above question, that "about a week before this accident occurred the appellant did try to get in, and asked to get in the elevator, and was then told that he would not be allowed to, that newsboys were not allowed to ride in that elevator, and that he could not, and that he did, in spite of that injunction, get in, and was put out." This evidence was excluded on the ground that it was not material and competent, under the issues in this case. The only issue tendered by the complaint was that of negligence. Under the allegations of the complaint charging negligence, it was incumbent upon the appellant, in order to charge the appellees with a breach of duty towards him, to show that he was rightfully attempting to use the elevator in the Thorpe block. If his attempted use of that elevator was wrongful, then, the only legal duty on the part of the appellees was not to willfully injure him. If it was necessary for appellant to show that he was rightfully attempting to use the same, then, clearly, appellees had the right to have any evidence which tended to show that appellant was not rightfully engaged in its use go to the jury, under the general denial. It will be observed, from a reading of the several paragraphs of the complaint, that it charges these appellees, as carriers of passengers, with a breach of duty on their part, as such, in this: that "plaintiff was invited by the defendants to enter said elevator, and be transported therein." Under the issue tendered by the complaint, it was only necessary for the appellant to show an implied invitation on the part of the appellees, for him to enter and be transported therein and, if this be true, then certainly it was competent for appellees to show that appellant was notified of the fact, prior to the accident, that newsboys were not allowed to ride in the elevator, and that he could not do so. If, as a matter of fact, he had been so warned,—if he knew that appellees did not allow newsboys to ride in the elevator,—in what respect was there a rightful attempt on his part to use the elevator contrary to the knowledge which he had? The mere fact that he was permitted to enter the building and ply his vocation as newsboy, cannot, alone, be held to bind the appellees to carry him in their elevator, whether they wished or not. It would be just as reasonable to conclude that if a person were admitted upon a train of cars as a passenger, and provided with a passenger car, he could insist upon and be at liberty to ride in the baggage car, or upon an engine, or occupy a berth in a sleeper without a permit. If the appellees had a rule with respect to their elevator, by which they required the person in charge to refuse its use to newsboys in the building, such a rule would have to be brought to the attention or knowledge of the boy, in some way, before he would be bound by such rule; but we think it is clear that, after he has been apprised of appellees' rule to the effect that he cannot be carried in their elevator, it would be binding upon him. This rule has been uniformly sustained in the case of common carriers of passengers, and where a passenger has taken a position upon a train contrary to known rules of the carrier to the contrary, and has been injured in consequence of the violation of such rule, it has been held, without exception, we believe, that there was no right of recovery. It has also been frequently held that, where a person is invited to ride upon a train of cars by an employé who had no authority to give such invitation, the party accepting the same was either a trespasser or a mere licensee, to whom the carrier owed no duty to exercise care.

Under the issues, it was certainly a material fact, which the appellees had a right to show, whether or not this appellant had knowledge, a week before the injury, of the fact that newsboys were not allowed in the elevator. It tended to negative any proof that he might have offered showing that he was rightfully attempting to ride at the time of the accident complained of, and also tended to show that as to any use of the elevator, he was a trespasser. The refusal of the court at the special term to admit this testimony deprived appellees of a valuable element of their defense,—that there was no invitation to appellant to ride, and that he was not permitted to do so. It was harmful error to sustain appellant's objection to the question, and exclude the evidence offered.

Subdivision Q of the first reason for a new trial challenges instruction No. 3, and, indeed, the whole series of instructions is criticised by the appellees; but this opinion has already been extended beyond the limits intended, and we will not consider the objection presented to the instructions.

We think the decision of the court in general term reversing the judgment of the special term correct, and it is affirmed.

Anton Schmitz, Resp't.,

v.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN &

1. In an action by a child for injuries sustained at a railway crossing, in attempting to cross between cars standing on the crossing, evidence that plaintiff saw others cross before him, and that there was no flagman at the crossing, is admissible on the issue of defendant's negligence in starting the train without warning.
2. A deposition of a witness taken by plaintiff and filed in the suit is properly excluded on plaintiff's objection that the witness is present, upon defendant's offering it in evidence, under the implication contained in Rev. Stat. 1899, § 4461, which makes no provision for the reading of the deposition of a witness not a party to the suit who is present at the trial.
3. A railroad company which leaves a train standing for several minutes upon a much-used street crossing, with a slight space between the cars, as if to invite passage between them, is bound to use reasonable care in closing up the opening to avoid injury to one who is attempting to cross, although he has placed himself in such relation to the train that under other circumstances he would be regarded as a trespasser.
4. A child who, by reason of his want of knowledge, is not guilty of negligence in attempting to follow the example of adults in passing between cars standing upon a street crossing, may recover damages if injured by the negligence of the company.

5. In an action for personal injuries sustained at a street crossing by the pushing of cars together while plaintiff was passing between them, the company's failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle before moving the cars, although not constituting a statutory cause of action, is properly considered in determining whether the company exercised due care in moving the cars.
6. A party cannot on appeal complain of an error in giving an instruction at his own instance and request.
7. The giving of an instruction assuming that it was a railway company's duty to keep a flagman at a street crossing, whereas the statute imposes no such duty, is not ground for reversal, where the company could not have been prejudiced thereby because the evidence clearly shows that it did have a flagman at such crossing.
8. Ignorance of danger by reason of his youth and inexperience may properly be considered on the question of the contributory negligence of a child in attempting to pass between cars standing on a street crossing.
9. Mental anguish of a boy nine years old, consisting of grief and sorrow over the loss of his limb and becoming a cripple for life, is a proper element of damages in an action by him for injuries sustained by the alleged negligence of a railway company at a highway crossing.
10. Prospective damages by the impairment of plaintiff's capacity for earning a livelihood after his majority is a proper element in an action for personal injuries by a minor nine years old, although his petition contains no specific allegation in regard thereto and there is no direct evidence on the subject.

Mr. Seneca N. Taylor, for respondent:

It was not error for the court to admit the testimony of plaintiff, and other witnesses, of the fact that about one hundred persons had passed over, and between the disconnected draw-bars, in the situation they were in, when plaintiff attempted to cross over, and that, too, during the ten or fifteen minutes he stood waiting to pass over:

1. Because it was proper as showing the environment immediately before, and at the time plaintiff attempted to cross over the disconnected draw-bars, and also as showing the reasonableness for active diligence on the part of the defendant.

Fiedler v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 107 Mo. 645; Barker v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 98 Mo. 50.

2. Because the action of others on the same occasion was a part of the res gestæ and tended to show what others deemed prudent in a like situation.

The court did not err in refusing to allow defendant to read the deposition of Frank Furlay, because he was present in court at the time the same was offered, ready to be examined, having been duly subpoenaed in the case.

The court did not err in overruling defendant's demurrers to the evidence. On the case made by the evidence, according to the great weight of authority, it was properly submitted to the jury.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by William Schmitz, a minor, nine years old, by his next friend, Anton Schmitz, to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant in operating its cars upon Leperance street crossing in the city of St. Louis. It was brought in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, and thereafter taken by change of venue to Warren county circuit court. It was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment of $5,708 for plaintiff. The petition, or that part of it which is before this court for consideration, is as follows: "Now comes the plaintiff, and avers that he is a minor, under the age of ten years, and that Anton Schmitz was duly appointed as his next friend to bring this suit, before said suit was brought. That defendant is, and at the time hereinafter mentioned was, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, and engaged in the operation of a railroad, a part of which is in the city of St. Louis. Plaintiff further states that on the 24th day of August, 1890, and in the daytime, he was going east on a public street in said city known as 'Leperance Street,' where said street is crossed by defendant's railroad in said city. That at said time and place a train of flat cars was standing across said street, which impeded his progress on said street, which train stood there for several minutes, and not in motion. The plaintiff, seeing said train standing perfectly still for several minutes, and there being no sign or indication that it was going to move, and seeing many adults and others crossing over the same in said street—between the flat cars—without let or hindrance, or notice not to do so, undertook to cross over between two such flat cars, in said street, where the other persons upon said street had crossed immediately before him. That he stopped, listened, and looked before so crossing, and the bell of the locomotive was not rung, the whistle was not sounded, nor was any audible or visible signal given by defendant or its employes to notify plaintiff that said train was about to be thrust backwards, nor was any brakeman in sight of plaintiff, nor was any brakeman on the rear of said train, nor was there any gate or bar across said street where it was crossed by said railroad; and without any notice or warning whatever given on the part of the defendant, the said defendant violently, suddenly, carelessly, and negligently caused the engine, propelled by steam power, to jam the cars of said train together, thereby breaking and crushing the bones of plaintiff's foot and ankle between the bumpers of two of said cars while he was in the act of crossing as aforesaid, and in consequence he was injured, and maimed for life, and caused to suffer great physical and mental pain and agony. Plaintiff further states that, considering his age and intelligence, he was at the time exercising that degree of care and diligence which could be expected of him, or that was due from one of his age, and that the immediate cause of said injury to him was the carelessness and negligence of the defendant in failing to do its duty in protecting persons, and especially children of immature judgment, in the lawful use of said public street from injury by its said cars; that the car so thrust backward which crushed plaintiff's foot was attached to several other cars and a locomotive, constituting a freight train, which at the time of said injuries was propelled backward suddenly and violently by steam power. Wherefore plaintiff avers that he has been injured and sustained damages in the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000), for which, with cost of suit, he prays judgment." The answer was a general denial and plea of contributory negligence on plaintiff's part in attempting to cross the track at the time, place, and manner he did. Plaintiff replied, denying the new matter in the answer.

The facts are that on August 24, 1890, William Schmitz, aged nine years and two months, with three other boys, went east on Lesperance street, a public street in the city of St. Louis, and, on arriving at the place where defendant's railroad tracks cross the street, they found their way impeded by two cars, the bumpers of which were disconnected, leaving an opening of about nine inches between them. They saw about fifty to seventy-five persons cross the track upon which said cars were standing, in a line near the center of the most traveled part of the street,—some of whom passed over and some under the disconnected bumpers, and some passed through the 9-inch space between them sideways; while some others climbed over the car, it being a flat car. After all of these had passed over, plaintiff and his then comrades still stood, looked, listened, and waited for the cars to separate further, thus widening the gap. After thus waiting for the cars to be moved from the street crossing five to fifteen minutes, during which time there was no flagman or other employé of defendant in sight and neither seeing nor hearing any indications that the cars would be moved, and being anxious to reach the other side of the railroad track, one of these boys crossed the track by passing through the disconnected bumpers, and then another climbed over said bumpers, and plaintiff endeavored to follow him, and in doing so put one foot on one of the bumpers and raised his body, and, as his other foot was swinging between the disconnected bumpers, the defendant's employés in charge of the engine caused it suddenly to jam the bumpers of the cars together, thereby catching plaintiff's foot and ankle between said disconnected bumpers, crushing the bones and muscles. The flagman was not in sight: The evidence shows that the plaintiff did not think that the cars would be moved without his being notified, and did not apprehend any danger in endeavoring to pass over the bumpers as he did on this occasion.

It also shows that he suffered intense physical pain for many months after his injury, and that he is crippled for life. The extent of his injuries was testified to by Dr. Faber; and his foot and ankle, as it appeared at the trial, was exhibited to the jury without objection.

During the course of the trial plaintiff was permitted, against defendant's objections, to prove that a large number of persons had crossed the train before he did, and that there was no watchman at the crossing to warn them of danger. The defendant saved his exceptions to these rulings of the court. The testimony adduced by the defendant tended to prove that a few minutes before the accident there was a train of cars standing north of the crossing; that defendant's watchman, John Misch, was standing on the west side of the track on which plaintiff was injured; that he saw several cars moving northward on the track towards the crossing at a slow rate of speed; that he crossed over this track to the east side, just a moment previous to the closing of the crossing; that he did not see plaintiff or his companions anywhere near the crossing at that time, nor did he see them there at all until after he heard the cry of pain caused by the crushing of plaintiff's foot; that the accident happened only a few moments after he had crossed over the track; that he was standing on the next track east of the one on which plaintiff was injured, and was within a few feet of him at the time; that there was a train backing northward towards the crossing a few moments before the accident; that the men in charge of this train were coupling up detached sections of cars for the purpose of making up a train; that the car which injured plaintiff formed a part of one of these detached sections, but the train backing north was not attached to this section, and never came in contact therewith, so far as the employés in charge of the train knew; that none of the hands in charge of this train witnessed or knew anything about the accident until after it had happened; that the watchman had been at the crossing all day, in the discharge of his duty, and was on the opposite side of the train on the track next to the one on which the boy was injured at the time thereof. The defendant offered in evidence the deposition of Frank Furley, which had been taken by plaintiff, and filed in this suit, to which evidence plaintiff objected, on the ground that the witness was in court, it appearing from the cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses that deponent had been taken to the court by plaintiff. The court sustained the objection, and excluded the deposition, to which ruling and action of the court defendant at the time duly excepted. Defendant thereupon prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"(a) The court instructs the jury that under the pleadings and the evidence the plaintiff cannot recover. First. The court instructs the jury that the following are the only grounds of negligence charged in plaintiff's petition which you can consider under the instructions hereafter given you: (1) That the bell of the locomotive was not rung, or the whistle sounded; (2) that plaintiff was not notified of the intention of those in charge of the train to move it backward; (8) that no brakeman was on the rear car of said train; (4) that there was no gate or bar across the street; (5) that the servants of defendant, without any notice or warning, suddenly, carelessly, and negligently caused the engine to jam the cars of the train together, whereby plaintiff's foot was crushed and mashed. You are further instructed that it is admitted by the plaintiff's petition that the cars between which plaintiff was injured were coupled together and plaintiff was injured while attempting to climb between them." "Third. Concerning the charge in plaintiff's petition that the plaintiff was not notified of the intention of those in charge of the train to move it backwards, you are instructed that the defendant's servants had the right to assume that no person would attempt to climb between the cars of said train, and said servants were not bound to give notice to any one so climbing between said cars unless said servants knew that said person was in between said cars, so in the act of climbing over them; and unless you believe from the evidence that some servant engaged with said train actually knew that plaintiff was in the act of climbing between said cars at the time they were moved, then you must find that issue for the defendant. Fourth. Concerning the charge of the petition that defendant's servants, without any notice or warning, suddenly, carelessly, and negligently caused the engine to jam the cars together, you are instructed that the law does not require any such notice or warning of the defendant's servants, under the circumstances in this case, unless they actually knew that the plaintiff was between said cars, and was in danger of being hurt by such movement of the engine; and unless you find from the evidence that they did actually know that plaintiff was between said cars, and in danger of being hurt by such movement of them, then you must find for the defendant upon this, the last, ground charged in said petition." Which instructions the court refused to give to the jury, to which action and ruling of the court defendant at the time duly excepted.

The court then modified defendant's first, third, and sixth "refused" instructions, and of its own motion gave the same to the jury as modified, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the following are the only grounds of negligence charged in plaintiff's petition which you can consider under the instructions hereafter given you: (1) That the bell of the locomotive was not rung, or the whistle sounded; (2) that the plaintiff was not notified of the intention of those in charge of the train to move it backward; (8) that no brakeman was on the rear car of said train; (4) that there was no gate or bar across the street; (5) that the servants of defendant, without any notice or warning, suddenly, carelessly, and negligently caused the engine to jam the cars of the train together, whereby plaintiff's foot was caught and mashed." "Third. Concerning the charge in plaintiff's petition that the plaintiff was not notified of the intention of those in charge of the train to move it backward, you are instructed that the defendant's servants had the right to assume that no person would attempt to climb between the cars of said train, and said servants were not bound to give notice to any one so climbing between said cars, unless said servants knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that said person was in between said cars, so in the act of climbing over them; and unless you believe from the evidence that some servant engaged with said train actually knew that plaintiff was in the act of climbing between said cars at the time they were moved, then you must find that issue for the defendant." "Sixth. Concerning the charge of the petition that defendant's servants, without any notice or warning, suddenly, carelessly, and negligently caused the engine to jam the cars together, you are instructed that the law does not require any such notice or warning of the defendant's servants under the circumstances of this case, unless they actually knew, or by exercise of ordinary care might have known, that the plaintiff was between said cars, and was in danger of being hurt by such movement of the engine; and unless you find from the evidence that they did actually know, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that the plaintiff was between said cars, and in danger of being hurt by such movement of them, then you will find for the defendant upon this, the last, ground charged in said petition." To which action of the court in modifying said instructions and giving them to the jury as modified defendant at the time duly excepted.

The court, at the instance of the plaintiff, gave the jury the following instructions:

"First. The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the defendant's flagman, and its agents and servants in management of its locomotive and train under their charge, to exercise reasonable care and precaution to prevent any injury to persons upon the tracks of defendant, and any failure on their part to exercise care and precaution would be such negligence as to make the defendant liable for the injuries to plaintiff resulting from such negligence, unless the jury further believes from the evidence that plaintiff was not acting with reasonable care and diligence for one of his age in passing over the cars as he did on the occasion of his injuries; and in passing upon the question as to whether the flagman and agents and servants of the defendant were or were not negligent in conducting and managing the locomotive and train at said crossing you should take into consideration all the facts and circumstances as proved by the evidence to have existed at the time when and the place where the injuries occurred, and you should give to each fact and circumstance and to the testimony of each witness such weight only as you may deem such fact, circumstance, or testimony entitled to in connection with all the evidence in the case. Second. By the term 'negligence,' as used in these instructions, is meant the want of that degree of care that any ordinary prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances. Third. The court further instructs the jury that, though they may believe from the evidence that it would have been negligence in an adult to have climbed over the drawbars of the cars, as the plaintiff did on the occasion of his injuries, still if the jury find that by reason of his youth and inexperience he was not aware of the danger to which he was exposed in doing so, then the jury will take this into consideration in passing upon the question of plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence. Fourth. The jury are instructed that if you find for the plaintiff you will, in assessing the damages, take into consideration the physical condition he was in before the injuries in question; the physical pain and mental anguish he has suffered, occasioned by said injuries; and the physical pain and mental anguish, if any, you believe from the evidence he is likely to suffer in the future because of said injuries; and in addition to this, you may also consider to what extent, if any, plaintiff's capacity for earning a livelihood, after his majority, will be impaired by said injuries, and you will return a verdict for him in such sum as you believe to be just and reasonable, not exceeding twenty thousand dollars." To which action of the court in giving said instructions to the jury, and each of them, the defendant at the time duly excepted.

The court, at the instance of the defendant, gave the jury the following instructions: "Second. Concerning the failure of the defendant to ring the bell or sound the whistle as charged in the petition, you are instructed that under the circumstances in this case the defendant's servants were not bound to do either, and your verdict must be for the defendant as to that ground of negligence." "Fourth. Concerning the charge in plaintiff's petition that there was no gate or bar across the street, you are instructed that there is no evidence to support that ground, and you must find for the defendant on that charge. Concerning the charge in the petition that no brakeman was stationed on the rear end of the train, you are instructed that, under the evidence in this case, the defendant was not required to have a brakeman so stationed, and you must find for the defendant upon this charge of the petition." "Seventh. The jury are instructed that it was an act of gross carelessness to have climbed between the cars as the plaintiff did, if he was of sufficient years and understanding to have appreciated the danger of so doing; and whether he did understand and appreciate the danger of so doing is a matter for you to determine; and in determining this you may take into consideration his admissions and statements while testifying in this case, and, if you find him of sufficient understanding to appreciate the danger he might encounter in passing between said cars, then you must, upon this finding alone, return a verdict for the defendant."

It is claimed by defendant that the court committed error in admitting the testimony of plaintiff and his witness Otten regarding the action of other persons in crossing the cars which caused the injury, at the time of or immediately preceding the accident, and of said witness Otten with reference to the absence of a flagman at the crossing at the time. It was held by this court in the case of Burger

v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 112 Mo. 288, which was an action by a child for injuries sustained at the crossing in attempting to cross through a train standing across the street, that evidence that plaintiff saw others cross before him was admissible on the issue of defendant's negligence in starting the train without warning. Evidence of a similar character was admitted without objection in the cases of Fiedler v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 107 Mo. 645; Gurley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 104 Mo. 215; Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 50 Mo. 461, 11 Am. Rep. 420; Stillson v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 67 Mo. 672; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Loyer, 112 Pa. 414; and Thurber v. Harlem Bridge, M. & F. R. Co., 60 N. Y. 326.

Persons, and especially children, are naturally inclined to do whatever they may see others do. Nor was it error in permitting the witness Otten to testify that no flagman was present at the time of the accident, as this evidence was admissible as tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant, and the want of care and caution in order to prevent accidents at this crossing.

It was also contended by defendant that the court erred in excluding the deposition of Frank Furley, offered by defendant, which had been taken by the plaintiff, and filed in this case; and reliance is placed upon the case of Schmick v. Noel, 64 Tex. 406, as sustaining this position. An examination of that case will show that the deposition which was read was that of the plaintiff in the suit, and even in that case the court held that it was a matter of practice resting largely in the discretion of the trial court. The rule in this state, however, is that declarations of a party to a suit, contained in his deposition, taken by the other party, may be read in evidence against him in the same case, although he is present at the trial; Bogie v. Nolan, 96 Mo. 85. But section 4461, Rev. Stat. 1889, makes no provision for the reading of the deposition of a witness not a party to the suit, who is present at the time of the trial, and excludes, by implication at least, the right to do so. Schmitz v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 46 Mo. App. 891.

The next contention is that the demurrer to plaintiff's evidence should have been sustained, because, as soon as plaintiff touched or stepped upon defendant's train, he became a trespasser, and as such defendant owed him no duty, and he was entitled to no protection save against willful injury. The plaintiff had the same right that the defendant had to the use of the highway, and he might well assume that if any immediate movement of the cars was made at all some signal would be given before the movement was made, or that the cars would be pulled further apart, so as to relieve the street of the obstruction. While it is true that the duty of giving the statutory signals of ringing the bell and sounding the whistle has no application to one situated as plaintiff was in between two cars, but was intended to give warning to persons about to cross the track of the approach of a train, yet, as there was a space of at least nine inches open between the cars, through which a large number of persons had been passing, and others were climbing over couplings between the cars. It was a question whether it was not the duty, under the circumstances, of those in charge of the train, to give some kind of warning of their intention to move, in order thereby to prevent injury to persons who might be passing between or over the cars. Burger v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 112 Mo. 238; Barkley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 96 Mo. 378; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Loyer, 112 Pa. 414. That it was negligence in defendant to leave its cars standing across the street in a populous city, where many pedestrians were known to be in the habit of crossing, with a space at least nine inches between the drawheads of the cars, as if to invite persons who could do so to pass between them, there can be no question. And if, without any warning, it closed up the space between the cars, by reason of which plaintiff was injured without any fault or negligence on his part contributing directly thereto, the defendant should be held liable. It was the duty of the defendant's servants and employes to know the condition of the cars at the crossing, and to provide against any accident that might be occasioned by their movement. In the case of Wilkins v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 101 Mo. 98, it appears that the plaintiff's husband was killed at the same crossing. The deceased undertook to pass between the cars standing about two feet apart, and by the sudden backward movement of the train, made without any warning, he was crushed between the cars and injured, from the effect of which injury he subsequently died. This court in that case said: "This movement is said to have been made with the object of pushing the loose train of several cars close together towards the north; but, as it was evident that an opening for the purpose of clearing the street was to have been made, a forward movement of the engine and train of eleven cars was much more likely to be anticipated by a looker-on than the movement that was actually made. There was evidence that no bell was rung or whistle sounded before the movement of the train in question. Deceased might rightly assume that some such signal would be given before the movement was made." So, in the case of Gurley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 104 Mo. 211, in which it appears that the plaintiff was passing over a footway leading through the defendant's yards and over its tracks, and which was not a public street or highway, but the railroad company had permitted persons to use it in passing to and from the depot. Across this path there was a small space, about one foot in width, between two cars. The plaintiff, in attempting to pass through this opening, by a sudden movement of the cars was crushed between them and injured. This court held that no negligence could be attributed to the railroad company, because it was under no legal obligation to notify persons of the movements of its cars at that point. The decision was bottomed on the fact that the footpath was not a public highway, and that plaintiff's use of it was merely that of a licensee. The court said, Gantt, J., delivering the opinion: "The relation of the plaintiff and defendant must be kept in view. This was not a public crossing. If it had been so, defendant would have owed plaintiff a positive legal duty; but, being a mere private crossing, and plaintiff being a licensee only, defendant was bound not to recklessly injure plaintiff." While there was no statutory duty imposed on defendant to either ring the bell on the engine or sound the whistle before moving its train under the circumstances which existed in the case at bar at the time of the accident, it was, owing to the dangerous character of its machinery, the time and place where the injury occurred, the duty of its flagman and its agents and servants in the management of its cars under their charge to exercise at least reasonable and ordinary care and caution to prevent injury to persons crossing its tracks. If, then, the defendant was guilty of negligence which caused the injury, and plaintiff was at the time in the exercise of due care for one of his age and intelligence, and without fault contributing directly thereto, the defendant is liable. These questions were for the consideration of the jury under the instructions of the court as the evidence was ample upon which to predicate them. It necessarily follows that there was no error in refusing defendant's instructions in the nature of demurrers to the evidence.

At the instance of defendant the court instructed the jury that defendant's servants were not bound to ring the bell or sound the whistle; that there was no evidence that there was no gate or bar across the street; and that defendant was not required, under the evidence in this case, to have a brakeman on the rear end of the train at the time of the accident; and that for these reasons, also, the demurrers to the evidence should have been sustained, as there was then nothing left in the petition or evidence upon which the plaintiff could recover. As to whether the defendant's servants were guilty of negligence in the management of the train which caused the injuries, under the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence, aside from the failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle, in the absence of any evidence that there was no bar across the street, and no brakeman on the rear end of the cars, was also a question for the jury under the instructions of the court. Whatever conflict, if any, there was between plaintiff's first instruction and the one numbered 2 given at the request of the defendant, "that defendant was not bound to ring the bell or sound the whistle before moving its cars," was, under the circumstances in this case, an error committed by the court at the instance of defendant, and he will not now be heard to complain of an erroneous instruction given at his request. Alexander v. Clark, 88 Mo. 482; Flowers v. Helm, 29 Mo. 824. While the failure to do so could not be made a statutory cause of action, it was a matter for the jury to take into consideration in determining whether defendant's servants and employes were in the exercise of due care and caution in moving its cars. Wilkins v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 101 Mo. 98. It necessarily follows that there was no error committed by the court in modifying defendant's refused instructions, and in giving them as modified, as the defendant asked and the court gave substantially the same instructions at the close of the evidence.

Another contention is that the instructions given for plaintiff were erroneous, and should have been refused. Plaintiff's first instruction seems to assume that it was the duty of defendant to keep a flagman at this crossing, and at first impression is objectionable for that reason, as the statute imposes no such duty; but, as the evidence clearly shows that defendant did have a flagman at the crossing to warn persons about to cross the track of impending danger, it is somewhat difficult to conceive how the defendant could have been prejudiced or the jury misled by reason thereof. Taken as a whole, it is, we think, not vulnerable to the objection urged against it. Nor is the instruction in fact in conflict with defendant's instructions, which eliminated from the consideration of the jury all the acts of specific negligence which were alleged in the petition as statutory causes of action, and left only the general allegation of negligence in the management of the train by defendant's servants and agents. Omitting and leaving out all the specific acts of negligence, the petition contains all the necessary allegations to constitute a cause of action at common law, and we think is good after verdict. No objection was taken to it either by motion to strike out any part of it, or by demurrer, or by motion to make it more definite and certain.

We see no objection to the third instruction given on behalf of the plaintiff. It simply tells the jury that if, by reason of the youth and inexperience of the plaintiff, he was not aware of the danger to which he was exposed in crossing between the cars, they will take this into consideration in passing upon the question as to whether or not he was guilty of contributory negligence. This we understand to be the law, as uniformly announced by this court.

Next, the instruction on the measure of damages is challenged as erroneous—First, in assuming that plaintiff suffered physical pain and mental anguish. Counsel for defendant concede that plaintiff suffered physical pain, but deny that one of his age could be capable of suffering mental anguish. That pain would necessarily ensue from any such injury as plaintiff sustained cannot be denied, and may well be assumed. Mental anguish may be properly said to be in this case grief and sorrow by plaintiff over the loss of the use of his limb and becoming a cripple for life. And that a boy nine years of age may ordinarily be capable of appreciating the consequences of such an injury we think too clear for argument. There was no prejudicial error, therefore, in assuming, as the instruction did, that the plaintiff suffered physical pain and mental anguish. The physician who attended him testified that he would be a cripple for life. "The general rule is that pain of mind," when connected with bodily injury, is the subject of damages; but it must be so connected in order to be included in the estimate, unless the injury is accompanied by circumstances of malice, insult, or inhumanity. Trigg v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co., 74 Mo. 147, 41 Am. Rep. 806, and authorities cited. Another objection urged against this instruction is because it tells the jury that in estimating the damages, if they find for plaintiff, in addition to physical pain and mental anguish they will consider to what extent, if any, plaintiff's capacity for earning a livelihood after his majority will be impaired. It will be observed that this is not a claim for damages for loss of services, but because of his inability to earn a livelihood after his majority by reason of injury. The petition contains no specific allegation with reference to plaintiff's inability to earn a livelihood, or to what extent it would likely be impaired after his arrival at the age of twenty-one years; nor was there any evidence with regard thereto further than that the evidence shows the injury to be permanent, and the plaintiff a cripple for life. In the case of Rosenkrantz v. Lindell R. Co., 108 Mo. 2, Macfarlane, J., in speaking for the court, says: "It is well settled that prospective damage to adults on account of impairment of earning capacity in the future is a proper element of damages in the cases of personal injuries. Whalen v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 60 Mo. 323; Pry v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 73 Mo. 124; 2 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. § 485.

"Ordinarily, damages will not be awarded to compensate for losses not yet experienced on mere conjectural possibility that such loss will occur. In the case of an adult, proof should be made of 'previous physical condition and ability to labor or follow his usual avocation, as well as his condition since the injury, to enable the jury to properly find the pecuniary damage.' 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law. 41, and authorities cited.

"What may or may not be done by any one in the future depends upon so many contingencies that prospective loss of earnings cannot be susceptible of direct and conclusive proof, even in case of adults. Nevertheless, as has been seen, such damages are uniformly allowed. The impairment of the earning capacity of one in his infancy is as great a damage to him as though he had not been injured until the day he had reached his majority. That he would have an equal right to compensation logically follows. This plaintiff had never earned anything, and what his ability to labor or his capacity for earning money in business pursuits will be in the future, no one can tell with any certainty. It is properly held in such case, in the absence of the existence of direct evidence, that much must be left to the judgment, common experience, and 'enlightened conscience of the jurors, guided by the facts and circumstances in the case.'" It follows as a necessary consequence, if such damage was not susceptible of proof, that it was not necessary that the petition should contain specific allegation in regard thereto. The jury saw the injured limb, heard the attending physician testify that the injury was permanent, and that the plaintiff would be a cripple for life; and they were as well prepared to judge from observation of the future ability of plaintiff to earn a livelihood after he arrived at the age of maturity as any one else. The instruction which was condemned in the case of Wilburn v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 36 Mo. App. 215, concluded as follows: "And for such other causes as would be just and proper." This instruction, as was said by the court, was palpably erroneous, and gave the jury no criterion whatever by which to estimate the damages, and is unlike the instruction given in the case at bar. And, finally, it is contended that this instruction is erroneous in not confining the jury to the evidence in assessing the damages. The instruction, after specifying what the jury might take into consideration in estimating the damages, concluded as follows: "And you will return a verdict for him in such sum as you believe to be just and reasonable, not exceeding twenty thousand dollars." This part of the instruction, taken alone, would, of course, be objectionable, for the reason that it is too general and gives the jury no rule by which to estimate the damages; but when the instruction is read altogether, as it should be, no such objection could be urged against it. Haniford v. Kansas City, 103 Mo. 173. After telling the jury the facts that they must take into consideration in estimating the damages, it concludes as above indicated, and certainly confined the inquiry and damages to the facts mentioned. No objection was raised in the court below as to the amount of damages allowed by the jury, and that question cannot now be raised in this court for the first time.

As there does not appear to have been any error committed in the trial of the cause which would justify a reversal of it, the judgment will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

All concur, except Sherwood, J., who dissents, and Barclay, J., absent.

NOTE.—Crops as personal property for the purpose of levy and sale.

General doctrine.

For a classification of growing fruit as real or personal property, see note to Sparrow v. Pond (Minn.) 16 L. R. A. 103.

The question whether or not growing crops are the subject of execution as other personal property, would depend upon the question whether they are in their nature the natural or spontaneous growth of the land, as fructus naturales, or whether they are the production of labor and industry, fructus industriales. If they are the former they are considered as part of the land itself, if the latter, they are treated as other personal property. It has been generally held that only such crops as are sown and planted and reached perfection within the year are personal property and as such liable to be taken in execution. The test would, however, seem to be whether such crop was the production of the industry of man.

The manner, as well as the purpose of planting, is an essential element to be taken into consideration in determining whether such crops are real or personal estate and subject to execution. Sparrow v. Pond, 16 L. R. A. 103, 49 Minn. 412.

Growing crops of grain and other annual produce raised by industry, are personal property and chattels and may be levied on and sold under execution. Kingsley v. Holbrook, 45 N. H. 313, 36 Am. Dec. 173; Howe v. Batchelder, 49 N. H. 204.

ERROR to the District Court for Lincoln County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enjoin defendant from harvesting and carrying away wheat on a certain quarter-section of land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. David Ritchie, for plaintiff in error:

From this testimony it clearly appears that the land in question was the homestead of H. H. Meer at the time of the conveyance and could not be sold or conveyed with intent to defraud creditors for the reason that it was in any event beyond the reach of creditors.

Mull v. Jones, 33 Kan. 112, and cases there cited; Hixon v. George, 18 Kan. 253; Monroe v. May, 9 Kan. 466; Arthur v. Wallace, 8 Kan. 267.

The legal effect of this transaction was that the attempted trust was void, but the deed in question was valid as against the Meers and all the world besides and conveyed not only the land but also the growing wheat then upon the land which had been sown by the owner of the soil, and was yet immature and unripe.

Gee v. Thraikill, 45 Kan. 173; 2 Nash, Code Pl. 4th ed. p. 862; Smith v. Hague, 25 Kan. 246; Garanfro v. Cooley, 33 Kan. 187; Chap-

Annual crops which are produced by industry, when planted by the owner of the soil, remain a part of the real estate to which they are attached until such time as they are ready to be harvested and are not subject to execution until that time.

See Washb. Real Prop. 2d ed. §§ 5-8, p. 4; Burleigh v. Piper, 51 Iowa, 649; Ellithorpe v. Reident, 71 Iowa, 815.

Mr. C. B. Daughters, for defendant in error:

A conveyance to a third party for the sole purpose of having it transferred to first party's wife conveys nothing but the bare legal title to the third party.

Harrison v. Andrews, 18 Kan. 535.

In many of the states the levy upon growing crops is controlled by statute.

Our own statutes certainly authorize the levy and sale of growing crops in certain cases, and by implication in all cases.

See Justice Act, § 158; Lindley v. Kelley, 42 Ind. 294; Penhallo v. Dwight, 7 Mass. 34, 5 Am. Dec. 21; Davidson v. Waldron, 31 Ill. 120, 83 Am. Dec. 206; *Pierce v. In Sparrow v. Pond, supra, it was held that blackberries growing on bushes could not be taken in execution as personal property.

The title to a growing crop sold under a f. fa. vests in the purchaser from the time of sale as against all others, and may be gathered when ripe. Peacock v. Purvis, 2 Brod. & B. 362, 5 Moore, 79; Coombs v. Jordan, 3 Bland, Ch. 812, 22 Am. Dec. 236.

The law affords the purchaser a remedy against all who unlawfully disturb him in the enjoyment thereof. Brittain v. McKay, 23 N. C. 265, 35 Am. Dec. 733.

Sufficiency of sheriff's possessions.

Such possession must be taken of personally under an attachment as the nature of the property admits of. Throop v. Maiden (Kan.) Nov. 11, 1893.

The officer must take and retain actual and exclusive control. Ibid.

Manual possession is not necessary, a declaration that it is levied upon under an execution is sufficient. Whipple v. Foot, 2 Johns. 418, 3 Am. Dec. 442.

Where corn levied upon by the sheriff was standing in the field ungathered at the time of execution levied, and the sheriff had previously notified the defendants of the purpose of his levy, and at the time of the levy that he was about to make it, going into the field for that purpose, the court held his possession sufficient as against such parties, and that it was not necessary for him to place a watch and guard over the property. Barr v. Cannon, 69 Iowa, 20.

Where the officer notified the debtor of the levy but did not authorize him to hold possession for him nor place him in charge, and placed no notice of his claim upon the property, and exercised no control for a period of two months, during which time the property was used by the debtor, the court held that a subsequent mortgagee prevailed over such levy. Throop v. Maiden, supra.

Where a sheriff levied upon growing crops and before sale the same were seized by the collector of taxes and sold, the court held that such crops were already in the custody of the law and the collector sold without right, so that the purchaser from him had no right of action in trover against the purchaser from the sheriff. Hartwell v. Bissell, 17 Johns. 128.

The sheriff may suffer wheat to grow till harvest and then cut and sell it, or may perhaps sell it growing, and the purchaser would then be entitled to enter for the purpose of cutting and carrying it away. Adams v. Tanner, 5 Ala. 740.

In McKenzie v. Lampley, 31 Ala. 526, it was held that an execution was a lien upon a growing crop from the time of delivery to the sheriff.

Position of the purchaser.

The legal right to sell such a crop before it is gathered results from its personal character and the right to levy on it. Farham v. Tompson, 2 J. J. Marsh. 159.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendants in error, as plaintiffs below, brought their action against plaintiff in error to enjoin him from harvesting and carrying away about 90 acres of wheat, grown on a quarter-section of land in Lincoln county. The wheat was sown in the fall of 1888 by H. H. Meer, who then owned and occupied the land as his homestead. On the 4th day of October he executed a deed for the land to Edward H. Thuse. His wife was in the insane asylum at the time, and he signed the deed also as her guardian. The copy of this deed contained in the record does not show any approval by the probate court, but no point on the want of approval is made by either party. On the 22d day of October an attachment issued in a suit against Meer by a justice of the peace, was levied on the crop of wheat, and on the 11th of December, 1888, the constable sold the same to the plaintiffs. These conveyed the land on January 5, 1889, to Emma Meer, wife of H. H. Meer. He testified on the trial that he paid nothing for the farm, and was to deed it back to Meer's wife, if she got well, or any other party he traded with or sold to. On January 31, 1889, Meer and wife conveyed the land to defendant Polley.

Two questions are raised by the plaintiff in error: (1) Was there anything that could

A purchaser under such an execution may enter and remove the corn purchased, provided it belonged to the defendant in the execution and the sale was valid. Thompson v. Craigmyle, 4 B. Mon. 301, 41 Am. Dec. 240.

A sale of a crop by a sheriff under an execution is valid and entitles the purchasers to ingress and egress to gather the same. Stewart v. Doughty, 9 Johns. 108.

Where growing crops were levied upon and sold by the sheriff under a f. fa. it was held that the purchaser acquired a superior title to that of the purchaser under a subsequent tax levy. Hartwell v. Bissell, 17 Johns. 128.

A purchaser under an execution sale is entitled to the crops upon the land at the time of sale, as against a purchaser under an execution by foreclosure on a mortgage subsequently made. Shepherd v. Philbrick, 2 Denio, 175.

He has power of egress and regress for the purposes of cutting and carrying away such a crop. Brittain v. McKay, 23 N. C. 235, 35 Am. Dec. 738.

When the corn is not ripe at the time of sale under f. fa. the vendee has a reasonable time after it ripens to cut and carry it away, and while so remaining on the land it is not liable to distress for rent, being considered as in custodia legis. Smith v. Tritt, 18 N. C. 241, 28 Am. Dec. 565.

The vendee of the sheriff purchases the crops as personal chattels and not as parcel of the land, and acquires no particular right in the land itself, nor any particular possession or occupation of such land, but the law annexes to this transfer whatever is necessary for the taking and enjoying of the same for free entry, egress, and regress to cut and carry away the same. Brittain v. McKay, supra.

The Pennsylvania Act of March 21, 1772, made grain growing the subject of distress for rent, and gave the purchaser right of egress and ingress. Bear v. Bitzer, 16 Pa. 175, 55 Am. Dec. 490.

Crops held upon shares.

a. Tenants in common.

An interest in a crop worked on shares may be attached by the sheriff who retains possession of the whole crop, selling the undivided interest of the defendant, the purchaser being the co-tenant 23 L. R. A.

with the owner of the other portion of the crop. Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 541, 79 Am. Dec. 147.

In Thompson v. Mawhinney, 17 Ala. 332, 53 Am. Dec. 176, where authority was given by one joint tenant of a share of a crop to sell, it was held that such share was still liable under execution.

Where, in an execution against one co-tenant, the sheriff seizes and sells the whole property, an action of trespass will lie against him. Moulton v. Robinson, Ladd v. Robinson, 27 N. H. 550.

b. Husband and wife.

In Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 424, 59 Am. Dec. 471, it was held that land conveyed to husband and wife did not vest the husband with such an estate as was liable to sale on execution.

In Patton v. Rankin, 68 Ind. 345, 34 Am. Rep. 254, an action to enjoin the sale of corn levied upon by sheriff upon land belonging to the wife raised by the husband, the court followed Davis v. Clark, supra.

A crop raised on land held by husband and wife by entireties is subject to the same law as the land itself, and not liable to levy and sale on an execution against the husband. Patton v. Rankin, supra.

c. Cropper's share.

Execution does not lie against a cropper's share of a crop before division. Gray v. Robinson (Ariz.) Jan. 25, 1898.

A cropper's portion of the crop was held not to be subject to levy under a f. fa. until the advances made for the purpose of making the crop, were paid. Hunter v. Edmundson, Ga. Dec. pt. 1, p. 74.

In Bratzer v. Ansley, 33 N. C. 12, 51 Am. Dec. 408, it was stated to be well settled in law in that state, that a cropper had no such interest in the crop as could be subjected to the payment of his debts while it remained en masse until a division, the whole being the property of the landlord.

d. Landlord and tenant.

A landlord's attachment for rent should direct the levy on the crops only, and should not authorize the officer executing it to levy on the estate generally. Ellis v. Martin, 60 Ala. 394; Hawkins v. Gill, 6 Ala. 620.

be taken under the order of attachment issued against Meer, by which the court could obtain jurisdiction? It is contended that the farm was the homestead of Meer, entirely exempt from the payment of his debts; that his creditors could not look, in any event, to this land for the satisfaction of their claims; that, as against them, the conveyance to Thuse passed a full title, notwithstanding the want of consideration, and the secret understanding that Thuse was to hold it for the plaintiff and subject to the control of Meer; that, as the trust under which Thuse held was created wholly by parol, it could not be enforced; that under the authority of Gee v. Thrailkill, 45 Kan. 173, Thuse acquired the absolute title to the land, which carried with it the crop of growing wheat; that, when the constable levied the attachment, Meer had no property either in the land or the growing wheat; and that he therefore at that time had no property in the wheat to be attached. Various cases are cited in support of the proposition that a conveyance of lands carries title to all growing crops thereon. There can be no question as to the correctness of this as a general proposition, but we think that this case clearly shows that Thuse never had any real interest in the land. A deed to the homestead, executed under the circumstances and in the manner shown in this case, without the approval of the probate court, would not pass any title. But assuming that it did pass the legal title to Thuse, and, further, that the trust thereby created could not have been enforced in an action against him, yet as he has seen fit to recognize and execute the trust so created, and has in fact conveyed the land in accordance with the parol understanding between himself and Meer, we think the equitable title must be held to have never been transferred, and that the land and the wheat thereon was just as much the property of Meer after the execution of the conveyance to Thuse as before. Harrison v. Andrews, 18 Kan. 535. We think this case must be considered as though no change of title occurred until the execution of the deed by Meer and wife to Polley, which was after the sale of the growing wheat.

The second contention is that growing wheat sown by the owner of the soil is a part of the realty until ripe and ready to sever from the soil, and therefore is not subject to attachment as personality. In support of this Process of attachment is the remedy for the enforcing of the lien if the crop is removed without consent, and if removed attachment may be levied on it in possession of the tenant or one holding it in his right, or in the possession of the purchaser with notice. Lomax v. LeGrand, 60 Ala. 537; Rev. Code, §§ 2961, 2963.

An attachment lien which ordinarily gives from the time of seizure or levy upon the property, does not so commence in the case of a crop lien the process of attachment only being used to enforce the latter. Carter v. Wilson, 61 Ala. 434.

In Sebell v. Simon, 66 Cal. 254, it was held the purchaser at an execution sale of the interest of a landlord in a growing crop was tenant in common with the lessee where the land was rented upon shares.

In Deaver v. Rice, 20 N. C. 431, 34 Am. Dec. 338, it was held that the landlord's rent lien was not superior to that of the tenant's other creditors upon the crop.

In Walston v. Bryan, 64 N. C. 764, the lessor's interest in a crop reserved as rent was held not to be the subject of levy under execution prior to its separation.

A landlord's share in a crop is not severed by a sale under a f. fa. of the share, so as to affect the title of a subsequent purchaser at a sheriff's sale, who acquires his deed before the rent is due. Long v. Seavers, 103 Pa. 517.

Where the portion of a crop was reserved to the landlord in payment of rent, it was held he was not a tenant in common with the lessee and had no property in the crop until it was severed and delivered, which could be made the subject of a levy and sale. Devore v. Kemp, 3 Hill, L. 359.

Where land was leased upon shares, the produce to be controlled by the lessor until sale, the possession of the premises to be that of the lessor as against the lessee's creditors, it was held that the lessee had no title or interest in the crops attachable for his debts. Madon v. Colburn, 23 Vt. 631, 67 Am. Dec. 730.

State decisions.

Under the Alabama Act of 1821, § 1, a f. fa. or other execution could not be levied upon a planted crop until gathered, and it has been held that the statute 23 L. R. A.

prevents the lien attaching until that period, and the title of bona fide purchaser or creditors will not be affected thereby. Adams v. Tanner, 5 Ala. 740.

In Evans v. Lamar, 21 Ala. 333, it was stated that while it might be conceded that an ungathered crop was regarded as the chattel of the person who owned it, and by the common law was subject to be levied upon and sold under execution for the payment of his debts, yet the legislature of that state had by special enactment exempted such property from levy and sale under execution. Clay's Dig. 210, § 46.

The above act was repealed by section 10 of the Code, which enacted by section 2461, that a levy might be made on a growing crop, when there was no other property of the defendant known to the sheriff, but that no sale should be made until the crop was gathered, and this section was repealed by an Act of February 7, 1854.

In McKenzie v. Lampley, 31 Ala. 523, the delivery of the fiat facias to the sheriff was held to give the plaintiff a lien upon the growing crop, the common law rule not being affected by the statutory provisions which were in force at the time the writ was received by the sheriff.

Such crop is an independent whole not going as the land, but in a different direction, and "such a growing crop may under the common law be seized under a fiat facias issued against the owner of the inheritance as his goods and chattels, even while they are annexed to the freehold." McKenzie v. Lampley, 31 Ala. 523, 523.

A growing crop, however immature its state and whatever of labor may be required for its cultivation to maturity, and its severance from the soil, is a personal chattel, subject at common law to execution against a tenant, passing to his personal representatives not descending with the land to the heir, and it is a subject of sale or mortgage. Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 235.

In Raventas v. Green, 57 Cal. 254, an unripe growing crop of grain was held to be personal property subject to attachment, service of the writ and statutory notice being a sufficient attachment.

Where a lease provided that the entire crop should be the property of the landlord until the advances were paid, the crop raised was held not to be sub-proposition, Washb. Real Prop. 2d ed. p. 4; Burleigh v. Piper, 51 Iowa, 649, and Ellithorpe v. Reidesil, 71 Iowa, 815, are cited. The last of these authorities, which is a case decided by the supreme court of Iowa, fully sustains this contention; and it is said in the opinion: "The whole proceeding was on the theory that the crops were personal property, and could be levied on and sold as such; but while they remained immature, and were being matured by the soil, they were attached to and constituted part of the realty; they could no more be levied upon and sold on execution as personally than could the trees growing upon the premises. This doctrine is elementary, and it has frequently been declared by this court. Downard v. Groff, 40 Iowa, 597; Burleigh v. Piper, 51 Iowa, 650; Hecht v. Dettman, 56 Iowa, 679, 41 Am. Rep. 181; Martin v. Knapp, 57 Iowa, 386." It must be conceded that there is much force in the reasoning to sustain this position. It is a well-established rule that a conveyance of land, either by voluntary deed or judicial sale without reservation, carries all growing crops with the title to the land. Garansflo v. Cooley, 83 Kan. 187; Smith v. Hague, 25 Kan. 246; Chapman v. Veach, 32 Kan. 167. The value of the growing crop depends upon the soil for its support and nourishment, and if disconnected at once, in a case like this, would be nothing. A levy and sale usually affords but little return to the creditor, while it is a serious loss oftentimes to the debtor; but, whatever may be our individual views as to the policy of the law, we must be governed by it as we find it. In the case of Beckman v. Sikes, 85 Kan. 120, it was held that a sale under a mortgage foreclosure carried to the purchaser growing crops planted after the decree of foreclosure was entered as against a purchaser, who bought from the mortgagor the growing crop one day before the sale by the sheriff. In the opinion the court says: "The lien of the mortgage and the judgment, however, attached to the growing crops until they were severed, as well as to the land. The mortgagor planted the crop, knowing that it was subject to the mortgage, and liable to be divested by the foreclosure and sale of the premises. Any one who purchased said crops from him took them subject to the same contingency, as the recorded mortgage and the decree of foreclosure were notice to him of the existence of the lien. If the land is not sold until the crops ripen and are severed, the vendee of the mortgagor would ordinarily get a good title; but if the land was sold and conveyed while the crop was still growing, and there was no reservation, or waiver of the right to the crop, at such sale the title to the same would pass with the land." Goodwin v. Smith, 49 Kan. 351, 17 L. R. A. 284, holds: "The pur-ject to attachment by creditors until after the repayment of such advances. Howell v. Foster, 66 Cal. 169.

Where a mortgage à fa. was levied upon stock "and all the crops on" a certain place, it was held the levy was sufficiently specific. Crine v. Tifts, 65 Ga. 644.

Where a large crop of growing corn was purchased, it was held not to be liable to execution for the vendor's debts while being cribbed on the premises where grown, it appearing that the vendor clearly intended the sale to be complete at the time the contract was entered into. Vaughn v. Owens, 21 Ill. App. 249.

Where mortgaged lands in possession of the mortgagor, were levied upon by an execution creditor who sold a crop of wheat growing thereon and levied upon a crop of corn, but before sale thereof a receiver was appointed in foreclosure proceedings, the court held that as against such execution creditor the receiver had no rights to the crops. Favorite v. Deardorff, 84 Ind. 565.

The homestead was exempt from such a forced sale except where a lien is given by the joint consent of husband and wife, under article 15, § 9, of the Kansas Constitution. Coughlin v. Coughlin, 26 Kan. 116.

Growing crops raised annually by labor are the subject of sale as personal property before maturity, and their sale does not necessarily involve an interest in realty requiring a written agreement. Northern v. State, 1 Ind. 112, where the action was brought against a constable for failure to return an execution and to collect the money thereon.

By article 466 of the Revised Code of Louisiana, standing crops are considered as immovables and as part of the land to which they are attached, and by article 466 the fruits of an immovable, gathered or produced while it is under seizure, are considered as making part thereof and inure to the benefit of the person making the seizure.

In Porche v. Bodin, 28 La. Ann. 761, it was held that the evident meaning of these articles was, where the crop belongs to the owner of the plantation, it forms part of the immovable, and where it is seized, the fruits gathered or produced inure to the benefit of the seizing creditor.

Where the plantation was seized under a judgment and was not sold until some four years after, and after the lien had expired, it was held that the mere seizure of the mortgaged property did not divest the plaintiff of his title to the crop which he was raising, and that the seizure in no manner disturbed him in its cultivation. Sandel v. Douglass, 27 La. Ann. 628.

Where a sheriff entered and seized growing corn, cut down the same and sold it as personal estate, the court held his action justifiable. Penhallow v. Dwight, 7 Mass. 84, 5 Am. Dec. 81.

The equity prevailing in favor of a mortgagee of after-acquired property will not prevail against a levy made before it had become no more than a general equity. People v. Bristol, 35 Mich. 28.

A levy will prevail over subsequent transactions, but it cannot invalidate prior dispositions in favor of honest creditors and in violation of no statute or legal rule. Ibid.

Compiled Laws of Michigan, §§ 4097, 6100, in forbidding the sale of the equity of redemption in mortgaged lands did not in terms prohibit the sale of anything personal in its nature. Preston v. Ryan, 45 Mich. 174.

In Gillitt v. Truax, 27 Minn. 528, it was held that growing crops might be levied upon at any period of their growth, without regard to whether they were above or below the surface, but no sale could be made until the same were ripe or fit for harvesting, and such sale must be completed within thirty days thereafter. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 66, § 815.

In Norris v. Watson, 22 N. H. 364, 55 Am. Dec. 161, it was held that the provisions of the Revised Statutes, section 15, chapter 184, authorizing the mortgage of growing crops as personal property, and the attachment of personal property subject to mortgage, were not intended to change the law relating to the attachment of growing crops which were not therefore attachable.

chaser at a judicial sale of mortgaged premises is entitled to the growing crop of wheat on the land against the tenant of the mortgagor, who took a lease of the land after a suit for foreclosure had been commenced, and planted the wheat after judgment had been rendered in the foreclosure action; the purchaser having acquired a sheriff's deed on the 2d day of February, and the wheat not ripening and being ready for harvesting until the 20th day of June." See also Missouri Valley Land Co. v. Barwick, 50 Kan. 57. In Caldwell v. Alsop, 48 Kan. 571, 17 L. R. A. 782, "an owner of mortgaged land leased the same to another, and reserved as rent a share of the crop. He was in default in the payment of the mortgage, and insolvent. After default was made, and after the leasing of the premises, but before the rent was due, he sold his share of the crop rent to one who had notice of the mortgage and of the default. After the crop had fully matured, but while it was standing upon the land, foreclosure proceedings were begun, and a receiver of the land appointed, but the court refused to authorize the receiver to take possession of the crop. Held, that the order of refusal was not error."

It will be observed that the decisions in all these cases relate to the rights of mortgagors, mortgagees, and parties claiming under them. In this case we have a different question to consider. There is no question here as to the effect of a voluntary incumbrance on the land, nor of a decree of foreclosure and sale thereunder. We have here the bare question as to whether immature growing crops are a part of the realty, as between debtor and creditor, or are personal property, subject to attachment and sale for debt. In Caldwell v. Custard, 7 Kan. 303, it was said "that growing crops are personal estate." In 1 Freeman on Executions, § 118, it is said: "Crops, whether growing, or standing in the field ready to be harvested, are, when produced by annual cultivation, no part of the realty. They are therefore liable to voluntary transfer as chattels. It is equally well settled that they may be assigned and sold under execution. At common law, fructus industriales, as growing corn or other annual products, which would go to the executors upon death, may be taken upon execution." The author cites a long list of authorities in support of his position. In 8 Washburn on Real Property, p. 367, the author says: "But although a sale of growing crops of annual culture not yet mature would seem to carry with it an interest in land, since a crop must stand upon and draw nutriment from the soil until it shall have grown and matured for the harvest, the cases appear to be quite uniform in holding that the property in the crop would pass, with a

The statute in question is limited in its operation to "property not exempt from the attachment" and names "grain unthrashed, hay, or potatoes," but makes no mention of growing crops. Norris v. Watson, supra.

In Shannon v. Jones, 34 N. C. 206, it was held that an execution might be levied upon a matured standing crop, chapter 35 of the Act of 1844 only applying to growing crops not matured.

Where such a growing crop was sold by the sheriff, the purchaser subsequently gathering the same, it was held that the officer was liable for trover in the same manner as a purchaser. Shannon v. Jones, supra.

Where a sheriff sold growing corn under an execution, two miles from the place where the crop stood, the court held the sale invalid and the purchaser acquired no title. Smith v. Tritt, 18 N. C. 241, 38 Am. Dec. 555; Ainsworth v. Greelee, 7 N. C. 470, 9 Am. Dec. 615; Blount v. Mitchell, 8 N. C. 65.

The Revised Code, chapter 45, section 11, excepts growing crops from levy under execution, until matured. Wooten v. Hill, 96 N. C. 52.

In Collins v. Myers, 16 Ohio, 547, it was held that a mortgage upon personal property which remained in the possession of the mortgagor, was void as against creditors and subsequent purchasers.

Growing crops are not the subject of sale under a levari facias. Myers v. White, 1 Rawle, 353.

An action quare clausum fregit will lie for the levy of such an execution. Ibid.

In Myers v. White, supra, it was held that the sheriff could not sell grain in the ground by virtue of a levari facias on a mortgage.

In Stambaugh v. Yeates, 2 Rawle, 161, it was held that although grain in the ground might be sold as personal property on an execution on a f. fa., yet it did not pass by a levy and sale of the land on a renditioni exponas.

Where land was sold by the sheriff, where the grain was the property of the judgment debtor, it was held that a subsequent purchaser under a later sheriff sale of the grain had no title as against the first purchaser. Bear v. Bitzer, 16 Pa. 175, 55 Am. Dec. 490.

A sale under a f. fa. of the landlord's share, does not create a severance so as to pass his title as against a purchaser of the lands at a subsequent sheriff sale, taking his deed before the rent is due. Long v. Seavers, 108 Pa. 519.

All rent in grain or money falling due after a private sale of the land, or after a judicial sale with the deed acknowledged, and all grain of the vendor or debtor then growing, pass to the vendee of the sheriff as against every other assignment. Bittinger v. Baker, 29 Pa. 66, 70 Am. Dec. 154.

Where, by an agreement between a father and his son, the son was to reimburse himself for supplies furnished for the purpose of raising a crop, which was to be raised for the purpose of supporting the family, the father being unable to do so and in debt, it was held not a fraud upon creditors, and that the crop could not be made the subject of execution by the father's creditors. Leslie v. Joyner, 2 Head, 514.

In Tennessee under section 3749 of the Code (Milliken & Vertrees), the right of a creditor to levy upon the growing crop of his debtor is recognized, but cannot be executed until the 15th of November after such crop is matured, unless the owner absconds, conceals himself, or leaves the country. Edwards v. Thompson, 85 Tenn. 720.

When grown upon the homestead, however, it is not the subject of seizure and sale until after it is gathered. Coates v. Caldwell, 71 Tex. 20; Silberberg v. Trilling, 83 Tex. 523.

Where a mortgagee purchases at a foreclosure sale, the crops will pass as against an execution creditor of the mortgagor, who would be entitled to an injunction for the protection of his interests. Crews v. Pendleton, 1 Leigh, 297, 19 Am. Dec. 750.

In Caldwell v. Fifield, 24 N. J. L. 161, it was held that subsequently acquired property was not bound by the levy of a sheriff under an execution.

license to enter and sever the same; and some of the English cases put it upon the same ground as that by which one may hold emblements growing upon the soil of another. An attempt to sum up the results of the decisions, although they are not wholly harmonious, may be made as follows: Fructus industriales, as has been previously said, are, at common law, chattels, and are governed by the seventeenth section of the statute of frauds. This seems to be agreed by all the cases, though it is often difficult to decide what are fructus industriales." In Benjamin on Sales, p. 126, it is said: "As to artificial or annual crops, fructus industriales, the law is quite clear that a sale thereof, in whatever state of maturity, and however long they are to remain in the soil in order to complete their growth, is a sale of personal property, and not of an interest in land." In Ayers v. Hawk (N. J. Eq.), 11 Atl. Rep. 744, two judgment creditors levied on what they both claimed to be a growing crop of corn, one making his levy after the corn was put in the ground, but before it had made its appearance above the surface. The other levied after such appearance. Held, that the first was a valid levy, and entitled to priority. We think the authorities greatly preponderate in support of the proposition that annual crops, fruits of the labor of the tiller of the soil, are personal property, subject to levy and sale as chattels for the debts of the owner. Lindley v. Kelley, 42 Ind. 294; Pierce v. Roche, 40 Ill. 292; Johnson v. Walker, 28 Neb. 786. For further citations bearing on this question, see, particularly, Freeman on Executions, above cited. The statutes of this state also seem to recognize this rule. The sixth subdivision of paragraph 2998 of the General Statutes of 1889, concerning exemptions, exempts "the necessary food for the support of the stock mentioned in this section for one year, either provided or growing, or both, as the debtor may choose." Paragraph 2824: "The emblements or annual crops raised by labor, and whether severed or not from the land of the deceased at the time of his death, shall be assets in the hands of the executor or administrator, and shall be included in the inventory." Paragraph 2825: "The executor or administrator, or the person to whom he may sell such emblements may, at all reasonable times, enter upon the lands to cultivate, sever and gather the same." Paragraph 5008 (being part of the procedure before justices of the peace): "In all cases where any lands may have been let, reserving rent in kind, and when the crops or emblements growing or grown thereon shall be levied on or attached by virtue of any execution, attachment or other process against the landlord or tenant, the interest of such landlord or tenant against whom such process was not issued, shall not be affected thereby; but the same may be sold, subject to the claim or interest of the landlord or tenant against whom such process did not issue." While these sections do not reach the case we have under consideration, we think they show a recognition of what we regard as the settled doctrine of the common law,—that such growing crops are personal property, subject to sale on execution for the debts of the owner; and, were we to hold a different rule to apply in this case, the only class of debtors benefited thereby would be those owning both the soil and the crop, for the section of the justice's act just quoted renders the shares of landlord and tenant, where that relation exists, both subject to levy and sale. It cannot be presumed that the legislature would intentionally exempt crops raised by the labor of the owner of the land, and at the same time subject to execution those raised by a tenant entitled to a share, only, for his labors.

However much we may disapprove of the policy of the law, we are constrained to hold that the growing wheat attached in this case was subject to levy, and to affirm the judgment.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT

S. P. LEEP, Appt.,

v.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN & SOUTHERN R. CO.

(.....Ark.....)

1. The legislature cannot interfere with the right of parties to contract on a subject which is purely and exclusively private, unaffected by any public interest, or duty to person, to society, or government, where the parties are capable of contracting.
2. The right of an individual to contract to labor with a period of credit for payment of his wages is included in the constitutional right to acquire and possess property.

3. Statutes regulating contracts between corporations and their employés may be enacted under the reserved power to amend corporate charters.
4. Corporations may, by statute, be compelled on the discharge of an employe to pay the wages then earned, and without discount for prepayment, although by the terms of his contract the wages would not have been yet payable, if power to amend their charters has been reserved.
5. A statute attempting to make a corporation, on the discharge of an employe, pay the whole amount of his stipulated wages up to that date, although by his failure to perform his contract he has damaged the corporation, is unconstitutional, as taking property from the corporation without due process of law.

6. In a statute as to contracts with employes, unconstitutional provisions as to natural persons may be eliminated, where the remainder of the statute relates to corporations, and is valid.
7. The restriction by statute of contracts between corporations and employes is not unconstitutional because interfering with the right of the employes to contract.
8. A statute as to contracts with employes is general and uniform, where it applies to all corporations engaged in the business of operating or constructing railroads, or railroad bridges.
9. Actions for penalties which are excluded from the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace do not include an action by a discharged employe for wages, in which he is entitled to recover, under the statute, for wages after his discharge up to the day of payment, as the additional amount is in the nature of exemplary damages rather than a statutory penalty.

(February 3, 1894.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County disallowing a portion of his claim in an action brought to recover wages and a penalty for failure to pay them when demanded. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meers, Marshall & Coffman, for appellant:

If this act is a legitimate exercise of the police power, there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States or any of its amendments to interfere.

Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205; Wilkinson v. Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 35 L. ed. 572.

Nor is there in the state constitution, for no state or people can part with this power by contract or otherwise.

18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 745, 746; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079.

This power cannot be defined specifically, but it extends to the prohibition of all things hurtful to society. It is simply the legislative department acting without limit, save the authority of the courts to define in each case what is the proper subject-matter and such a reasonable exercise of this power as will not invade constitutional rights.

State v. Schlemmer, 10 L. R. A. 185, and note, 43 La. Ann. 1166; 18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 740; 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 689; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611; Lakeriew v. Ross Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 192, 23 Am. Rep. 71; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, §§ 1-3.

Railroad and other corporations and individuals engaged in a business "affected with a public interest" are subject to police regulations as to charges and many other things. "The test of their constitutionality is in every case whether they are designed and do tend to protect some public or private right from the injurious act of the railroad company, and the most complete regulation of this kind is that by railroad commissioners."

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 561, 590, 594-599; Railroad Comrs. v. Portland & O. Cent. R. Co. 68 Me. 269, 18 Am. Rep. 208; Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 37 Vt. 140, 62 Am. Dec. 625; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94; Budd v. New York, 148 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45.

That the relations of employer and employe, when connected with a public interest and when the public safety and welfare require it, may be the subject-matter of police regulation, cannot be doubted.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 179.

The legislative opinion that police regulation in this regard is necessary is final, and the courts can only say whether the act "bears a real or substantial relation" to the object sought; with its wisdom, policy or necessity they have nothing to do.

Mugler v. Kansas, supra; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 746, 747.

If it be contended that the business of constructing railroads or railroad bridges is not affected with a public interest, that part of the act may be stricken out and the rest allowed to stand.

Marsh v. State, 37 Ark. 356.

For a similar reason it might be held good only as to corporations engaged in either business named or only as to corporations operating railroads or railroad bridges. The constitutional provisions as to amendments are read into every charter, and give the power of recalling every right, privilege, or immunity derived directly from the state.

Hancock v. Yaden, 6 L. R. A. 576, 121 Ind. 366, holds that the laborer himself may be prohibited by statute from contracting for anything but money for his wages.

Shaffer v. Union Min. Co. of Allegany County, 55 Md. 79, is a case exactly in point, under a statute which, like our own, restricted the corporation but not the laborer in his right of contract. It was urged that the statute repealed by implication another statute which gave him the right to assign his wages for supplies, but the court held otherwise.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company is a corporation duly organized according to the laws of Arkansas, and is engaged in operating a railroad in this state. S. P. Leep was employed to work for it at the rate of $35 per month of thirty days, and labored under his contract until the 9th of September, 1890, when he was discharged. On the same day he demanded of the company his unpaid wages that were then due, amounting, at the contract rate, to the sum of $27.90. The company failed to pay then, but promised that it would on the 18th of September, 1890. Leep refused to wait until the day of the promised payment, and brought suit before a justice of the peace for the amount due to him, the $27.90, and also for a penalty for the nonpayment of the same on the day he was discharged, at the contract rate from the time of such discharge to the day of bringing the suit. He recovered a judgment for $36.61 and costs. The defendant then appealed to the Pulaski circuit court. He recovered judgment in that court against the defendant for $27.90 and costs, but no penalty or damages, and, failing to recover the penalty, he appealed to this court.

He bases his claim to a penalty or damages upon the act of the general assembly, which is in the following words:

"Section 1. Whenever any railroad company or any company, corporation, or person engaged in the business of operating or constructing any railroad or railroad bridge, or any contractor or sub-contractor engaged in the construction of any such road or bridge, shall discharge, with or without cause, or refuse to further employ any servant or employé thereof, the unpaid wages of any such servant or employé, then earned at the contract rate, without abatement or deduction, shall be and become due and payable on the day of such discharge, or refusal to longer employ; and if the same be not paid on such day, then, as a penalty for such nonpayment, the wages of such servant or employé shall continue at the same rate until paid; provided, such wages shall not continue more than sixty days, unless an action therefor shall be commenced within that time.

"Sec. 2. That no such servant or employé who secretes or absents himself to avoid payment to him or refuses to receive the same when fully tendered, shall be entitled to any benefit under this act for such time as he so avoids payment.

"Sec. 3. That any such servant or employé whose employment is for a definite period of time, and who is discharged without cause before the expiration of such time, may, in addition to the penalties prescribed by this act, have an action against any such employer for any damages he may have sustained by reason of such wrongful discharge, and such action may be joined with an action for unpaid wages and penalty."

This act applies to corporations, companies, and persons engaged in the business of operating or constructing railroads or railroad bridges, and to contractors and subcontractors engaged in the construction of any such road or bridge, and requires them to pay their employes, on the day of discharge, or of the refusal to further employ them, the unpaid wages then earned by them at the contract rate, without abatement or deduction. The object of the act is to make it unlawful for such companies, corporations, persons, contractors, or subcontractors to contract to pay the wages of those employed by them in the operating of railroads or in the construction of such roads or bridges at any time subsequent to the day on which the employes may be discharged, or on which such employer may refuse to longer employ them. In other words, it declares the wages shall be paid on such day, notwithstanding they may not be due according to the contract until a day subsequent. In this respect the act attempts to limit the right to contract. Is it constitutional?

The constitutionality of a legislative act is to be determined solely by reference to those limitations which the constitution imposes. No court ought to "declare a statute unconstitutional and void," says Judge Cooley, "solely on the ground of unjust and oppressive provisions, or because it is supposed to violate the natural, social, or political rights of the citizen, unless it can be shown such injustice is prohibited, or such rights are guaranteed or protected by the constitution." The judiciary and the legislative are co-ordinate departments of the government; neither of which has a right to invade the province of the other. In determining the validity of a statute the sole question for the courts to decide is one of power, not of expediency, justice, or wisdom. In deciding such questions they should, in the spirit of the comity and good will that should prevail between the different departments of the government, resolve all doubt in favor of the constitutionality of the acts of the legislature; and, if any act be reasonably susceptible of two constructions, one of which would render it unconstitutional and the other valid, should give to it the latter, on the presumption that the legislature did not intend to exceed its power. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 157, 200, 203, 208; Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 718, 25 L. ed. 496, 501; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118, 24 L. ed. 77; Powell v. Com. 114 Pa. 292; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 520, 29 L. ed. 465.

According to the foregoing test, is the act under consideration constitutional? Section 8 of article 2 of the Constitution of this state declares: "All men are created equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and inalienable rights; amongst which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; of acquiring, possessing and protecting property and reputation; and of pursuing their own happiness. To secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Section 8 of the same article ordains that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Section 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The rights to acquire and possess property necessarily include the right to contract, for it is the principal mode of acquisition, and is the only way by which a person can rightly acquire it by his own exertion. Of all the "rights of persons" it is the most essential to human happiness.

But the right to contract is not unlimited. The conflicting interests of individuals make this impossible. Rights in conflict with each other cannot be unlimited. Duties to persons, to society, the public, and the government are imposed on every individual. Every man, when he enters into society, undertakes to perform these duties; and necessarily surrenders some rights or privileges on account of his relation to others. His right to contract becomes subject to these duties, among which is the duty to so conduct himself and use his own property as to not unnecessarily injure another. He submits himself to such restraints and burdens as may conduce to the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state. To conserve and enforce these rights and duties the government can impose such restrictions upon his actions as may be appropriate for that purpose. "This power inheres in every sovereignty, and is essential to the maintenance of public order, and the preservation of mutual rights from the disturbing conflicts which would arise in the absence of any controlling, regulating authority."

The legislature can control, to some extent, the right to contract in reference to property "clothed with a public interest, when used in a manner to make it of public consequence, and affect the community at large." By devoting his property to a use in which the public has an interest, the owner, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and subjects himself to the control of the legislature for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created. Upon this principle the legislature can fix the maximum of charges for the storage of grain in public warehouses, and for carriage of freight and passengers by common carriers. From the same source comes the power to regulate millers, bakers, hackmen, ferries, wharfingers, innkeepers, and the like, "and in so doing to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold." Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118, 24 L. ed. 77; Budd v. New York, 148 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45; Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 31 L. ed. 841, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 56, 49 Ark. 325; Mobile v. Yuille, 3 Ala. 140, 36 Am. Dec. 441. Upon the same principle it was held in Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 28 L. ed. 178, "that it is within the power of the government to regulate the price at which water shall be sold by one who enjoys a virtual monopoly of the sale."

It has been held by the courts that the legislature can regulate or prohibit the sale or manufacture of oleomargarine for the purpose of protecting the public against fraud. Powell v. Com. 114 Pa. 265, 60 Am. Rep. 350, 137 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253; State v. Addington, 12 Mo. App. 214, 77 Mo. 110.

Common carriers and telegraph companies cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of themselves or their servants. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Lesser, 46 Ark. 236; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed. 788; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 434, 9 L. R. A. 744.

No one can bind himself by an agreement not to engage in any particular business at any time or place. Taylor v. Saurman, 110 Pa. 3.

Such contracts are void, because they are injurious to the public, contrary to public policy.

An act which made it unlawful for any person to transport or move, after sunset and before sunrise of the succeeding day, within certain counties, any cotton in the seed, but permitted the owner or producer to remove it from the field to his gin house, or other place of storage, was held by the supreme court of Alabama to be constitutional. The court holds that "its object was to regulate traffic in the staple agricultural product of the state, so as to prevent a prevalent evil, which, in the opinion of the lawmaking power, may have done much to demoralize agricultural labor and destroy the legitimate profits of agricultural pursuits, to the public detriment, at least within the specified territory." Davis v. State, 68 Ala. 58, 44 Am. Rep. 128; Mangan v. State, 76 Ala. 60. Similar statutes have been held to be constitutional by other courts. State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 714; Butcher's Union, S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City, L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Hardie v. Roessler, 109 N. Y. 127; Brechbill v. Randall, 102 Ind. 528, 52 Am. Rep. 695. There can be no violation of the constitution in the denial of the right to contract to those who are incapable of binding themselves thereby. The term "contract" implies "the existence of a physical and moral power of assenting, as well as a deliberate and free exercise of such power. The absence of any of these capacities in either of the parties to a contract renders the person laboring under it incapable of binding himself thereby." Hence restrictions were thrown around the exercise of this right by seamen. They sustained to the master of a ship a servile relation. At common law they owed to him obedience and respect; and in case of disobedience or disorderly conduct the master could punish them, because discipline is necessary, and "without it the ship would always be in great peril, and no voyage could be successfully conducted." The authority of the master over them was like unto that of a parent over his child, or of a master over his apprentice. This employment, and the usages and customs regulating it, constituted them a servile class, as helpless and dependent in many respects as that of infants, and demanded the protection accorded to them.

The legislature has the power to prohibit the making of contracts, when it becomes necessary to protect the rights of others. As for example, it can provide by statute, as it did in Pennsylvania, that when the debtor, and a person or corporation owing money to the debtor, are residents of the state, it shall be unlawful for any citizen to send out of the state, by assignment or otherwise, for or without value, any claim against such debtor, with the intent to deprive him of his exemptions from execution by having collections out of such money made in the courts of another state; and that the assignor in such a case shall be liable in an action of debt to the person from whom any such claim shall have been collected by attachment or otherwise, outside of the courts of the state of his residence for the full amount collected. Sweeney v. Hunter, 145 Pa. 363.

Another illustration of the power of the legislature to restrict the right to contract when it becomes necessary to protect others is furnished by the statutes of this state. It is the duty of every husband to take care of, support, and protect his wife and children, and provide them with a home. To aid him in the discharge of this duty, the constitution of this state declares "that the homestead of any resident of this state, who is married or the head of a family, shall not," except in certain specified cases, "be subject to the lien of any judgment or decree of any court, or to sale under execution or other process thereon." The obvious intent of this provision was to secure to every resident, who is married or the head of a family, a home, which he may improve and make comfortable, where his wife and children "may be sheltered and live beyond the reach of misfortunes which even the most prudent and sagacious cannot always avoid." For the purpose of protecting the wife in the enjoyment of this right, the statutes of this state provide "that no conveyance, mortgage, or other instrument affecting the homestead of any married man, shall be of any validity, . . . unless his wife joins in the execution of such instrument and acknowledges the same."

Other instances of statutory regulations of the right to contract may be found in the statutes of many states prohibiting the taking of usury. They rest upon a traditional policy antedating constitutions. They "proceed," says Mr. Justice Schofield, in Prorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 493, "upon the theory that the lender and borrower of money do not occupy towards each other the same relations of equality that parties do in contracting with each other in regard to the loan or sale of other kinds of property, and that the borrower's necessities deprive him of freedom in contracting, and place him at the mercy of the lender." Lord Chief Justice Best, in 1825, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the twelve judges in the house of lords upon a question submitted to them under the English usury laws, said: "The supposed policy of the usury laws in modern times is to protect necessity against avarice, to fix such a rate of interest as will enable industry to employ with advantage borrowed capital, and thereby to promote labor and increase national wealth, and to enable the state to borrow on better terms than could be made if speculators could meet the ministers in the money market on equal terms." House of Lords, 8 Bing. 193. So at least they can be based on the right of the legislature to protect the public welfare.

The statutes of fraud are sometimes referred to for the purpose of showing the power of the legislature to control the right to contract. The object of these statutes was to prevent fraud and perjuries. For this purpose some of them provide that certain contracts shall be in writing, in order to prevent controversies, litigation, and false swearing as to the terms of the contract. Others declare that certain deeds, conveyances, and transactions shall be void, because they defraud or tend to defraud innocent persons. They are based on the maxim, "sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas." None of them limit the right to contract, but regulate the exercise of it. Manuf. Dig. §§ 3371-3384. They clearly come within the power of the legislature to protect the rights of persons, prevent wrongs, and enforce honesty and fair dealing in the transactions of individuals.

We have thus far spoken of the limitations that can be imposed on the right to contract. We have seen that the power of the legislature to do so is based in every case on some condition, and not on the absolute right to control. We think it is obvious that the right to contract cannot be limited by arbitrary legislation which rests on no reason upon which it can be defended; for, if it could, the right would cease to exist, and become a license revocable at the will of the legislature, and the government would become a despotism in theory, if not in fact. Such a power cannot exist, for, if it could, it would be subversive of the right to enjoy and defend liberty, to acquire and possess property, and to pursue happiness, declared to be inalienable by the constitution of this state.

When the subject of contract is purely and exclusively private, unaffected by any public interest or duty to person, to society, or government, and the parties are capable of contracting, there is no condition existing upon which the legislature can interfere for the purpose of prohibiting the contract or controlling the terms thereof. In State v. Goodwill, 38 W. Va. 179, 6 L. R. A. 621, the supreme court considered the constitutionality of a statute of West Virginia, which declared "that it shall not be lawful for any person, firm, company, corporation, or association engaged in mining coal, ore, or other minerals, or mining and manufacturing them or either of them, or manufacturing iron or steel, or both, or any other kind of manufacturing, . . . to issue for the payment of labor any order or other paper notes whatsoever unless the same purports to be redeemable for its face value in lawful money of the United States, bearing interest at a legal rate, made payable to employé or bearer, and redeemable within a period of thirty days by the person, firm, company, corporation or association giving, making or issuing the same." The court held that the statute was unconstitutional and void, and said: "The property which every man has in his own labor, as it is the original foundation of all other property, so it is the most sacred and inviolable. The patrimony of the poor man lies in the strength and dexterity of his own hand; and to hinder him from employing these in what manner he may think proper, without injury to his neighbor, is a plain violation of this most sacred property. It is equally an encroachment both upon the just liberty and rights of the workman and his employer, or those who might be disposed to employ him, for the legislature to interfere with the freedom of contract between them, as such interference hinders the one from working at what he thinks proper, and at the same time prevents the other from employing whom he chooses. A person living under the protection of this government has the right to adopt and follow any lawful industrial pursuit, not injurious to the community, which he may see fit; and as incident to this is the right to labor or employ labor, make contracts in respect thereto upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the parties, to enforce all lawful contracts, to sue and give evidence, and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, or convey property of any kind. The enjoyment or deprivation of these rights and privileges constitutes the essential distinction between freedom and slavery, between liberty and oppression."

A Missouri statute made it unlawful (Rev. Stat. § 7058) "for any corporation, person, or firm engaged in manufacturing or mining to issue for the payment of wages, any order, check, or other token of indebtedness, payable otherwise than in lawful money, unless the same is negotiable and redeemable at its face value, in cash, or in goods, at the option of the holder, at the store or other place of business of the corporation, person or firm;" and provided that the order, check, memorandum, or other evidence of indebtedness so issued should, upon presentation and demand within thirty days from date or delivery thereof, be redeemed by the person or corporation issuing the same, in goods, at the current cash market price for like goods, or lawful money as may be demanded by the holder. In State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789, the supreme court of Missouri held this statute unconstitutional. Similar statutes were held unconstitutional in Godcharles v. Wigeman, 113 Pa. 431; State v. Five Creek Coal & Coke Co. 83 W. Va. 188, 6 L. R. A. 859; Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 858; and Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 23 L. R. A. 340.

In Com. v. Perry, 155 Mass. 117, 14 L. R. A. 325, the statute under consideration provided that "no employer shall impose a fine upon, or withhold the wages or any part of the wages of, an employé engaged at weaving, for imperfections that may arise during the process of weaving." The court held that the statute was unconstitutional, and in doing so said: "Article 1 of the Declaration of Rights of the Constitution of Massachusetts enumerates among the natural inalienable rights of men the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property.

. . . . The right to acquire, possess and protect property includes the right to make reasonable contracts, which shall be under the protection of the law. The manufacture of cloth is an important industry, essential to the welfare of the community. There is no reason why men should not be permitted to engage in it. Indeed, the statute before us recognizes it as a legitimate business into which anybody may freely enter. The right to employ weavers, and to make proper contracts with them, is, therefore, protected by our constitution; and a statute which forbids the making of such contracts, or attempts to nullify them or impair the obligation, violates fundamental principles of right which are expressly recognized in our constitution. If the statute is held to permit a manufacturer to hire weavers and agree to pay them a certain price per yard for weaving cloth with proper skill and care, it renders the contract of no effect when it requires him, under a penalty, to pay the contract price if the employé does his work negligently, and fails to perform his contract; for it is an essential element of such a contract that full payment is to be made only when the contract is performed. If it be held to forbid the making of such contracts, and to permit the hiring of weavers only upon terms that prompt payment shall be made of the price for good work, however badly their work may be done, and that the remedy of the employer for their dereliction shall be only by suits against them for damages, it is an interference with the right to make reasonable and proper contracts in conducting a legitimate business, which the constitution guarantees to every one when it declares that he has a natural inalienable right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property. Which-ever interpretation be given to this part of the act, we are of opinion that it is unconstitutional."

In San Antonio & A. Pass. R. Co. v. Wilson (Tex.) 19 S. W. Rep. 910, it appears that the legislature of Texas passed an act providing that, in the event a railroad company shall refuse to pay, under certain circumstances, its indebtedness to an employé, within fifteen days after demand thereof, it shall be liable to pay such employé 20 per cent on the amount due him for damages, in addition to the amount due, and that such damages shall not be less than $5 nor more than $100. The supreme court of Texas held the act unconstitutional, and, among other things, said: "Article 10, § 2, of the State Constitution declares that all railroads are public highways, and railroad companies common carriers; that the legislature shall pass laws to regulate freight and passenger tariffs, to correct abuses, and prevent discrimination and extortion in the rates of freight and passenger tariffs on the different railroads in this state, and enforce the same by adequate penalties; and, to the further accomplishment of these objects and purposes, may provide and establish all requisite means and agencies invested with such powers as may be deemed adequate and advisable. . . . There is no question as to the scope of this section of our constitution. Its provisions necessarily refer to and contemplate all injuries to the public arising out of a violation of duties due by the railway company to the public as a common carrier. Within this broad field it rests with the legislature to determine what are those duties to the public, and what constitute abuses and injuries, and also what remedies are necessary to prevent them; and to decide whether the abuses shall be corrected through statutes which declare the act or acts to be a crime punishable as such, or whether the act or acts shall be corrected through a civil action, with punitive damages. . . . But when we consider the relation of railway companies to their own servants, both as to acts of employment and payment, we find a field in which special legislation has no right ordinarily to enter, and in which railways stand on the same footing with all other corporations or persons, and which cannot be contemplated or included within the scope of section 2, article 10. . . . We think the position taken by appellant is correct, and section 2, article 10, contemplates only the public duties of railways, and excludes all right of interference with the employment or payment of their servants."

The Texas act, as it appears from the quotation we have made, was held to be unconstitutional because the constitution of Texas confined legislation in respect to railroads to the duties they owe to the public as common carriers, and excludes all right of interference by the legislature with the employment or payment of their servants. Article 10, § 2, of the Texas Constitution, so far as it is set out in the last case referred to, is substantially incorporated into our constitution, except there is no provision in ours expressly authorizing the establishment of means and agencies with power to enforce it as to railroads; and it does not appear in the opinion in that case that there is any power reserved in Texas to the legislature to amend or repeal charters.

An Indiana statute "forbade the execution of contracts waiving the payment of wages in money." This statute was held to be constitutional in Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 866, 6 L. R. A. 576, on the ground that it "protected and maintained the medium of payment established by the sovereign power of the nation."

A statute of West Virginia prohibited the payment of employés in paper redeemable otherwise than in lawful money; and another provided that coal should be weighed and measured, before it is screened, in a certain way, and that all coal paid for by weight shall be paid for according to such weight at the price agreed on, and that all coal paid for by measure shall be paid for according to such measure at the contract rate. The court, in Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State, 86 W. Va. 802, 17 L. R. A. 885, held that these statutes were constitutional, two judges dissenting. The court said: "We base this decision in this case—First, upon the ground that the defendant is a corporation in the enjoyment of unusual and extraordinary privileges, which enables it and similar associations to surround themselves with a vast retinue of laborers, who need to be protected against all fraudulent or suspicious devices in the weighing of coal or in the payment of labor; secondly, the defendant is a licensee, pursuing an avocation which the state has taken under its general supervision for the purpose of securing the safety of employes by ventilation, inspection, and governmental report, and the defendant, therefore, must submit to such regulations as the sovereign thinks conducive to public health, public morals, or public security."

Hancock v. Yaden, and Peel Splint Coal Co. v. State, supra, are against the weight of authority, but they do not hold that the legislature has the absolute power to limit the right to contract.

The legislature cannot regulate or restrain the right of individuals to contract by making it unlawful for them to agree with each other that wages shall be paid at any specified time subsequent to the day on which the labor by which they are earned shall be completed, or that the price of property sold shall be paid on a day subsequent to the sale. Such a contract as to the time of performance is necessarily harmless, of purely and exclusively private concern, and cannot affect any one except the parties. It is an important means used in the acquisition of property, which sells for more on time than for cash. Labor commands higher wages when they are payable in the future than it does when they are paid at the time of performance. A large proportion of the business of the world is transacted on a credit. Nations, states, counties, towns, and persons contract debts payable in the future. Property is sold on time under executions, judgments, and decrees of courts. The right of persons to sell or labor on a credit is everywhere and by all recognized as legitimate, and is protected by the constitution in the declaration that the right to acquire and possess property is inalienable.

But what is true of persons is not always true of corporations. Natural persons do not derive the right to contract from the legislature. Corporations do. They possess only those powers or properties which the charters of their creation confer upon them, either expressly or as incidental to their existence; and these may be modified or diminished by amendment or extinguished by the repeal of the charters.

The Constitution of 1874 (art. 12, § 6), ordains: "Corporations may be formed under general laws; which laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed. The general assembly shall have the power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation now existing and revocable at the adoption of this constitution, or any that may hereafter be created, whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of this state: in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators." The Constitution of 1868 declared: "The general assembly shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers. Corporations may be formed under general laws; but all such laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed." Under these constitutions the general assembly has enacted statutes providing for the organization of corporations, and from them the corporations of this state derive their powers, subject to the power of the legislature to change them by amending the laws under which they were organized.

As said by Mr. Justice Miller in Greenwood v. Union Freight R. Co., 105 U. S. 13, 19, 26 L. ed. 961, 964: "A short reference to the origin of this reservation of the right to repeal charters of corporations may be of service in enabling us to decide upon its office and effect when called into operation by the legislative exercise of the power."

Continuing, he said, in the same case: "As early as 1806, in the case of Wales v. Stetson, 2 Mass. 143, 3 Am. Dec. 89, the supreme court of that state made the declaration 'that the rights legally vested in all corporations cannot be controlled or destroyed by any subsequent statute, unless a power for that purpose be reserved to the legislature in the act of incorporation.' In Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 639, decided in 1819, this court announced principles on the subject of the protection that the charter of private corporations were entitled to claim under the clause of the Federal Constitution against impairing the obligation of contracts, which, though received at the time with dissatisfaction, have never been overruled by this court. The opinion in that case carried the protection of the constitutional provision somewhat in advance of what had been decided in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 162, and the preceding cases, and held that it applied not only to contracts between individuals, and to grants of property made by the state to individuals or to corporations, but that the rights and franchises conferred upon private, as distinguished from public, corporations by the legislative acts under which their existence was authorized, and a right to exercise the functions conferred upon them by the statute were, when accepted by the corporators, contracts which the state could not impair. It became obvious at once that many acts of incorporation which had been passed as laws of a public character, partaking in no general sense of a bargain between the states and the corporations which they created, but which yet conferred private rights, were no longer subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal, except by the consent of the corporate body, and that the general control which the legislatures creating such bodies had previously supposed they had the right to exercise no longer existed. It was, no doubt, with a view to suggest a method by which the state legislatures could retain in a large measure this important power, without violating the provision of the Federal Constitution, that Mr. Justice Story, in his concurring opinion in the Dartmouth College Case, suggested that, when the legislature was enacting a charter for a corporation, a provision in the statute reserving to the legislature the right to amend or repeal it must be held to be a part of the contract itself, and the subsequent exercise of the right would be in accordance with the contract, and could not, therefore, impair its obligation."

In order to avoid the consequences of the rule laid down in the Dartmouth College Case, many states have availed themselves of Judge Story's suggestion. In chartering the Union Mining Company the legislature of Maryland reserved the right to amend or repeal its charter at pleasure. Afterwards it passed an act (Laws 1880, chap. 278) providing "that every corporation engaged in mining or manufacturing, or operating a railroad in Allegany county, and employing ten or more hands, shall pay its employes the full amount of their wages in legal tender money of the United States," and "that every such employe shall be entitled to receive from any such corporation employing him the whole or so much of the wages earned by him as shall not have been actually paid to him in legal tender money of the United States, without set-off or deduction of his demand for or in respect of any account or claim whatever." The Union Mining Company was sued after the enactment of this act by Shaffer and Munn for wages due to its employes. Mr. Justice Irving, in commenting on this act, in that case, said: "It being conceded that the legislature, when it incorporated the Union Mining Company, reserved the right to alter or amend its charter at pleasure, there can be no doubt that the legislature could enact a law prohibiting the corporation from paying its employes otherwise than in money, and that it could forbid the corporation from making contracts with them for payment in anything but money."

The acceptance by the corporation of a charter with the reservation of the right to alter and amend, made that provision a part of the contract, which, as between the legislature and it, as a private corporation, it must be understood to be. A corporation has no inherent or natural right like a citizen. It has no rights but those which are expressly conferred upon it, or are necessarily inferable from the powers actually granted, or such as may be indispensable to the exercise of such as are granted. A private corporation is only a quasi individual, the pure creation of the legislative will, with just such powers as are conferred expressly or by necessary implication, and none others. Whatever, therefore, may have been the mischief intended to be reached and prevented by this law by restrictions imposed on the corporation, it was competent for the legislature by this law, which operates as an amendment of its charter, to accomplish." Shaffer v. Union Min. Co. of Allegany County, 55 Md. 74.

A statute of Rhode Island (Rev. Stat. chap. 125, § 14) provides: "All acts of incorporation hereafter granted may be amended or repealed at the will of the general assembly, unless express provisions be made therein to the contrary." The Brown & Sharpe Manufacturing Company was incorporated by the general assembly of Rhode Island for the purpose of manufacturing machinery, subject to a chapter of which this statute was a part. After the incorporation of it, the legislature passed an act requiring corporations to pay weekly the employes engaged in its business the wages earned by them to within nine days of the date of such payment, unless prevented by inevitable casualty. In State v. Brown & S. Mfg. Co., 18 R. I. —, 17 L. R. A. 856, which was an action for the violation of this act, the supreme court of Rhode Island held that the act was constitutional, and that it operated as an amendment to the charter of the corporation sued, as it was a reasonable exercise of the power to amend.

In the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. ed. 496, "the question was whether congress had the constitutional power to enact a law compelling the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies to set aside a portion of their current earnings as a sinking fund for the purpose of meeting a very large indebtedness secured by mortgage upon the roads, and payable at a future day. The majority of the court held that the legislation was valid as an exercise of the general legislative powers of the government, and also because the right to alter or amend the charters of the companies had been expressly reserved to congress."

In commenting on the reserved power to amend or repeal the charters of corporations, in that case, Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "All agree that it cannot be used to take away property already acquired under the operation of the charter, or to deprive the corporation of the fruits actually reduced to possession of contracts lawfully made; but, as was said by this court, through Mr. Justice Clifford, in Miller v. New York, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 498, 21 L. ed. 104, it may safely be affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant, or to secure the due administration of its affairs, so as to protect the rights of stockholders and creditors, and for the proper disposition of its assets; and again, in Holyoke Water Power Co. v. Lyman, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 519, 21 L. ed. 189, 'to protect the rights of the public and of the corporators, or to promote the due administration of the affairs of the corporation.' Mr. Justice Field, also speaking for the court, was even more explicit when, in Tomlinson v. Jessup, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 459, 21 L. ed. 206, he said the reservation affects the entire relation between the state and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the state; and again, as late as Maine Cent. R. Co. v. Maine, 96 U. S. 510, 24 L. ed. 840, by the reservation the state retained the power to alter it [charter] in all particulars constituting the grant to the new company formed under it, of corporate rights, privileges, and immunities. Mr. Justice Swayne, in Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S. 824, 24 L. ed. 859, says, by way of limitation, the alterations must be reasonable. They must be made in good faith, and be consistent with the object and scope of the act of incorporation. Sheer oppression and wrong cannot be inflicted under the guise of an amendment or alteration." The rules as here laid down are fully sustained by authority.

In speaking of the reserved power to amend or repeal the charters of corporations, Mr. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the court in Inland Fisheries Comrs. v. Holyoke Water Power Co., 104 Mass. 451, said: "It is sufficient now to say that it is established by adjudications which we cannot disregard, and the principles of which we fully approve, that it at least reserves to the legislature the authority to make any alteration or amendment in a charter granted subject to it that will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant, or any rights which have vested under it, and that the legislature may deem necessary to secure either that object or other public or private rights. Under such a clause, for instance, the legislature may make the stockholders of an incorporated bank liable for the future debts of the corporation. Sherman v. Smith, 86 U. S. 1 Black, 587, 17 L. ed. 168; Re Gibson, 21 N. Y. 9. It may vary the measure, and thus enlarge the proportion, of the profits which a mutual life insurance company is required by the terms of its charter to pay to a charitable institution. Massachusetts General Hospital v. State Mut. L. Assur. Co. 4 Gray, 227. Railroad corporations may be compelled, by general or special laws, to make changes in the levee, grade, and surface of the roadbed, new structures at crossings of other railroads or of highways, or station houses at particular places, in a manner, and to be enforced by forms of process, different from those provided for or contemplated by the original charter or the general law in force when that charter was granted. Roxbury v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 6 Cush. 424; Fitchburg R. Co. v. Grand Junction R. & Depot Co. 4 Allen, 198; Com. v. Eastern R. Co. 103 Mass. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 555; Albany Northern R. Co. v. Brownell, 24 N. Y. 845, overruling Miller v. New York & E. R. Co. 21 Barb. 518."

In Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 847, 28 L. ed. 173, it appears that the constitution of the state of California "provided that corporations might be formed under general laws, and should not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes; and that all laws, general and special, passed pursuant to that provision, might be, from time to time, altered and repealed. A general law was enacted by the legislature for the formation of corporations for supplying cities, counties, and towns with water, which provided that the rates to be charged for water should be fixed by a board of commissioners, to be appointed in part by the corporation and in part by the municipal authorities. The constitution and laws of the state were subsequently changed so as to take away from corporations which had been organized and put into operation under the old constitution and laws the power to name members of the boards of commissioners, and so as to place in the municipal authorities the sole power of fixing rates for water." The court held that "these changes violated no provisions of the Constitution of the United States."

Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, said: "The Spring Valley Company is an artificial being, created by or under the authority of the legislature of California. The people of the state, when they first established their government, provided in express terms that corporations, other than for municipal purposes, should not be formed except under general laws, subject at all times to alteration or repeal. . . . In California the constitution put this reservation in every charter, and consequently this company was from the moment of its creation subject to the legislative power of alteration, and, if deemed expedient, of absolute extinguishment as a corporate body." See State v. Brown & S. Mfg. Co. 18 R. I. —, 17 L. R. A. 856.

It is obvious that the legislature cannot, under the power to amend, take from corporations the right to contract; for it is essential to their existence. It can regulate it, when the interests of the public demand it, but not to such an extent as to render it ineffectual, or substantially impair the object of incorporation. The constitution of this state, in reserving the power to amend or repeal, expressly provides that it may be exercised whenever, in the opinion of the legislature, the charter "may be injurious to the citizens of this state; in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators." Article 12, § 6.

Whenever the charters of railroad companies become obstacles in the way of the legislature so regulating their roads as to make them subserve the public interest to the fullest extent practicable, their charters are, in that respect, injurious to the citizens of the state, and can be amended as to defects in such manner as will be just to the corporators; for they are organized for a public purpose, and their roads are declared by the constitution to be public highways, and they are made common carriers. They are clothed with a public trust, and in many respects are expressly subjected by the constitution to the control of the legislature. There is no enterprise in which the public is so largely interested as it is in the successful and efficient operation of railroads. With the trust with which they are clothed is imposed the duty to serve the public as common carriers in the most efficient manner practicable. For this reason the legislature may impose on them such duties as may be reasonably calculated to secure such results. Being created by statute, the legislature may so change them by amendment as to make them subserve the purposes for which they were created. If the legislature, in its wisdom, seeing that their employes are and will be persons dependent on their labor for a livelihood, and unable to work on a credit, should find that better servants and service could be secured by the prompt payment of their wages on the termination of their employment, and that the purpose of their creation would thereby be more nearly accomplished, it might require them to pay for the labor of their employes when the same is fully performed, at the end of their employment. If it be true that in doing so it would interfere with contracts which are purely and exclusively private, and thereby limit their right to contract with individuals, it would nevertheless, under such circumstances, have the right to do so under the reserved power to amend.

But we do not mean, by holding as we do, to intimate that the legislature can, by way of amendment, fix or limit the compensation of the employes of railroad companies. That might seriously affect one of the principal charter rights of the companies, and thereby substantially impair the object of their incorporation. Such a power would be subversive of the right, and, when exercised to its fullest extent, would leave to the corporation the privilege of selecting its employes without the right of contracting with them. An amendment to that extent would be manifestly unjust to the companies, and violative of the constitution, which, while it grants the right to amend when, in the opinion of the legislature, the charter is injurious to the citizens, it limits the right to do so to amendments that are just to the corporators. The act in question is not subject to that imputation. It is prospective in its operation, and leaves to the corporations the right of making contracts with their employes on advantageous terms.

Is the act before us a proper amendment? It provides, among other things, that whenever any corporation "engaged in the business of operating or constructing any railroad or railroad bridge" shall discharge with cause any servant or employé thereof, "the unpaid wages of any such servant or employé, then earned at the contract rate, without abatement or deduction, shall be and become due and payable on the day of such discharge;" "and if the same be not paid on such day then, as a penalty for such nonpayment, the wages of such servant or employé shall continue at the same rate until paid." This provision is susceptible of two constructions, one of which makes the act require the corporation to pay the employé all the wages to which he would have been entitled had he fully performed his contract up to the time of his discharge, notwithstanding he had failed to do so and had damaged the corporation thereby. If this be its intention, it is unconstitutional, because its enforcement might take property from the corporation without due process of law, for the employé is not entitled to the stipulated wages until he has performed the contract. He may have damaged his employer by the failure to do so in a sum larger than the wages he would have been entitled to receive in the event he had complied with his agreement. To compel the corporation, in such a case, to pay any sum whatever, would be a deprivation of property without due process of law. The same would be equally true if the corporation should be compelled to pay full wages when the damage caused by the non-performance of the contract does not exceed them. Com. v. Perry, 155 Mass. 117, 14 L. R. A. 825. Such an amendment of the charters of corporations is clearly unjust to the corporators.

The other construction is more reasonable. It makes the words "without abatement or deduction" mean "without discount." The legislature evidently thought that the employé might receive money or property in the course of his employment in part payment for his labor, and evidently intended that the wages thus paid should not be repaid. A strict construction of the words "without abatement or deduction" would deprive the corporation of a credit for the money or property in a settlement with its employé for his services. Then, again, the act requires the corporation to pay only the unpaid wages earned, at the contract rate, at the time of his discharge. Stipulated wages cannot be earned except by the performance of the contract by which the employer agrees to pay them. Obviously, then, the act means by the words "without abatement or deduction" that the unpaid wages earned at the contract rate at the time of the discharge shall be paid without discount on account of the payment thereof before the time they were payable according to the terms of the contract of employment. When construed in this manner, this provision of the act is constitutional, and it is our duty to so construe it.

Tested by the principles of law we have indicated, the Act under consideration is unconstitutional so far as it affects natural persons. As to corporations it is a valid statute. It does not seriously impair their right to contract, but leaves them to contract with their employes on profitable terms.

So much of the act as is unconstitutional can be eliminated, and the remainder stand. State v. Marsh, 87 Ark. 856; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Worthen, 46 Ark. 812; State v. Deschamp, 53 Ark. 490; Davis v. Gaines, 48 Ark. 370, 388.

After this elimination, so much of the first section of the act as remains in force reads as follows (Act March 25, 1889): "Section 1. Whenever any corporation, engaged in the business of operating or constructing any railroad or railroad bridge, shall discharge with or without cause, or refuse to further employ, any servant or employé thereof, the unpaid wages of such servant or employé then earned at the contract rate, without abatement or deduction, shall be and become due and payable, on the day of such discharge or refusal to longer employ; and if the same be not paid on such day then, as a penalty for such nonpayment, the wages of such servant or employé shall continue at the same rate until paid. Provided, such wages shall not continue more than sixty days, unless an action therefor shall be commenced within that time."

It cannot be truthfully said that so much of the act as we find to be in force is unconstitutional because it interferes with the rights of employes to make such contracts with corporations as they see fit. As said in State v. Brown & S. Mfg. Co., 18 R. I. —, 17 L. R. A. 856: "No inhibition is placed upon employes to make such contracts as they choose, with any person or body, natural or artificial, that is authorized to contract with them. But corporations are artificial bodies, and possess only such powers as are granted to them, and natural persons dealing with them have no right to demand that greater power should be granted to corporations in order that they may make other contracts with such corporations than the corporations are authorized to enter into."

The "act being general and uniform in its operation upon all persons coming within the class to which it applies, it does not (if amendments to charters can) come within that special legislation prohibited by the constitution; for it applies to and embraces all persons 'who are or may come into certain situations and circumstances,' and is general and uniform; not because it operates upon every person in the state, for it does not, but because every person who is brought within the relations and circumstances provided for, is affected by the law." Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Hanniford, 49 Ark. 291; McAulich v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 20 Iowa, 342; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 27, 32 L. ed. 585; Re Oberg, 21 Or. 406, 14 L. R. A. 577; Hawthorn v. People, 109 Ill. 311; Youngblood v. Birmingham Trust & Sav. Co. 95 Ala. 521, 20 L. R. A. 58; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 480, 481.

This action was brought before a justice of the peace for the recovery of wages earned, and the penalty or damages allowed by the act on account of the nonpayment thereof from the time the wages were due to the day of bringing the suit. The question arises, Did the justice of the peace have jurisdiction? We have held that a justice of the peace did not have jurisdiction in an action for the recovery of a statutory penalty. Baltimore & O. Teleg. Co. v. Looejoy, 48 Ark. 301. On the other hand, the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in actions for the recovery of punitive or exemplary damages has been sustained. The question, then, is, Is the amount allowed to the employé, in addition to the wages earned, a penalty or exemplary damages? The answer depends on the interpretation of so much of the act as is in the following words: "And if the same [wages] be not paid on such day then, as a penalty for such nonpayment, the wages of such servant or employé shall continue at the same rate until paid." According to the act, the wages earned become due when the employé is discharged or the employer refuses to longer employ him. The additional amount is allowed on account of the failure to pay the wages when due, and is regulated according to the length of the delay of payment. It is allowed for a double purpose,—as a compensation for the delay, and as a punishment for the failure to pay. It is composed of all the elements and serves all the purposes of exemplary damages. Day v. Woodworth, 54 U. S. 18 How. 363, 14 L. ed. 181; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 84–86, 32 L. ed. 583; Sedgw. Damages, 6th ed. p. 35. The name given to it by the act cannot change it.

is allowed as exemplary damages, and that the justice of the peace had jurisdiction in this action.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and judgment will be rendered by this court in favor of appellant against appellee for $27.90, and $3.50 as exemplary damages, the amount sued for, and all his costs.

Bunn, Ch. J., dissenting:

The constitutionality of the Act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Protection of Servants and Employés of Railroads," approved March 25, 1889, is called in question by the plea of the appellee company, which was sustained in the court below, and the appellant appeals to this court. The majority of the court holds that the act in question, in so far as it affects private individuals, is unconstitutional, but that, in so far as it affects corporations, it is constitutional; and, furthermore, that it is divisible, so that the unconstitutional part may be eliminated and the valid part may stand. The court also holds that the act in fact does not interfere with the right to contract, but only affects some of its incidents, if I fully comprehend its meaning. From the decision of the majority of the judges I feel constrained to dissent, for reasons that follow.

Since the court, in its well-considered opinion, holds that the act in question, according to the weight of authority, cannot stand upon the ground that it is a legitimate expression of the police or of any of the other great powers said to be inherent in government, I am relieved of the necessity of discussing the question involved from that standpoint, and therefore address myself directly to the consideration of the constitutional provision subjecting incorporation statutes to the legislative power of alteration and repeal on the one hand, and of alteration, revocation, and amendment of charters on the other, to be found in section 6, art. 12, of the Constitution, from which, and from which alone, the court derives the authority to enact the act in question and similar acts. The act is as follows: "Section 1. Whenever any railroad company or any company, corporation, or person engaged in the business of operating or constructing any railroad or railroad bridge, or any contractor or subcontractor engaged in the construction of any such road or bridge, shall discharge, with or without cause, or refuse to further employ any servant or employé thereof, the unpaid wages of any such servant or employé, then earned at the contract rate, without abatement or deduction, shall be, and become due and payable on the day of such discharge, or refusal to longer employ; and if the same be not paid on such day then, as a penalty for such nonpayment, the wages of such servant or employé shall continue at the same rate until paid. Provided, such wages shall not continue more than sixty days, unless an action therefor shall be commenced within that time. Sec. 2. That no such servant or employé who secretes or absents himself to avoid payment to him or refuses to receive the same when fully tendered, shall be entitled to any benefit under this act for such time as he so avoids payment. Sec. 3. That any such servant or employé whose employment is for a definite period of time, and who is discharged without cause before the expiration of such time may, in addition to the penalties prescribed by this act, have an action against any such employer for any damages he may have sustained by reason of such wrongful discharge, and such action may be joined with an action for unpaid wages and penalty. Sec. 4. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage." The constitutional provision referred to is in these words, viz.: "Art. 12, § 6. Corporations may be formed under general laws; which laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed. The general assembly shall have the power to alter, revoke, or annul any charter of incorporation now existing and revocable at the adoption of this constitution, or any that may hereafter be created whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of this state; in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the incorporators." It is stated in the opinion of the court that the act would be treated as amendatory of our incorporation laws, and thus it was thought to give it the effect of accomplishing what is thought to be provided for in the section of the constitution quoted above. At the threshold of the discussion, therefore, we are confronted with a question of the most serious character. It is this: Can this court arbitrarily treat one statute as amendatory of another? That is to say, is it not a legal proposition of itself whether any statute is amendatory of another, aside from the idea of both dealing with the same or kindred subjects? It will be observed that the act in question does not in terms refer to any other statute, and, this being so, can any other statute be said to be amended by it? Section 23, art. 5, of the Constitution is in these words, viz.: "No law shall be revived, amended, or the provisions thereof extended or conferred, by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revived, amended, extended, or conferred shall be re-instated and published at length." Now, if a law referring to a previous law by title only is not to be considered as amendatory of it, how much more true is it that a subsequent law, which does not refer even to the title of a former law, is not amendatory of the existing or former law. The prohibition contained in this section of the constitution was not meant as an idle saying, a mere flourish of high-sounding words, but was intended to subserve a great purpose,—the protection of the citizen against surreptitious legislation. Nor has this court, or the courts of other states, treated this and similar provisions as light and meaningless things. Beard v. Wilson, 53 Ark. 290; Havis v. Jefferson (Ark.) 14 S. W. Rep. 1101; Watkins v. Bureka Springs, 49 Ark. 131; Judson v. Bessemer, 87 Ala. 240, 4 L. R. A. 742; State v. Trenton, 58 N. J. L. 566; Pitkin County Comrs. v. Aspen Min. & Smelting Co. 8 Colo. App. 223.

this principle: that an act, as an independent law, may not be objectionable on constitutional grounds, and yet, as an amendment of some existing law, it may be invalid. The rule is a reasonable one, because no law should be altered or amended without something appears in the amendatory act to give notice to the public of a change in the original law, while, if the new act is intended as an independent act, the original act is not affected, and there is nothing to take notice of. This, perhaps, is enough to say on this part of the subject.

The majority of the court, treating the act in question as an independent act, would hold it unconstitutional for reasons assigned in the opinion, which reasons we think sound and incontrovertible. But the majority of the court, treating the act in question as amendatory of our general incorporation laws (the court does not say which one, for there are two or more), holds it to be constitutional under the power reserved to the legislature in the last sentence (sec. 6, art. 12, of the Constitution), and I have endeavored to show that the act can have no place as an amendment, because it does not show a compliance with the constitution in the manner of its enactment as such amendment. The last sentence of the sixth section of article 12 of the Constitution manifestly refers to corporations created and to be created by special acts of the legislature, judging from the words employed and the context. Each charter is then made the subject of legislative alteration, revocation, and amendment, in case it becomes injurious to the citizens of the state, and provided it was revocable at the adoption of the constitution, if already in existence. The charters "hereafter to exist" were doubtless those special charters conferred by legislation to be expressed in special acts. Now, it does not appear in this case what kind of a corporation the appellee company is, whether it was created under our general incorporation laws or by special act of the legislature. As a matter of common knowledge it may be assumed, however, that it was created by special act, since it is now forty or more years since it became a matter of public concern, and since it had its origin at a time when there was no general incorporation law in this state. There could, then, be no grant of corporate powers for strictly private purposes. All such were considered in conflict with the constitutional prohibition of monopolies. Strictly public, or municipal, and quasi public, such as railroad corporations, were all that were allowable. The former were strictly at the will and pleasure of the legislature; the latter were the result of contract between the state and corporators, and by their contracts were both state and corporations to be governed. State v. Curran, 12 Ark. 321. Of this latter class, presumably, was the appellee company; and to show that its charter is the subject of legislative revocation or amendment we must look to the language of the contract,—the charter,—which does not appear in evidence in this case.

Motion to modify judgment overruled May 26, 1894.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Thomas A. FLORER, County Treasurer, et al., Appls.,
v.

Elizabeth R. SHERIDAN, Admx., etc., of Alexander L. Sheridan, Deceased.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A taxpayer's neglect for a series of years to place upon his personality list credits from which he is entitled to deduct debts will not prevent him from claiming the deduction when notified to show cause why he should not be compelled to pay taxes upon the credits for those years as delinquent property.
2. Deducting debts from the gross amount of credits on which a person is required to pay taxes does not violate a constitutional provision "for a uniform and equal rate of assessment for taxation," and authorizing the legislature to "prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property both real and personal, excepting such only . . . as may be specially exempted by law," since the just value of credits is to be ascertained by subtracting from their gross amount the bona fide indebtedness of the taxpayer.

3. The deduction of debts from credits to be taxed is not an exemption within the meaning of constitutional and statutory provisions as to exemptions from taxation.

(February 13, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Tippecanoe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin the collection of certain taxes. Affirmed. Mr. Sheridan in his lifetime sold some real estate and gave ten years time at interest for the payments. Soon afterward he invested in NOTE.—Constitutionality of provision for deduction of debts from credits or other property.

The decision in the above case, that the deduction of debts from credits to be taxed is not an exemption within the meaning of the constitutional provisions relating to exemption from taxation, is not strictly one of first impression, but the prior cases on the subject are very few and not harmonious.

In Fayette County v. People's & D. Bank (Ohio) 10 L. R. A. 193, a distinction is made between a deduction of indebtedness from taxable credits and a deduction from tangible property in possession, such as money on deposit in a bank; and the court, while holding that a deduction of the average amount of deposits and accounts payable, exclusive of current deposit accounts, from the average amount of notes and bills receivable, discounted, or purchased in the course of business by a banker, would not be in conflict with the constitutional provision for uniformity of taxation, or a requirement for the taxation of property of banks of every description, without deduction, held that the same deduction from the average amount of cash and cash items in possession would be a violation of the constitutional rule of uniformity.

This decision reviews, and in a certain sense supplements, the prior decision in the case of Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1, in which a statute allowing the deduction of liabilities from the amount of "moneys and credits" was held unconstitutional.

But in conflict with the case of FLORER v. SHERIDAN, and the Ohio case of Fayette County v. People's & D. Bank, supra, the supreme court of South Dakota, in an advisory opinion given to the governor, declares that a statute allowing a deduction of an indebtedness from credits is in violation of a constitutional prohibition against exemptions from taxation. The court expressly holds that such a deduction of debts from credits is an exemption contrary to the express decision in FLORER v. SHERIDAN. Re Assessment & Collection of Taxes (S. Dak.) April 10, 1893.

The court further held in the South Dakota case that allowing a deduction of indebtedness from taxable personal property, without allowing the same deduction from taxable real property, was a violation of the constitutional rule of uniformity; and that the same was true of a provision allowing the deduction of indebtedness owned or held within the state, but denying the deduction of indebtedness held or owned outside the state.

But this opinion of the court in South Dakota is based largely on the Ohio case of Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, supra, which has been explained and limited by the later case of Fayette County v. People's & D. Bank, with which the South Dakota case is in conflict as well as with the case of FLORER v. SHERIDAN.

The Oregon decision in Wetmore v. Multnomah County, 6 Or. 463, upheld a statute permitting the deduction of indebtedness, holding it not to be unconstitutional as unequal or ununiform, but here the deduction was allowed from the value of all taxable property real as well as personal.

The growing interest in methods of taxation, and the increasing importance of establishing just principles on the subject, make it certain that the question here presented will receive much greater attention hereafter than it has yet received, although statutes allowing the deduction of indebtedness have long been in force in some states, without any question of their validity, or at least without any contest thereof in the courts. Such is the case for instance in New York state in which a statute from an early period has allowed a deduction of debts from the value of all taxable personal property, 1 Rev. Stat. 321, § 9. But while this statute has been before the courts as in People v. Ryan, 88 N. Y. 142, 42 Am. Rep. 238, affirming a decision of the general term of the supreme court which in turn affirmed that of the special term reported in 10 Abb. N. C. 37, no question of its constitutionality was raised. The same is true of the case of People v. Lookport Board of Education, 46 Barb. 588, which held the statute inapplicable to moneyed corporations. But it should be said there is not in New York as in some other states any constitutional provision requiring uniformity of taxation or requiring all property to be taxed.

The Indiana case of FLORER v. SHERIDAN throws the weight of authority in favor of the constitutionality of such deduction of debts from credits, if, indeed, the weight of authority was not already on that side; but the decisions are so few, and the courts so much at variance, that the question cannot be regarded as entirely settled.

In several cases the deduction of debts has been considered with respect to the creation of a discrimination against national banks; but these cases have no particular bearing on the question here presented.

other real estate on time, arranging the payments to correspond with those due him, the amount of the purchase price being in excess of that which had been paid for his property. Since his debts exceeded his credits, he assumed that he was not liable to a personal tax and omitted to mention either debts or credits on his lists for several years. This omission was subsequently discovered, and Mr. Sheridan's administratrix was notified to show cause why the omitted credits should not be taxed as delinquents during the years in which they were omitted from the tax list.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles E. Lake, George P. Haywood, and R. P. Davidson for appellants.

Messrs. John M. La Rue and John D. Gougar, for appellee:

There was no sufficient description of the property alleged to have been omitted either in the paper given to the auditor informing him of the matter, in his notices, or in any of his proceedings.

Florer v. Sherwood, 128 Ind. 495.

The deductions were proper.

The taxpayer may recover taxes after payment if the assessor refuses to allow his credits. Indianapolis v. Vajen, 111 Ind. 240; Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 6332, 6334; Matter v. Campbell, 71 Ind. 512.

The method of deducting debts from credits was proper.

Woll v. Thomas, 1 Ind. App. 232.

Dailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, as plaintiff in the court below brought her action against the appellants and Melville W. Miller and George P. Haywood to prevent the collection of certain taxes by appellant Florer, treasurer of Tippecanoe county. The original complaint was lost, and another substituted. A demurrer was filed to the substituted complaint by each defendant for want of sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, which was sustained as to defendants Miller and Haywood, and, plaintiff refusing to amend the complaint, judgment was rendered in their favor. The demurrers of appellants, Florer and Barnes, were overruled, to which ruling they excepted, and, declining to answer further, the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff on the demurrers of Florer and Barnes to the complaint, perpetually enjoining the collection of the whole, or any part, of said taxes, and ordering the assessment mentioned in the complaint stricken from the tax duplicate. The defendants Florer and Barnes prayed an appeal.

The errors complained of arise upon the ruling of the court on the separate demurrers of each defendant. The assignment of errors contains two specifications: First, the court erred in overruling the separate demurrer of Thomas A. Florer, treasurer of Tippecanoe county, Ind., to the substituted complaint; second, the court erred in overruling the separate demurrer of Thomas J. Barnes, auditor of Tippecanoe county, Ind., to the substituted complaint. The complaint, in substance, alleges that on the 8th day of February, 1890, the defendants Melville W. Miller and George P. Haywood filed in the office of said Barnes, auditor of Tippecanoe county, Ind., a paper giving to said auditor the information that Alexander L. Sheridan, then deceased, was, during the years 1884 to 1889, inclusive, a citizen of the city of La Fayette and Tippecanoe county, and was the owner of certain property, subject to taxation for said years, which had not been listed for taxation, and by reason of which the property had been omitted, and no taxes paid thereon; that said auditor, acting upon such information, gave notice to the appellee, who was, at the time of filing the information, the administratrix of decedent's estate, that he intended to place said property on the tax duplicate, and required her to appear on the 22d day of March, 1890, and show cause, if she could, why such assessment should not be made; that, pursuant to said notice, appellee called upon said auditor at his office, and informed him that decedent, in his lifetime, had no money loaned, but that for and during the years mentioned he did own $8,800 of credits, but that the same had not been listed by the decedent for taxation because during said time he was in debt to others in excess of the credits owned by him; that said auditor, refusing to investigate further as to the truth of the statements made by said administratrix, but being advised as to the law by said Miller and Haywood, claimed that, as the credits and debts were not placed on the schedule at the time of the assessment of the decedent, the deduction could not then be made, and the property should be placed on the tax duplicate, and taxed as other property, and he thereupon assessed said credits, and placed the amounts and value on the tax duplicates; that afterwards, said duplicates being in the hands of said Florer as treasurer of said county, he was about to proceed to the collection of said taxes out of the property of the decedent, — and prays that he be enjoined from so doing. The complaint further avers that said decedent was the owner of certain real estate in said county, and, inasmuch as said taxes had been wrongfully assessed and placed on said tax duplicate, they were an apparent lien on said land, and a claim against said estate, and asks that they be stricken from said docket. There is also an allegation of a want of description of the omitted property.

It will be observed that this action arose by reason of the appellant Barnes, as auditor of Tippecanoe county, by virtue of the authority given him as such auditor by section 1, p. 841, Acts 1889, having assessed and placed on the tax duplicate of said county for taxes for the years 1884 to 1889, inclusive, certain credits described in the complaint, in the hands of the appellee, administratrix, as omitted property, the same having been left out by the decedent of the appellee for said years, and by reason of the treasurer of said county being about to enforce the collection of said taxes. The Act of March 9, 1889, supra, amending section 6416, Rev. Stat. 1881, reads: "Whenever any county auditor shall discover or receive credible information, or if he shall have reason to believe, that any real or personal property has been omitted in whole or in part, in the assessment of any year or number of years, from the assessment book or from the tax duplicate, he shall proceed to correct the tax duplicate and add such property thereto, with the proper valuation, and charge such property and the owner thereof, with the proper amount of taxes thereon, to enable him to do which he is invested with all the powers of assessors under this act, but before making such correction or addition, if the persons claiming to own such property, or occupying, or in possession thereof reside in the county and be not present, he shall give such person notice in writing of his intention to add such property to the tax duplicate, describing it in general terms, and requiring such person to appear before him, at his office, at a specified time within five days after giving such notice, to show cause, if any, why such property should not be added to the tax duplicate, and if the party so notified do not appear, or if he appear and fail to show any good and sufficient cause why such assessment should not be made, the same shall be made," etc. There is no doubt that under the provisions of this section the appellee had a right to show cause, if any existed, why such credit should not be annexed to the tax duplicate to increase the liability of the estate, unless the clause in section 6832, Rev. Stat. 1881, is unconstitutional, which stipulates that, "in making up the amount of credits which any person is required to list, for himself or for any other person, company, or corporation, he shall be entitled to deduct from the gross amount of credits the amount of all bona fide debts owing by such person, company, or corporation to any other person, company, or corporation for a consideration received." In Indianapolis v. Vajen, 111 Ind. 243, this court says: "There is no controversy but that, under the ruling in Wasson v. First Nat. Bank of Indianapolis, 107 Ind. 206, the plaintiff was entitled to deduct his bona fide indebtedness from the value of his bank stock, if proper steps to that end had been taken before the payment of the tax." From the facts averred in the complaint, it is evident that whatever appellee might have done by way of making statements before the auditor when she appeared before him in response to notice to show cause, etc., or in whatever form she might have presented her claim for deductions, it would, in any event, have been unavailing, although she was notified to appear for that purpose, because it is alleged that he refused to allow deductions. The complaint shows that Miller and Haywood gave information to the auditor in a paper, partly written and partly printed, that the decedent in his lifetime had omitted to list "moneys loaned" and "credits" for the time stated, but described no item of omitted property otherwise than as moneys loaned or credits, and that, upon this information being filed, the auditor issued a notice to the appellee in which no property was described as omitted from taxation, except the amounts of "moneys loaned" and "credits" were given; but to whom the moneys had been loaned or what the credits were is not stated in the notice or elsewhere. It has been decided by this court in Florer v. Sherwood, 128 Ind. 495, that this description is not sufficient, and we still adhere to that opinion. The court says: "But money loaned and credits may, or may not, be of their face value, depending on many contingencies; and to justify an assessment by the auditor of property of that character he must know of specific loans and specific credits which have been omitted, and upon which valuation may be placed." Especially is this principle found to be correct when we remember that all taxation in this state is upon values, and none upon amounts. In Woll v. Thomas, 1 Ind. App. 282, the court says: "Our conclusion is that the auditor had no right, under the law in force at that time [from 1883 to 1888], to assess any property as omitted except distinct, definite, and recognizable articles which had not been listed and properly appraised by the assessor." In construing section 6832, supra, concerning the rights of taxpayers, this court, in Matter v. Campbell, 71 Ind. 512, at page 517 said: "We are clearly of the opinion that, under the assessment laws of this state, the resident taxpayer has the right, in listing his personal property for taxation, to deduct from his money at interest, either within or without the state, and 'all other demands,' together constituting the total amount of all credits owned and held by him, his bona fide indebtedness, and to list or give in the surplus or remainder only for the purpose of taxation." If the assessor refuse to allow his credits, the taxpayer may recover back the taxes. Indianapolis v. Vajen, supra. There is an allegation in the complaint that there was no concealment from the assessor, and the presumption is that he did his duty. In what we say we do not want to be understood as approving the "loose-jointed and slipshod" method of listing property adopted by the decedent, and feel that the statute should be strictly complied with; yet, when all the sections of the tax law are construed together, we are convinced that the right to correct the list existed when the appellee appeared before the auditor, in obedience to the notice he gave her to show cause why the addition should not be made.

But a more potent question presents itself for our consideration. The constitutionality of the clause in section 6832, supra, deducting debts, is assailed by the learned and ingenious counsel for the appellants with much vigor, although a provision of this kind has existed in our tax laws for many years. We have looked diligently, but in vain, for a single case in which its validity has ever been questioned in this court. The attack is upon two grounds: First, because such provision as to deductions violates the principles of fundamental law "for a uniform and equal rate of assessment for taxation;" second, because the exemptions which the general assembly is authorized to make do not include the class of property called "credits." Section 1, article 10, of the Constitution of Indiana, being section 193, Rev. Stat. 1881, authorizes the lawmaking power to "provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation," and that it "shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, both real and personal, excepting such only, for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious or charitable purposes, as may be specially exempted by law." In support of counsel's contention they urge that, when the legislature enacts a law for the assessment and taxation of property, it must not only have an equal rate of assessment for all property for the same particular purpose, but there must also be uniformity as to the matter or species of property taxed; that all property must be affected alike, unless it comes under the exceptions in the latter clause of the section, and there must be no inconsistency; that, if there is an exception of any property from taxation, this uniformity does not exist, unless the law thus exempting the property extends to and includes all of that kind or species of property, and that "money at interest" is construed to mean property (Wasson v. First Nat. Bank of Indianapolis, supra); that, as moneyed capital, credits are of the most valuable of property, and therefore any law providing for an exemption of such property makes provision for exempting from taxation of not only a species of property the most valuable, but also of so large an amount that the courts can judicially know that the quantity is sufficient to form a large and material part of the moneyed capital of the state; that deductions are exemptions, and credits are property, and, as they are not taxed, therefore credits are exemptions; that the taxing power is inherent in every sovereignty, and there can be no presumption in favor of its relinquishment, surrender, or abandonment; that the whole community is interested in retaining the power of taxation undiminished, and for this reason the laws are strictly construed against exemptions; that if it could be conceded that deductions of debts from credits were not strictly exemptions, but only an equalizing of values, the same result is reached as though the property were excluded; that the law of deduction from any standpoint is unfair, unequal, unjust, oppressive, and pernicious, because it increases the tax of the poor man who is in debt for his real or personal estate, and not able to own credits, and that it is the property, in whatever form it may exist, that the government reaches out for, to make it contribute for its support, and not the individual who owns it,—in other words, counsel assume that it is the real worth of the property in existence, and not the net or real worth of the individual, that is made the basis of valuation under the fundamental law of this state. There is no more difficult problem than that of levying direct taxes so as to make them just and equitable in every respect. If unequal and unjust, the burden is readily noticed; and one chief reason assigned by those who favor resorting to indirect taxes is that this method enables the government, in the language of Furgot, "to pluck the goose without making it cry out," since those who pay do not perceive, or at least do not reflect, that a part of what they pay as a price is really paid as a tax. Our mode of raising revenue has been to levy annual taxes on the value of the real and personal property, with limited exceptions. This plan seems, at first blush, to be just, and in that belief it has been steadily adhered to, notwithstanding the many and serious difficulties and objections attending the taxation of personal property. For instance, personalty cannot be assessed without inquisitorial process of some kind, instituted for the purpose of ascertaining that which is not open to public inspection, and which many individuals, through their avarice, except under the compulsion of such process, would not consent to disclose. Statutes have recognized the difficulty, and provided a list to be presented by the taxpayer under oath, leaving the person taxed to reduce the amount by his own oath if he shall see fit and be able to do so. It has been said that this is objectionable, as holding out a temptation to false swearing in matters where a false oath would be difficult, if not impossible, of detection, and that the assessment of personalty creates constant incentives to defraud the state by concealing the knowledge of every kind which the taxpayer believes cannot be discovered. It is also claimed by many that the taxation of personal property is unjust, in that it discriminates against residents and in favor of non-residents, and is an inducement to citizens to establish residences abroad. It also leads to duplicate taxation in various ways. Cooley on Taxation, on page 29, says: "To make it just, it is generally thought necessary that the taxpayers' debts should be deducted; and this complicates the difficulty of ascertaining what his estate is, and leaves every man, in effect, to make his own assessment, or subjects him to the arbitrary and capricious acts of the assessors." It has always been that, when the law seeks to tax lands and personalty with equality, the land pays the greater proportion of the tax, because this can all be reached and all taxed. Real estate is open to constant public observation and inspection, and no frauds or evasions can conceal it from view. Taxes are defined to be "the enforced proportional contributions of persons and property levied by the authority of the state for the support of the government and for all public needs. The citizen and the property owner owes to the government the duty to pay taxes, and he is supposed to be compensated in the protection it affords to his life, liberty, and property." Cooley, Taxn. pp. 1, 2. The same author says: "What is aimed at is not taxes strictly just, but such taxes as will best subserve the welfare of the political society. The power of taxation is not judicial. The legislature must determine all questions of state necessity, discretion, or policy involved in ordering and apportioning a tax. The judicial tribunals have no concern with the prudence or wisdom of legislation not inconsistent with organic law. Theoretically, tax laws should be framed with a view to apportioning the burdens of government so that each person enjoying its protection shall be required to contribute as much as his reasonable proportion, and no more. The tax that comes nearest to accomplishing this is, in theory, most nearly perfect." Cooley, Taxn. 124. "Perfect equality in the assessment of taxes is unattainable. Approximation to it is all that can be had. Under any system of government, however wisely and carefully framed, a disproportionate share of the public burdens will be thrown on certain kinds of property, because they are visible and tangible, while others are of a nature to elude vigilance. It is only where statutes are passed which impose taxes on false and unjust principles, or produce gross inequality, so that they cannot be deemed in any sense proportional in their effect on those who are to bear the public charges, that courts can interpose, and arrest the course of legislation by declaring such enactments void." Cooley, Taxn. 127. Perfect, equal taxation will remain an unattainable good as long as laws and government and man are imperfect. There are instances in this state where duplicate taxes are imposed, or rather double taxation of the same property to two individuals; as, where the purchaser of property on credit is taxed on its full value, while the seller is taxed to the same amount on the debt. In such case the decisions are uniform in holding that taxation is not invalid because of any such unequal consequences. This results from the reasoning stated, that any possible system of taxation must inevitably produce unequal and unjust effects in individual instances, and, if inequality in result must defeat the general law, then taxation becomes impossible. Such laws must be practical, and they only forbid that one party shall pay a double tax on the same property. We are aided but little by the decisions of other courts in the consideration of the question presented by appellants, for the reason that the fundamental law on which the opinions are based is quite dissimilar. The constitution of the state of Ohio provides that "laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stock, joint-stock companies or otherwise, and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money; but burying grounds, etc., may be exempt by law from taxation." This provision renders it imperative that all the property of which exemption is not permitted by it shall be taxed, and precludes any other exemptions than those indicated. In Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 8 Ohio St. 1, the court says: "Obligations for the payment of money are taxed by value, and, if of no value, are not taxable." The constitution of Illinois differs from our own in that it provides that the "general assembly shall provide for levying a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to his or her property," and that "the corporate authorities, etc., may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, such taxes to be uniform with respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same." "These provisions preclude discrimination in favor of or against any classes of property or persons whatsoever; they require the taxation of loans or any other credits, these being property as much as lands or chattels in possession." Jacksonville v. McConnel, 12 Ill. 186; People v. Worthington, 21 Ill. 171. In California, as the constitution requires "all property" to be "taxed in proportion to its value," it is held not competent to exempt solvent debts from taxation. People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432; People v. Gerke, 35 Cal. 677; People v. Black Diamond Coal Min. Co. 37 Cal. 54; People v. Whartenby, 38 Cal. 461.

It was evidently the object of the convention, in the adoption of section 1, article 10, supra, and other provisions of the Constitution of this state, to devise a system for the assessment and levy of taxes that would distribute these burdens among those liable to them upon principles of uniformity, equality, and justice; and to secure this object the general assembly is required to "prescribe such rules and regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, both real and personal, excepting," etc. The legislature had a right, under its provisions, to equalize these burdens by a regulation which would tend to secure a just valuation. The plan adopted was to ascertain the just value of the credits after deducting the indebtedness. Credits are, by the constitution, property, and as such are to be taxed. Their just value is to be ascertained by subtracting the bona fide indebtedness from the gross amount of the notes, accounts, and other choses in action, and the balance is to be returned as belonging to the individual. Surely, the difference thus found is the precise amount and just value of the credits of the party in the legal and proper sense of the term. Section 1, article 10, supra, does not say the gross amount of all notes, accounts, and other choses in action shall be taxed, and we cannot so construe it without perverting its language and obvious meaning. Consider for a moment its practical operation under such a construction. A. has an account against B. for $1,000, or a debt against him for a like amount, evidenced by a promissory note. B. holds an account or promissory note evidencing a bona fide indebtedness against A. for the same amount of money. Equity, except where one of the parties is insolvent, treats these claims as compensating each other. Neither owes nor could recover in an action against the other; and yet, if appellants' theory is right, $2,000 must be placed upon the tax duplicate because the holders never met and settled or surrendered their claims. In such case, each is a chose in action held by the party to whom it belongs, and must, under the contention of counsel, be returned to the assessor; and yet it is obvious that neither, as against the other, has a penny of credit, either in money or just value. If the owner is taxed upon such credit, it is upon fiction. The tax duplicate in this way would be increased, but not from property of value in the state. We think the constitution requires that property, wealth, substantial values, shall be taxed, but not imaginary values. As against an insolvent maker, the true value in money of the credit can only be taxed, and so it is where a man has both credits and debts, if there is no balance, there is no sum of money due, however large the items of account upon each side may be. The items of credit upon the one side are of no value as far as they are balanced by the debts upon the other side. If the balance is in favor of one creditor, this is the exact sum of money due him as against all others, and it is the true value of his credits. Deductions and exemptions are two separate and distinct things, having no connection. A deduction is the taking of the subtrahend from the minuend; it is a subtraction. Exemption is an immunity or privilege; it is freedom from a charge or burden to which others are subject. We think the court did not err in overruling the demurrers of the defendants Florer and Barnes to the complaint.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Howard, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am constrained to withhold my concurrence in so much of the foregoing opinion as holds that the constitution permits the enactment of a law which authorizes the deduction of debts from credits in the giving in of choses in action for taxation. I am of opinion that all the property of the state, including all credits, and save only such property as is expressly exempted by the constitution, should be subject to equal and uniform taxation.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

George W. BITTLE, Pff. in Err.,
v.

CAMDEN & ATLANTIC R. CO.

(.....N.J.....)

- *1. A railroad company is bound to use ordinary care and prudence in giving statutory signals of the approach of its trains towards a station and crossing, and in passing them, or wherever, at any given point, such signals are allowed or required to be given; and negligence in the exercise of its right and duty in this respect is actionable negligence.
- *2. The court will take judicial cognizance that the blowing of a whistle is one of the signals used in operating and running a railway train, and that it is authorized and required in approaching stations and crossings, and in passing them; yet, if it be done negligently, wantonly, or maliciously, such negligence, wantonness, or maliciousness is actionable if injury results therefrom.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Wescott for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Samuel H. Grey for defendant in error.

*Headnotes by LIPPINCOTT, J.

NOTE.—The principle on which a person may be held liable for injuries to another caused by the performance of an act which is in itself lawful is here emphasized by holding that such liability may arise from the performance of an act which the law compelled the party to perform. The decision is not a novel one but we believe it presents the matter more clearly and strongly than any other case has done, and the correctness of the principle 23 L. R. A.

Lippincott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff below, who is also the plaintiff in error, sued the Camden & Atlantic Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff shows that the accident out of which the injuries to the plaintiff arose occurred at Berlin, in the county of Camden, on March 28, 1891, about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The plaintiff was, with a horse and wagon, engaged near the station at Berlin in unloading manure from a freight car of the defendants on a side track, and carting the same to a field not far away. On one of these trips he had loaded the wagon with manure, and had gotten off the car to drive away with his load to the field, when his attention was called to the fact of an approaching train on its way from Philadelphia to Atlantic City. The load on the wagon was nearly a ton in weight, and his horse was a young and spirited animal, but one which, to a considerable extent, by the evidence, had been accustomed to cars, and not ordinarily scared by them. He was, with his horse and wagon, about seventy-five yards away from the main tracks, near a siding upon which the freight cars holding the manure were standing, which siding ran nearly parallel with the main track on which the passenger train was approaching, and the roadway or other way upon which he was to drive with his load ran about parallel with these tracks, and in the same direction in which the train was going. The evidence shows that from this point he could not be seen by the engineer of an approaching train until the train came nearly or about opposite declared can hardly be questioned although there must remain in most cases a difficult question of fact as to the existence of negligence in the giving of such a signal.

For the giving of statutory signals as the measure of trainmen's duty at a railroad crossing, see note to New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Leamon (N. J.) 15 L. R. A. 426.

to the point where he was engaged. When the plaintiff's attention was called to an approaching train he took hold of the head of his horse, and was in the act of leading him along this roadway in which he was to go on his way to the field, and, while doing this, the train, which was somewhat behind time, came along and passed the station at a high rate of speed. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff does not show that the whistle blew, or the bell rang, before this point was reached. The evidence on the part of plaintiff, in substance, shows that as the train came to this point the engineer leaned out of the cab window, looked at the plaintiff holding his horse by the head, and then suddenly reached up and opened the valve, and blew a loud, shrill whistle, which so frightened the horse that it became entirely unmanageable, and the plaintiff, in his efforts to control it and prevent it from running away, was very seriously injured. The situation, by the evidence, appeared to be that there is an east-bound and a west-bound main track passing this station. The station faces the north, and the main tracks are in front of the station. Some short distance west of the station, Taunton avenue, a public highway, crosses the tracks at right angles. Immediately at the station, Jackson street, a public highway, crosses the tracks at right angles. About one hundred yards east of the station there is also another crossing, called "Bishop's Crossing," also a highway; and still further east, nearly a half mile away, there is another crossing, called "Bishop's Road." Back of the station, on the south side, nearly seventy-five yards away, was the side track on which the carload of manure was standing, from which the defendant was loading his wagon. The side track was nearly parallel with the main track, deflecting a little to the south.

Upon the manner in which the whistle was blown, the plaintiff testifies that, when his wagon was loaded, he got off the car on the ground, and took the horse by the head, and started out away from the car to go to the field with his load, when his attention was called to the approaching train; that the Jackson street crossing is at the end of the station. This was the point opposite which the plaintiff was holding his horse; and he says: "I didn't think of them blowing the whistle there, because he was just beyond the crossing when he blowed the whistle, and he was looking with his head out of the cab window, and saw me, and he was smiling; and he just reached up and pulled his whistle, as I call it, 'wide open,' and the instant he done that she jumped." In another place in his evidence he says: "As soon as he saw me he reached right up and pulled the whistle," and that he never heard a shriller whistle in his life; that it was "a great deal louder than the usual whistle, and that it was so blown for two hundred yards;" and he further says, so far as his hearing was concerned, the whistle did not blow until the train was just beyond the crossing at Jackson street, opposite the point where the plaintiff was with his horse and wagon, and that the whistle has never since been blown at this point; and that, at the time it was blown in this manner, there was nothing on the track ahead to provoke such a whistle. It may be well said that there exists, if this evidence be true, a question whether there was not only negligence, but wantonness, on the part of the engineer in blowing this whistle as he did. Mr. Minnard, a witness, who lives opposite, and about seventy feet from, the station a little beyond the easterly end, testifies that he was back of his house when he first heard the locomotive whistle and that it sounded like a cattle call, and he supposed it was such, and started around the end of his house, when his wife met him, and told him that a horse was running away; that there was no way of measuring the sound of the whistle, but that it was a cattle call,—a loud shrill whistle; that it was a great many times louder than the ordinary blow on approaching a station, or what they used to blow on approaching. He thought somebody was on the track, and he started, supposing some one was on the track. The train was running at such rate of speed that, before he got around his house, it was a mile and a half away. He then describes the efforts of the plaintiff to control the horse, and that he would not have attempted its control for all the horses in the county. Harry Beckly, another witness, whose attention was called to the matter when the horse started, and while he had no occasion before that time to note the particulars, testifies that he saw a man have his head out of the cab window, and that he blew the whistle. He described it as being louder than usual, but otherwise took no note of it except that the whistle did not blow till the engine was opposite the house of Mr. Minnard. Arthur W. Robinson, a witness, was unloading a freight car next to the car from which the plaintiff was unloading; described the whistle as "a long, loud blow;" that "it was an uncommonly loud blow,—loud and long;" and that he never heard a train blow in that place before. This witness states that he heard no whistle blow upon the approach of this train towards the station and crossings there. William Boardly, a witness, described the whistle as a "real loud blow;" that it was a quick, loud blow,—louder than he had heard before; that when the whistle "burst out," as he describes it, he looked up, and saw a man hold of the whistle, with his head out of the cab window; that he was looking towards the plaintiff, and that he looked as if he was laughing. Harry Bittle swears that the whistle has not blown at this place since.

There is much other evidence on the part of the plaintiff as to the situation of the crossings,—the number of them, and the distance apart,—the location of the main tracks, and the side track upon which the freight car stood. There is some evidence to show that the engineer, on approaching this station, could not see the plaintiff in the position in which he was with his horse and wagon, but at the point where the witnesses identify this unusual blowing of the whistle there appears to have been no difficulty in this respect. The plaintiff, with his horse and wagon, was in plain view of the engineer, or other person in the cab, looking from the cab window. At the close of the evidence the defendant moved a nonsuit, which was granted on three grounds: First, that the blowing of this whistle at this place where it was blown was not an unlawful act of the defendant, in view of statutory authority in this respect, and that the company was authorized to blow the whistle in this place; and, secondly, that there was nothing peculiar about the blowing of the whistle which made it unlawful, or constituted the manner of its blowing actionable negligence; that the only question raised upon this point was whether the whistle blown was the one ordinarily to be blown at this crossing or place, or whether it had an audibility which to one witness created the idea that there was something on the track ahead of the train, and whether the distinction between those two degrees of whistling constituted actionable negligence. The trial court held that these were questions of law, and to be determined by the court, and they were determined in favor of the defendant. Besides these two points, the further finding of the court was that, even if the engineer was negligent, still there existed contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; that, if there was negligence on the part of the engineer, still that negligence was shared by the plaintiff, in that the engineer saw all that could be seen, and saw nothing more than the plaintiff knew himself; or, in other words, he saw a man who thought he had his horse under management, leading the horse in a manner which ordinarily does give a man such control. So that if there was a mistake in judgment—if there was negligence in the judgment—on the part of the engineer, it was negligence which was fully shared by the plaintiff. If, therefore, there was negligence, the negligence of the engineer and the plaintiff was identical. Both thought, and had a right to think, the same thing, except that the plaintiff knew what he was thinking about, and the engineer could not know what the plaintiff thought; and that it was a case in which, whatever the negligence of the engineer, he borrowed it from the plaintiff, and he was no more nor less negligent than the plaintiff, and their negligence resulted from precisely the same failure to foresee exactly what the horse would do under such blowing as the whistle might give at that place, and under the circumstances. Upon these grounds the trial justice at the circuit nonsuited the plaintiff.

Upon a review of this case, the conclusion is that, under the statute authorizing the points and distances at and for which either a whistle shall be blown or a bell rung, the defendant had the right to blow this whistle at this point. The statutory signal was required here, and by force of the statute, considering the proximity of these crossings to each other, it became the duty of the defendant to ring the bell or blow the whistle, and continue to do so until the engine had crossed the first three streets or highways named, and their duty was performed when either the whistle was so blown or the bell so rung; and such duty, if properly performed, could not be made the source of complaint, whatever might be the results; but to fully comply with such statutory duty, and free itself from fault, the defendant was compelled to commence the blowing of such whistle at the point provided by the statute, and continue it over the space provided. Now, there is evidence here on the part of the plaintiff—and considerable of it, too—that neither the bell was heard to ring, nor the whistle to blow, until the point of accident was reached. If this be true, the defendant did not comply with the statutory requirements as to warning signals in approaching these crossings, and it is difficult to perceive why this element of negligence in this case should not have been submitted to the jury. Revision, p. 910, § 6. The plaintiff in this case, under the circumstances in which he was placed, might perhaps be well entitled to this warning. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Leaman, 54 N. J. L. 202, 15 L. R. A. 426. Then, again, if no whistle was blown until Jackson street crossing was reached, as appears by some of the evidence, and then there was a sudden call, no previous warning being given, the question arises whether also this fact, so far as it affects the plaintiff, should not have been submitted to the jury, upon the inquiry as to the existence of negligence of the defendant in the performance of its duty to the plaintiff. But these considerations do not appear to have entered into the holding of the trial justice upon the motion to nonsuit, and are not deemed necessary to be discussed in this review.

Thus, while the legal right to blow the whistle at this point may be conceded, yet it does not by any means follow that this right could be exercised in a negligent, heedless, or wanton manner by the servants of the defendant, resulting in an injury to the plaintiff; and this, as the case is presented, appears to be the difficulty. The question here is whether this whistle was so negligently, needlessly, or wantonly blown as to have caused this injury to the plaintiff. Abstractly, this question, in any given case where an inference of this character may be reasonably drawn from the evidence, should be committed to the jury for its decision, and not assumed by the court. It is not necessary to repeat the circumstances of the accident. One fact upon the evidence seems to be clear, whether the whistle was blown or not, or continuously or not, before the point of accident was reached, and that is that the engineer, while apparently looking at the plaintiff, who, with his horse and wagon, was in full view, holding his horse, or leading him in the usual manner along the way provided, reached up and gave to his whistle an extra force of sound, shrill and loud,—louder and shriller than ever was heard before. It is described as a cattle call by one witness,—a call which is usually made when cattle are upon the track ahead of the train, or a call by reason of some sudden danger. This accident was apparently the result of this manner of sounding this whistle. There is no evidence in the case at this point that such a sounding of the whistle was called for by any danger to the train whatever, from obstructions ahead of it on or near the track. The plaintiff with his horse was in no situation of danger, and it must be said with some degree of emphasis that, upon the evidence as it stood at the close of the plaintiff's case, there was every appearance of negligence and heedlessness, if not wantonness, in the act of blowing this whistle in the manner in which it was blown. It must be that the defendant is bound to use reasonable care and prudence in giving statutory signals of the approach of a train, or its existence, at any given point where such signal may be allowed or required. Negligence in the exercise of a lawful right is actionable if it causes injury. It is no excuse or justification that an act occasioning injury was itself lawful, or that it was done in the exercise of a lawful right, if the injury arose from the negligent manner in which it was done. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 259, 98 Am. Dec. 346. This is quite aside from the question whether blowing at this point could do any good or not. It was their legislative duty to blow the whistle, and it cannot be said that legal injury can arise from the proper performance of this duty; but the pregnant question always is whether, under all the circumstances of the case, reasonable care has been used in the exercise of legislative right and the performance of the legislative duty. A negligent exercise of the right, or the negligent performance of the duty, can in no event be excused. Bradley v. Boston & M. Railroad, 2 Cush. 589; Linfeld v. Old Colony R. Corp. 10 Cush. 562, 57 Am. Dec. 154; Wakefield v. Connecticut & P. Rivers R. Co. 37 Vt. 380. In Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Stinger, 78 Pa. 219, the case was that the plaintiff was driving his horse parallel with defendant's tracks, and the horse was frightened by the whistle. The court reversing said: "If the court below had left it to the jury to find negligence from the use of the whistle the second time, if they believed it to be so used, provided the engineer saw, or with proper care might have seen, the plaintiff's wagon, and that his horse was becoming unmanageable, there would have been no error." There were two blasts of the whistle in this case cited, and the court allowed the jury to say whether the first blast was negligent. In this case there was no question of the right to use the whistle at the point at which it was used. The question was whether it was used in a negligent manner. Hill v. Portland, etc., R. R. Co., 55 Me. 488, 92 Am. Dec. 601, is a case nearly in point with the case in hand. There a horse was standing at the depot, the train started, and the engine driver blew a sharp, loud blast, which frightened the horse. The defendant had legislative authority to blow the whistle there, but the question of whether there was negligence in the manner of blowing the whistle was left to the jury. In Culp v. Atchison & N. R. Co., 17 Kan. 476, the declaration charged that a negligent blowing of the whistle was the cause of the injury. On demurrer it was held actionable. To the same effect may be cited the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Dunn, 62 Ill. 451. While a railway company is entitled by law to run its train along a street it is not liable for damages caused by the horses of a traveler taking fright at the necessary blowing off of steam from one of its locomotives; but, if the steam was blown off negligently, it would be liable. Hahn v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 51 Cal. 605. Under our statute in this state, the court will judicially know that the blowing of a whistle is one of the signals used in running a railway train, and that it is authorized and required; yet, if it be done negligently or wantonly, such negligence or wantonness is actionable. 1 Thomp. Neg. 351, and cases cited; Toledo, W. & C. R. Co. v. Harmon, 47 Ill. 298; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Starnes, 9 Heisk. 52, 24 Am. Rep. 296. So, in case of the sounding of a steam whistle with a loud noise when it was unnecessary (Ibid.) where it was a negligent act (Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Dunn, supra), and where it was done in a spirit of wanton playfulness (Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Starnes, supra); and, so far as the adjudicated cases go, the question whether the act was one of negligence or of wantonness or malice is of little import, save as to the measure of damage.

Reference has been made to these few cases on the subject of the care to be exercised in giving even the statutory signals, to show that this specific character of negligence has been a subject of adjudications. It, of course, cannot be at all denied that there may be such negligence, heedlessness, or wantonness in the sounding of railway whistles, even at the places where it is authorized and required to sound them, as to be entirely actionable. While no liability attaches for damages for these acts so long as they are exercised in accordance with statutory authority with ordinary care, yet liability ensues when they are done negligently or wantonly. The rule obtains generally that a master is not answerable in damages for the wanton and malicious acts of his servant; yet this immunity is not generally extended to railroad corporations, whose servants are intrusted with such extensive means of doing mischief. Accordingly, it has been established that if such servants, while in charge of the company's engines and machinery, and engaged about its business, negligently, wantonly, or willfully pervert such agencies, the company must respond in damages; and this is the principle deducible from the authorities upon this subject. Applying these principles to the facts and circumstances of this case, it leads to the conclusion that the jury should have been permitted to pass judgment upon the question whether this whistle was blown in such a negligent, willful, or wanton manner as to be actionable.

Turning to the question of whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in this case, it seems very difficult to determine upon what ground such contributory negligence can be imputed to him. Neither by his own act, nor any act of his uniting with the act of the engineer in blowing this whistle, can want of care be attributable to him. It would appear that he was then, so far as his own case goes, exercising every care which a prudent man could exercise.

He was in a place, and on a way, where he had the legal right to be,—in fact, at a place provided by the defendant for him to be in the business of unloading freight from its own cars; and he was on the very grounds prepared by the company for this use, and engaged in an occupation perfectly legal and proper, and one which was of advantage to the defendant. On learning of the approach of the train, although without hearing any statutory signal, he exercised care in placing himself in a position in which he would be most conveniently able to control his horse in case the exercise of such control was needed, and he used every endeavor possible to so control it and avoid injury; and in the discussion of this question it is assumed that he was guilty of no act of negligence in endeavoring to control and save from injury the horse which he had in charge. And, while no opinion can perhaps be passed here as to the conclusion or inference to be drawn from these facts, yet for the purposes of this case it would appear as if the inference of ordinary care and caution to avoid injury is the most reasonable one, and, at all events, not so clearly otherwise as to deprive the jury of the right to pass on it. Upon this question of whether a nonsuit, upon either of these grounds here discussed, should have been granted, the rule of law to apply has often been enunciated in this court, and there is but little need of referring to more than one or two cases. It is by applying these general rules to each particular case that a safe conclusion can be reached. The chief justice, in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Matthews, 36 N. J. L. 581 (in this court), speaking to the question whether the plaintiff, by his want of ordinary caution, produced the damage, says: "It is sufficient for all useful purposes to say that the evidence on this subject is open to fair debate, and leaves the mind in a state of some doubt on this question whether the driver of the horses which were destroyed exercised, or not, that degree of care which his legal duty exacted. This being the case, the judge would not have been justified in taking this question from the jury. Such a course is proper only when the absence of caution is apparent, and is in reason indisputable." This general doctrine has been universally adopted; and in Bahr v. Lombard, 53 N. J. L. 283, Mr. Justice Garrison (in this court), as alike applicable to the defendant upon alleged proof of negligence, and to the plaintiff upon alleged proof of contributory negligence, declares that "when, in an action for negligence, the standard of duty can be predicated as matter of law, the only question for the jury is whether the conduct of the defendant fell short of that standard. If, from the facts in evidence, two inferences as to the defendant's conduct may legitimately be drawn, one favorable, and the other unfavorable, to its negligence, a question is presented which calls for opinion of the jury." Passing over the many decided cases adhering to this doctrine, the latest expression on this subject is by Mr. Justice Magie (in this court), in Newark Pass. R. Co. v. Block (N. J. Err. & App.) 27 Atl. Rep. 1067, where, in speaking of the power to direct a nonsuit or verdict, he says: "The power to direct a verdict is identical with, and rests upon the same foundation as, the power to nonsuit." When in such cases the trial judge is requested to nonsuit or direct a verdict, his duty is, as is well expressed by Lord Chancellor Cairns in Metropolitan R. Co. v. Jackson, 3 App. Cas. 193, to say whether any facts have been established by evidence from which negligence may be reasonably inferred. If none, there is no case to go to the jury; but if, from facts established, negligence may reasonably and legitimately be inferred, it is for the jury to find whether, from those facts, negligence ought to be inferred. In performing this function the trial judge must take care not to trench on the peculiar province of the jury to determine questions of fact, and must bear in mind that the question is not whether he would infer negligence from the established facts, but whether negligence can be reasonably and legitimately inferred by the jury.

It follows that, if the real facts have not been established by the evidence, but remain in substantial dispute, the trial judges must submit them, and the inferences to be drawn from those which the jury find established, to the determination of the jury. Moebius v. Becker, 46 N. J. L. 41; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Shelton, 55 N. J. L. 342; Orus v. Caldwell, 52 N. J. L. 215.

Applying these principles to the case here upon review, the trial judge should have submitted the question of the defendant's negligence, and the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, if it was alleged that any existed, to the jury. I shall therefore vote for a reversal of the judgment of nonsuit, and for a venire de novo.

Magie and Van Syckel, JJ., dissent.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Rachel ELLIS'S APPEAL.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. Collusion and agreement between the parties to an action for divorce

*Headnotes by GILFILLAN, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Effect of appearance by nonresident to give jurisdiction of divorce case.

Appearance generally.

An appearance by a nonresident defendant in a 23 L. R. A.

as to the judgment to be rendered does not affect the jurisdiction, nor render the judgment entered void.

2. The Act of 1889 known as the "Probate Code" was properly passed.

3. Proof that a deceased party executed a will, which he afterwards destroyed, divorce suit, by filing an answer, gives the court jurisdiction to render a decree. Jones v. Jones, 108 N. Y. 415, affirming 36 Hun. 414; Sanford v. Sanford, 5 Day, 383; Jones v. Jones, 60 Tex. 451.

will not defeat an application for an administrator, unless its contents can be proved with such degree of certainty that it may be established as a will.

4. A copy of the proceedings of a court of another state is admissible here if authenticated according to the statute of this state, though not according to the act of congress.
5. An authenticated copy of a judgment roll is evidence of all that is properly contained in it, and is evidence prima facie that the judgment was properly entered in the judgment book.
6. That an action was tried in a county other than that declared by statute the proper county for its trial does not go to the jurisdiction.
7. That the wife, the plaintiff in an action for divorce, was induced to bring it by persuasion, ill treatment, and threats by the husband that he would continue such ill treatment unless she brought the action, does not affect the validity of the judgment in a collateral proceeding.
8. Where, in an action in the court of another state for divorce, both parties voluntarily appear, and submit to the jurisdiction, they are bound by the judgment, and cannot avoid it in a collateral proceeding in this state by proof that when the action was brought and judgment rendered neither of them was a resident in that state, and that both were residents in this state.

(December 6, 1893.)

APPPEAL by Rachel Ellis and others from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County affirming an order of the Probate Court appointing Flora Ellis as administratrix of the estate of Matthew Ellis, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. G. Ingersoll and Charles N. Bell, for appellants:

The Wisconsin statute applicable to divorce, chap. 109, § 2359, which is in evidence, reads as follows: "When divorce not to be granted.—No divorce shall be granted unless the plaintiff shall have resided in this state one year immediately preceding the time of the commencement of the action."

The groundwork of jurisdiction in each state is residence.

Hall v. Hall, 25 Wis. 600; Hanover v. Turner, 14 Mass. 227, 7 Am. Dec. 203; Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 46 Iowa, 437; Bacon v. Bacon, 43 Wis. 202; Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 367.

A court sitting in divorce proceedings is a court with local, limited, special, and statutory jurisdiction only.

State v. Armington, 25 Minn. 37; Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 93; Cooley, Const. Lim. 400, and notes; Kerr v. Kerr, 41 N. Y. 272; Hoffman v. Hoffman, 46 N. Y. 30, 7 Am. Rep. 299; Hanover v. Turner, supra.

The subject-matter of the divorce suit neither was, nor could be, within the jurisdiction of the court, if the parties had no domicile within the state from which the court derived its powers.

People v. Davell, 25 Mich. 247, 12 Am. Rep. 260; Ex Walker's Will, 186 N. Y. 29; Wilmore v. Flack, 96 N. Y. 519; McMahon v. Rauhr, 47

Or obtaining leave to answer. Zycklinski v. Zycklinski, 2 Swab. & T. 420, 81 L. J. Mat. 37, 5 L. T. N. S. 690.

Or by filing an appearance. Garstin v. Garstin, 4 Swab. & T. 73, 84 L. J. Mat. 45, 13 Week. Rep. 506.

And the same was held, where the nonresident moved to vacate a judgment obtained by fraud, the court holding that the complaint should still stand for trial. Yorke v. Yorke (N. Dak.) May 31, 1893.

A decree of divorce showing residence of the complainant wife, and appearance by the defendant, is entitled to full faith and credit, and such finding of actual residence will be conclusive unless overcome by adverse testimony. Cheever v. Wilson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 106, 19 L. ed. 604.

And a nonresident defendant may file a cross-petition in a divorce suit and obtain affirmative relief under section 14 of the Indiana Divorce Act, providing that the defendant may file a cross-petition and the court shall decree the divorce to the party entitled to the same. Jenness v. Jenness, 24 Ind. 355, 37 Am. Dec. 335.

A resident of Dublin appearing to a suit in the consistorial court of London, admitting the allegation of the bill that she was a resident of St. James, Westminster, gives that court jurisdiction of the person, where there is no collusion, and an intervenor cannot question such jurisdiction for her. Donegal v. Donegal, 3 Phillim. 597; Chiochester v. Donegal, 1 Add. Eccl. Rep. 5.

So in Callwell v. Callwell, 3 Swab. & T. 259, where the husband only had a temporary domicile in England, and the wife appeared and submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, a divorce was granted for adultery committed in England and on the continent; but the court does not discuss the question of jurisdiction.

In Vischer v. Vischer, 12 Barb. 640, it was stated 23 L. R. A.

that a divorce granted by a sister state on an appearance would be conclusive in New York, but that was not involved in this case.

A judgment of maintenance in favor of the wife in South Carolina, where the husband appeared, will be sustained as valid up to the date of a divorce decree obtained subsequently by him in Alabama. Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala. 629, 56 Am. Dec. 227.

But in McCartney v. McCartney, 30 W. N. C. 132, where the defendant, a resident of Scotland, filed an answer to a suit of divorce for desertion, admitting marriage but requiring proof of all other allegations, the court held that the Pennsylvania statutes did not give jurisdiction in divorce cases for desertion occurring in a foreign country.

And a special appearance to set aside an invalid judgment rendered on publication, for defective service, will not give the court jurisdiction to then render a decree, although the affidavit showing special appearance only, was filed, but the attention of the court was not called to it. Green v. Green, 42 Kan. 654.

In Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana. 181, the court of appeals held that there was no appeal from divorce (a vinculo) under the statute, but that as regarded property involved, the decree would be considered, and in reviewing that question said that a wife who was in good faith a resident of that state could not obtain a divorce from a nonresident husband although he appeared in the action, and reversed the decree as to the property but dismissed the writ of error as to revising the divorce decree.

Fraud and collusion.

Collusion and fraud by a nonresident in appearing and obtaining a decree or allowing a court to render a decree of divorce, will preclude such person from claiming that the court had not juris-

Flora Ellis claims what she claims in this case, not by deed, not by purchase, but as privy by or through Matthew Ellis, as privy by marriage. She has no better right to resist the claim of Rachel than Matthew Ellis would have.

The doctrines of estoppel find no legitimate place in such a case as this in the probate court or in any other court.

Hardy v. Smith, 136 Mass. 328; State v. Armington, 25 Minn. 87; People v. Dawell, supra; Smith v. Smith, 18 Gray, 210; Dillon v. Ditson, supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 400, and notes; Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 210, 81 L. ed. 658; Reed v. Reed, 53 Mich. 117.

Want of jurisdiction can be shown at all times to invalidate a decree of court.

Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897; Prosser v. Warner, 47 Vt. 687, 19 Am. Rep. 182; Kerr v. Kerr, supra; Sevall v. Sevall, 123 Mass. 161, 28 Am. Rep. 299; Chase v. Chase, 6 Gray, 157; Com. v. Blood, 97 Mass. 538; Williams v. Williams, 68 Wis. 58, 53 Am. Rep. 253; Cook v. Cook, 56 Wis. 195.

There can be no estoppel any further than jurisdiction of the subject-matter has been obtained.

Williams v. Williams, supra.

It is not pretended that by the mere consent of the parties the marriage contract may be dissolved.

True v. True, 6 Minn. 458 (Gil. 819).

A divorce is not to be granted simply because the parties are willing that it should be, nor because the defendant makes default, or neglects to assert, or waives a defense.

Young v. Young, 17 Minn. 186.

It could not be tolerated that a party anxious to secure a divorce should bring about a judicial separation by an action against himself, and commenced and managed by himself, in his own interest, using his wife as a mere figure-head,—a fraud alike upon her and the court.

Olmstead v. Olmstead, 41 Minn. 298; Bomsta v. Johnson, 38 Minn. 233.

The Wisconsin court could not get or take jurisdiction of the status or subject-matter of the action, nor could it get or take jurisdiction of the status for the purpose of getting jurisdiction of the persons; and it could not make a decree as to alimony or as to their property rights, save as incidental to the decree of divorce. The decree must stand or fall as an entirety.

Griffin v. Chadbourne, 32 Minn. 128.

If the marriage relation is of the character and public interest outlined in People v. Dawell, Cook v. Cook, Smith v. Smith, and True v. True, supra, then no court has any authority in the performance of its official and public duty to send the state or the public into the background, diction. Ellis v. White, 61 Iowa, 644; Ellcott v. Wohlfrom, 55 Cal. 384; Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60; Kirrihan v. Kirrihan, 15 N. J. Eq. 146.

These cases fully sustain the decision in the main case.

And a wife who appeared as a defendant in a divorce suit in another state, and thereafter executed a release of dower, homestead and alimony, reciting such decree, cannot then claim that the decree is invalid for want of jurisdiction, where she does not allege or show that the husband went to such state in order to procure a divorce in violation of Mass. Gen. Stat., chap. 107. Loud v. Loud, 129 Mass. 14. See also Smith v. Smith, infra.

But in Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Johns. 424, it was held that a New York court would not enforce a decree for alimony obtained by a resident of New York, in a Vermont court on a cause of divorce not recognized in New York, even if the defendant who also lived in New York, appeared in the Vermont action. The court puts the decision on the further ground that she was incapable of acquiring other domicile than that of her husband, and that the whole proceeding was an attempt to evade the New York laws.

This decision has been doubted and partially overruled in Kinnler v. Kinnler, 45 N. Y. 535, 6 Am. Rep. 134, which holds that where the parties did not reside in New York but in Massachusetts, and the husband went to Illinois and procured a divorce there his wife appearing in such suit, this decree will not be held invalid in a suit by a second husband in New York to annul his marriage on the ground that the former marriage of his wife is still in force, where he does not allege that her former husband was not a resident of Illinois.

This case distinguishes Jackson v. Jackson, supra, and denies the position there taken that a wife cannot obtain a separate domicile and holds that a husband voluntarily submitting his case to a court is bound thereby.

This decision was approved in Ruger v. Heckel, 25 N. Y. 432.

But an Indiana divorce where neither party resided there but were married in New York will not be recognized in New York although the decree shows an appearance by one purporting to be attorney for the defendant's wife where no process was ever served on her and she had no knowledge of the proceedings and the court held that she was entitled to administer on his estate in New York. Kerr v. Kerr, 41 N. Y. 272.

It was held in People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247, 12 Am. Rep. 261, that in a prosecution for bigamy in Michigan, the state may prove that the husband and his former wife were residents of that state at the time of the rendition of a decree of divorce by appearance or collusion in Indiana, and such decree is no protection to the husband—as the state is a party interested.

And children of a marriage made in Scotland where their mother went there to obtain a divorce from her former husband when both were married and were residing in England, cannot inherit from her, as the divorce in Scotland is void, the jurisdiction having been fraudulently conferred by collusion. Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 8 H. L. 55.

And under Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 76-139, providing that a divorce obtained in another state, for causes arising in Massachusetts, where such parties resided, but who had gone to such other state to procure a divorce on grounds for which it would not be granted in Massachusetts, will be void, and an appearance will not preclude either party from repudiating such a decree. Smith v. Smith, 18 Gray, 209; Hardy v. Smith, 136 Mass. 328; Chase v. Chase, 6 Gray, 157. See also Loud v. Loud, supra.

If the court of the domicile of the parties in a divorce action gets no jurisdiction save by a strict observance of statutory rules, under what theory or logic can a court of a sister state take or acquire jurisdiction in a case between non-residents?

The Wisconsin decree of divorce granted to Rachel Ellis is entitled to full faith and credit in the courts of this state, and must be held, as against her, final and conclusive upon the question of her residence, the Wisconsin court having found and adjudged that her allegation of residence in Wisconsin was true.

U. S. Const. art. 9 § 1; Hotchkiss v. Cutting, 14 Minn. 587; Cone v. Hooper, supra; Dequindre v. Williams, 31 Ind. 444; Lance v. Dugan, 22 W. N. C. 132; Hall v. Chapuis, 144 U. S. 119, 36 L. ed. 368.

Conceding that the question of Rachel Ellis's residence was a jurisdictional one, yet it belonged to that class of jurisdictional facts which the court must find from the evidence; and if the court found this fact upon insufficient evidence, or without competent evidence, and thereupon proceeded to exercise jurisdiction, the action of the court in this respect was not void, but merely erroneous, and subject only to direct attacks as by appeal, and not a collateral attack.

Goldree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 98; Freem. Judgm. §§ 118, 608; Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 500; Calloway v. Cooley, 50 Kan. 743; Waldo v. Waldo, supra.

The appellant, Rachel Ellis, having applied as plaintiff to the circuit court in Wisconsin for an absolute divorce, upon a sworn petition, alleging that she was a bona fide resident of that county, and having obtained the relief she sought, including a large amount of permanent alimony or distributive share of Matthew Ellis's property, is forever estopped, as against this respondent his second wife, to deny the jurisdiction of that court to grant such relief.

Behr v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 2 Flipp. 692; Ellis v. White, 61 Iowa, 644; Carlisle v. Carlisle, 96 Mich. 128; Arthur v. Israel, 10 L. R. A. 693, 15 Colo. 147, 18 Colo. 158; Smith v. Smith, 13 Gray, 209; Zoellner v. Zoellner, 46 Mich. 511; Simons v. Simons, 47 Mich. 253.

A party accepting and retaining the fruits or benefits of a void judgment is effectually estopped to impeach such judgment at any time or in any proceeding.

This rule applies to a judgment void for want of jurisdiction of the parties or subject-matter.

Denver City Irrigation & Water Co. v. Mid-dough, 12 Colo. 434; Fahnestock v. Gilham, 77 Ill. 637; Bigelow, Estoppel, p. 211.

Whatever rights Rachel Ellis may claim to have had originally, to vacate or set aside the decree of divorce obtained by her, she has clearly lost by her own laches, having acquiesced in the decree for nearly nine years. It will be noticed that she makes no attempt to excuse the long delay.

Earle v. Earle, 91 Ind. 27; Richeson v. Simons, 47 Mo. 20; Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60; Zoellner v. Zoellner, and Carlisle v. Carlisle, supra.

Even though Rachel Ellis had never been divorced at all, yet her conduct during the past nine years has been so inconsistent with the relation of wife, that she would not be allowed to claim or assert property rights as wife, as against innocent third parties.

Re Ruako, 34 Hun, 334; Nuhn v. Miller, 5 Wash. 405; Sadler v. Niese, 5 Wash. 282.

Gillilan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from an order appointing an administratrix. Stating the history of the matters involved in chronological order, in 1869 Matthew Ellis and Rachel Cottrell, then residents in Wisconsin, intermarried in that state, and resided therein—the latter part of the time at Hudson—from the time of their marriage till October, 1883, when they came to St. Paul, Minnesota. February 29, 1884, she commenced by proper personal service of summons an action against him for divorce in the circuit court for the county of St. Croix (in which Hudson is situated), in said state. Her complaint was sworn to by her, and it alleged, among other things, that she then was, and for more than three years last past had been, a resident of said county and state, and that for more than a year prior to bringing the action the defendant had willfully deserted and refused to live and cohabit with her; and it demanded judgment dissolving the marriage, and requiring the defendant to pay her the sum of $3,000 alimony. The defendant filed an answer, not raising any substantial issues, and the parties made and filed a stipulation agreeing upon the alimony at $6,150 and a horse, carriage, robes, etc., and all the defendant's household goods, except his library. The answer and stipulation suggest an agreement between the parties for a divorce,—a suggestion which ought to have caused the court, and we must assume that it did, to require strict and ample proofs of the facts showing a cause of action, and which would have been influential upon an application to vacate the judgment rendered on the ground of collusion and fraud upon the court. But that did not go to the jurisdiction of the court over the case. A reason for deciding against the plaintiff, or a fraud upon the court as to the judgment to be rendered, or the character of the motive that induced the bringing of the action, does not affect the jurisdiction. March 27, 1884, judgment in that action was rendered, dissolving the marriage between the parties, and allowing the plaintiff therein the alimony stipulated; and that alimony was paid. September 2, 1886, Matthew Ellis and Flora Wilson intermarried, and they lived together as husband and wife until December 7, 1892, when he died in St. Paul, Ramsey county, in this state. Flora Ellis, the second wife, filed a petition in the probate court of said county, stating the necessary jurisdictional facts, alleging that Matthew Ellis died intestate, and that she was his widow, and asking to be appointed his administratrix. On the day appointed for the hearing Rachel Ellis appeared, denied that Flora was the widow, alleged that she was the widow, and asked that she be appointed administratrix. At the same time appeared a brother and sister of deceased, representing that the deceased had made a will, still in force, and asking the court to make the proper order or decree in the premises. The probate court appointed Flora administratrix, and on an appeal to the district court, in which the court heard all the parties, that court affirmed the decision of the probate court.

Before taking up the principal question in the case, the only one which seems to us of sufficient importance, as presented by the evidence, to call for consideration at any length, we will dispose of others of less importance. It is claimed by appellants that the Act of 1899 known as the "Probate Code" was not passed in the house of representatives in the manner prescribed by the constitution, because it does not appear from the house journal that the bill was read on three different days, or that the rule was suspended, as required by the constitution. It is not clear to us what the Probate Code has to do with the case, for the rule providing who shall be entitled to administration was the same under the prior law as under that act, and the evidence of a will offered was not sufficient to establish a will, not produced, either under the prior law or the Probate Code. Every bill signed and approved as required by the constitution is presumed to have been properly passed. And, as held in State v. Peterson, 38 Minn. 148, the absence from the journal of either house of an entry showing that a particular thing was done, is no evidence that it was not done, unless the constitution requires the entry to be made; and there is no such requirement in respect to the reading of a bill on three different days, or its passage under a suspension of the rule. The objection, therefore, is not well taken.

Ellis executed two wills,—one in 1890, which he destroyed, with intent to revoke, in July, 1891, when he executed another. He destroyed that will, apparently with intent to revoke it, December 31, 1891. The appellants offered evidence tending to prove that at that date he had not sufficient mental capacity to make or revoke a will. On the respondent's objection this evidence was excluded, on the ground, as we understand, that it was immaterial, because there was not sufficient evidence of the will. It must be apparent that, in order to defeat an application for the appointment of an administrator, proof of a will, not forthcoming, must be such as to show that it can be established. Proof that one was executed will not suffice without proof to a reasonable certainty of its contents. To establish a will without such proof would be to make a will for the party. The evidence afforded no means of determining with any degree of certainty what disposition the will of July, 1891, made of the testator's property. The most that could be made of it was that it left to Flora Ellis one third of the property, and something more, but how much or what more did not appear; that there were specific devises or legacies to others, but to whom, except one, or how much to any one of them, did not appear; and that there was a residuary devisee or legatee, but who, did not appear; and there were no means of determining how much would be the residue. Of course, a will, not produced, could not be established on any such evidence, and evidence that the testator had not capacity to revoke it would be immaterial. That leaves only the question which of the two, Flora or Rachel, was the widow of Matthew Ellis? That depends on the validity of the judgment divorcing Rachel and Matthew. It is objected that the judgment was not sufficiently proved, because—First, the authentication was not in conformity with the act of congress; second, the copy authenticated is a copy of the judgment roll, and it does not appear the judgment was ever entered in the judgment book.

When the proceedings of a court of another state are authenticated as provided by act of congress, they must be received as evidence; but it is competent for the legislature of each state to provide that proof of such proceedings may be received in the courts of such state by authentication less than is prescribed by act of congress, and the authentication in this case was in accordance with the statute of the state. We will assume that the laws of Wisconsin are the same as our own in respect to entering judgments and making up the judgment rolls. The roll, or an authenticated copy of it, is evidence of all that is properly contained in it, including the judgment, and is evidence, prima facie at any rate, that the judgment was properly rendered and entered so as to have effect. It is objected to the judgment that by the laws of Wisconsin (which on this point were proved) the action for divorce is a local action,—that is, that it is properly triable in the county where the parties, or one of them, resides; that by the pleadings it appears that the only county in which either party resided was the county of St. Croix, but that the hearing in the action was had in the county of Eau Claire. And it is urged that in hearing the case the court acted without jurisdiction. We are not referred to any decision in that state as to the effect on the jurisdiction of a trial (by the same court) in one county when the statute provides that the trial ought to be in another. In this state it might be an irregularity, and, if objected to, error, but would not affect the jurisdiction of the court so as to render the judgment void. Gill v. Bradley, 21 Minn. 15; Kipp v. Cook, 46 Minn. 535; Tullis v. Braulley, 3 Minn. 277 (Gil. 191). And we assume that the rule is the same in Wisconsin.

The appellants offered, in order to impeach and avoid the judgment, to prove that Rachel Ellis was compelled to bring the action by the defendant's course of conduct towards her, which consisted in endeavoring to persuade her to bring the action; that during the period of two years he abandoned her at different times, at first for a week at a time, gradually lengthening the periods of absence until they became three months at a time, leaving her unprovided with the necessities of life, and threatening, whenever he returned, that he would continue that course of conduct unless she consented to bring the action, and that unless she so consented he would run away, and leave her without a penny; and also to prove other acts of his of a similar character, all of which had such effect upon nerves and health and mental condition that she was not a free agent, in which condition she brought the action; from all which it is claimed she brought it under duress. Whether at any time, and especially whether after she has received and enjoyed the fruits of the action, and has acquiesced for years, until the defendant has married again, and has died, and there is left solely the matter of distributing his property, a woman plaintiff could, because of such facts, obtain any relief in the same action, we will not undertake to say. Certainly it would be no ground for assailing the judgment in a collateral proceeding at any time. In the majority of actions for divorce by wives on the ground of desertion or of ill usage, the same claim of duress to bring the action might be made as in this case, and the stronger the grounds for divorce the stronger would be the ground to avoid the judgment whenever it might be convenient or profitable to do so. The court properly excluded the evidence.

The principal question in the case was presented by the appellants' offer to prove, and the ruling of the court excluding the evidence, that at the time of bringing the action in Wisconsin and of the divorce decree neither of the parties to it was a resident of that state, but that both were residents of this state. It is claimed for the evidence that, if admitted, it would have shown that the Wisconsin court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, to wit, the marital relation between the parties; that consequently the decree was void; Rachel remained the wife, and is now the widow, of Matthew; and that the marriage with Flora was void. The question thus raised is of great importance, and difficult to satisfactorily determine. It is an undisputable general proposition that the tribunals of a country have jurisdiction over a cause of divorce, wherever the offense may have occurred, if either of the parties have an actual, bona fide domicile within its territory. This necessarily results from the right of every nation or state to determine the status of its own domiciled citizens or subjects without interference of foreign tribunals in a matter with which they have no concern. But when in the court of a state an action for divorce is brought, and a decree of divorce rendered, the court is presumed to have determined the facts essential to its jurisdiction among them the residence of the parties. When, as between whom, and to what extent is such determination binding in the state in which the parties are in fact residents? The cases in which the question may arise may be divided into three classes: First, in proceedings between the state of the parties' actual residence and one of the parties; second, in proceedings between the parties in the state of their actual residence, where the divorce in the other state was procured on the application of one of them, the other not appearing in the action to procure it; third, in proceedings between the parties when both voluntarily appeared in the action in which the divorce was granted, and consented to the jurisdiction, or that the court might determine the facts on which the jurisdiction depended. In the second class of cases, since it was settled that a judgment of another state can be assailed on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the court to render it, the decisions have been practically uniform that the party who did not submit to the jurisdiction is not bound by the judgment. Of the decisions in cases coming under the first class we refer to four,—Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 26 Am. Rep. 321; Van Fossen v. State, 37 Ohio St. 817, 41 Am. Rep. 507; People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247, 12 Am. Rep. 260; and State v. Armington, 25 Minn. 29,—all cases between the state of actual residence and one of the parties. In the first of these the record of the judgment showed that neither of the parties was a resident of Utah, where it was rendered, so that the record impeached itself. It was, of course, held that the judgment was void. In each of the others it was held that, in order to show want of jurisdiction in the court rendering the judgment, it might be shown that neither of the parties resided within the state in which it was rendered, and, that being shown, it was void. In the opinion in each case language is used apparently sustaining the proposition that such would be the rule however the question of the validity of the judgment might arise. In People v. Dawell, Mr. Justice Cooley delivered the prevailing opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Christianity concurring, and Mr. Justice Campbell dissenting. It was enough for the purpose of that case to decide whether the judgment was valid as against the state of residence. Whether it was valid as between the parties was not before the court; and such was the case in Hood v. State, and State v. Armington. So far as the state of residence is concerned, it must be taken upon the authorities, and certainly in this state, upon the Armington Case, that it is not bound by a judgment divorcing two of its resident citizens, rendered by a court of another state. There are reasons why it should not be bound, however it may be between the parties which we will presently refer to.

It does not follow that the judgment is void in the third class of cases. A judgment operating on a res may be binding between the parties to the action without binding one not a party, but interested in the res. In an action for divorce the res upon which the judgment operates is the status of the parties. There are three parties interested in that,—the husband, the wife, and the state of their residence. This was in the mind of Mr. Justice Cooley in writing the opinion in the Dawell Case. He said: "But it is said if the parties appear in the case the question of jurisdiction is precluded. That might be so if the matter of divorce was one of private concern exclusively." "As the laws now are, there are three parties to every divorce proceeding,—the husband, the wife, and the state; the first two parties representing their respective interests as individuals; the state concerned to guard the morals of its citizens, by taking care that neither by collusion nor otherwise shall divorce be allowed under such circumstances as to reduce marriage to a mere temporary arrangement of conscience or passion." "Such being the case, suppose we admit that the parties may be bound by their voluntary appearance in the foreign jurisdiction. How does that affect the present case? How, and in what manner, did the Indiana court obtain jurisdiction of the third party entitled to be heard in this proceeding; that is to say, of the state of Michigan?" This line of reasoning was applied by the same court in Waldo v. Waldo, 52 Mich. 94. One question in that case was whether the plaintiff was the widow of Jerome B. Waldo, just as in this it is whether Flora Ellis is the widow of Matthew. Previous to her marriage to Jerome B. she had been married to one Carey, from whom she had obtained a divorce in Indiana, both parties appearing in the action for it. The court held the judgment could not be assailed by showing want of residence in Indiana and residence in Michigan, saying in one part of the opinion: "This state has never complained of that judgment, and neither party has objected to it." The Davell Case was not referred to, and we may from both cases take the rule in that state to be that, while the state cannot be bound by its resident citizens appearing in and consenting to the jurisdiction of a court in another state in an action for divorce, the parties may so bind themselves in respect to their individual interests. In Kinnier v. Kinnier, 45 N. Y. 535, 6 Am. Rep. 132, a private action, it was held that a judgment of divorce by the court of another state, both parties appearing in the action, could not be assailed on the question of residence. In the course of the opinion the court, Church, Ch. J., said: "Nor can I assent to the reason given for allowing the husband to repudiate the binding force of the judgment upon him, after voluntarily submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and litigating the case upon its merits;" thus recognizing the effect of the voluntary submission upon the parties' right to question the judgment. Cases in Massachusetts, to which we are cited by appellants, are hardly of authority on the point, because the decisions were based mainly on a statute of that state. Ellis v.

White, 61 Iowa, 644, has only bearing on one phase of this case. It was there held that a plaintiff in an action for divorce and alimony cannot question the jurisdiction of the court after accepting the benefits of the judgment.

It may seem anomalous that a judgment of divorce can be so far effectual between the parties as to extinguish all rights of property dependent on the marriage relation, without being effectual to protect them from accountability to the state for their subsequent acts. One reason why they ought not to be permitted, by going into another state and procuring a divorce, to escape accountability to the laws of their state, is that their act is a fraud upon the state, and an attempt to evade its laws, to which it in no wise consents, and it may therefore complain. But the parties do consent, and why should they be heard to complain of the consequences to them of what they have done? Why should they be permitted to escape those consequences by saying: "It is true that by a false oath made by one of us, and connived at by the other, we committed a fraud in the Wisconsin court, and induced it to take cognizance of the case; but now we ask to avoid its judgment by proof of our fraud and perjury or subornation of perjury." Because we do not think it can be done the parties must, so far as their individual interests are concerned, abide by the judgment they procured that court to render; and, of course, what will bind them will bind those who claim through them, or either of them, which is the case with the appellants other than Rachel. There were other minor questions raised by the assignments of error, but we do not see any merit in any of them.

Order affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Alexander SHAW, Appt.,

v.

Henry G. DAVIS et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. A minority stockholder cannot invoke the jurisdiction of equity for himself and those who may subsequently join him to prevent the majority of stockholders from making a contract which is neither ultra vires, fraudulent, nor illegal.
2. The fact that the same persons constitute the majority stockholders in each of two companies does not enlarge the jurisdiction of equity to interfere with the management of one of those corporations in its relation with the other at the suit of a minority stockholder.

3. An injunction against the leasing by a railroad company of another railroad without the court's leave is in excess of the power of the court, as the court cannot prescribe the terms of such a lease, and can, at the most, prevent only such a lease as is illegal, ultra vires, or fraudulent.

(January 11, 1894.)

NOTE.—Most cases in which the right of a minority stockholder to sue arises are those which involve fraud, illegality, or ultra vires acts, and which do not involve the distinct question of the right of the majority to control the management of the corporation.

The limits of equitable jurisdiction as to interference with such management at suit of minority stockholders are very clearly shown in the above case in accordance, as we believe with the established authorities on the subject.

As illustrating different sides of the question as to the power of equity to protect minority stockholders by ordering an accounting and dissolution though involving different facts, see Miner v. Belle Isle Ice Co. (Mich.) 17 L. R. A. 412, and Wheeler v. Pullman Iron & Steel Co. (Ill.) 17 L. R. A. 812.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City dissolving a temporary injunction and dismissing the bill in a suit brought to compel an accounting of transactions between two railroad companies, and to enjoin the perfection of a lease by one company to the other of its road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Marshall, John L. Thomas, and W. Irvine Cross for appellant.

Messrs. W. Pinkney Whyte, Bernard Carter, and Frank Wood for appellees.

McSherry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have given most patient and laborious study to the voluminous record now before us, as well as to the full and exhaustive briefs filed by the distinguished counsel who so ably argued the cause; and, after mature deliberation, we now proceed to state as concisely as possible the reasons upon which the conclusions we have reached are founded. The West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company was incorporated by the legislature of West Virginia with an authorized capital stock of 60,000 shares of the par value of $100 per share. Of these shares, when the pending bill of complaint was filed, 5,000 were held in trust for the company's treasury; 7,200 were owned by the appellant, Alexander Shaw; 2,600 by other members of his family; 30,194 by Henry G. Davis, Thomas R. Davis, and Stephen B. Elkins, and their families; and the residue by Thomas F. Bayard, James G. Blaine, William Windom, William Keyser, and quite a number of other persons. The road extends from West Virginia Junction, near Piedmont, on the line of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, in a southerly direction to Davis, in West Virginia, a distance of some fifty-eight miles. The company owns large tracts of coal and timber land, and is chiefly a coal and lumber carrying road. Its sole outlet was, originally, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at West Virginia Junction. Not long after it began operations, it encountered serious difficulties with the Baltimore & Ohio, and, as described by Mr. William Keyser, it soon became apparent that the business of the West Virginia Central was largely diminished, and that it was greatly embarrassed by the lack of harmonious relations. In fact, the West Virginia Central property became almost sidetracked by the lack of facilities, the want of a cordial understanding, and its consequent inability to make contracts which it would be able to fulfill; and at last the necessity was forced upon this road to get another outlet, or accept the situation of being entirely bottled up. As a result of this condition, the Piedmont & Cumberland Railway Company was organized and incorporated, with a capital stock of 13,000 shares, for the construction of a road, parallel to the Baltimore & Ohio, from Piedmont to Cumberland. Of the capital stock Henry G. Davis, H. G. Davis & Bro., and Stephen B. Elkins hold 7,295 shares, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company holds 4,000 shares, and the residue is held in smaller lots by other persons,—Mr. Shaw owning none of it. On May 21, 1886, a tripartite agreement was entered into between the West Virginia Central, the Piedmont & Cumberland, and the Pennsylvania Railroad Companies, whereby the latter agreed to set apart 5 per cent of its receipts from traffic coming to its road from the West Virginia Central and going from its road to the latter, as a fund to guarantee the payment of the interest on the bonds of the Piedmont & Cumberland road, which were to be issued to the extent of $650,000, that the money might be thereby raised for the construction of the new road. The West Virginia Central agreed to deliver to the Piedmont & Cumberland all traffic it could control, and the Piedmont & Cumberland agreed to deliver to the Pennsylvania Railroad one half of all traffic hauled by it to Cumberland; and this agreement was ratified by the stockholders of the West Virginia Central, at a meeting in January, 1887, by a vote of 37,395 shares. With the money raised by the negotiations of these bonds, and by a call of a small installment of the stock subscribed, the Piedmont & Cumberland Railroad was built. When finished, in August, 1887, it was operated by the West Virginia Central under a verbal agreement for 60 per cent of the gross earnings. Subsequently, and as will be stated more at large later on, the stockholders of the West Virginia Central appointed a committee to consider, and report at an adjourned meeting to be held on March 15, 1890, a permanent lease of the Piedmont & Cumberland road. On the 14th of March the appellant, Alexander Shaw, as a minority stockholder of the West Virginia Central, in behalf of himself and of other stockholders who might come in and be made parties, filed the bill of complaint which inaugurated the pending litigation. The averments of the bill relate to two distinct and disconnected subjects. From paragraph 1 to and including paragraph 7 the bill is confined to a statement of transactions between the West Virginia Central, on the one side, and Henry G. Davis, Thomas B. Davis, and Stephen B. Elkins, on the other, and these are introduced, apparently, for the purpose of showing the mode in which these majority stockholders dealt with the company in matters pertaining, not to this proceeding, but to something totally different. The remaining paragraphs of the bill have reference to transactions between the West Virginia Central and the Piedmont & Cumberland, and to the dealings of Henry G. Davis, Thomas B. Davis, and Stephen B. Elkins, as officers and directors of these corporations, with the corporations themselves, and they may be briefly stated as follows: That Messrs. Davis and Elkins, having subscribed for a majority of the stock of the Piedmont & Cumberland road, gave value to their shares by the following process: (1) With a view of constructing a road that could be cheaply built, they selected a location so low in the valley as to expose the road to heavy and destructive damages in times of floods in the Potomac; that the road was in other respects defectively constructed, and that it is ruinously expensive to operate; that it was designedly so constructed, with a view of having it operated by the West Virginia Central, and of throwing upon the latter company the heavy cost of operating it. (2) Before the Piedmont & Cumberland road was in a condition for the transportation of freight or passengers, the Messrs. Davis and Elkins used their official power in the West Virginia Central to make the latter company complete the construction of the Piedmont & Cumberland road, and, without authority from the stockholders of the West Virginia Central, they,—the Messrs. Davis and Elkins,—as officials of the two companies, made an arrangement by which the West Virginia Central Company began the operation of the Piedmont & Cumberland road in its incomplete condition, whereby the West Virginia Central was made to pay, not only the ordinary cost of operation, but to complete the Piedmont & Cumberland road, and to put upon it betterments and improvements for the benefit of themselves as the principal stockholders therein. (3) While the Piedmont & Cumberland road was still a most precarious property, and sure to entail immense expense in its operation, the Messrs. Davis and Elkins determined, at the annual meeting in January, 1890, to risk the attempt to make the stockholders of the West Virginia Central ratify a permanent lease of the Piedmont & Cumberland road, which had been prepared and presented to the meeting; and that the lease was most disadvantageous to the West Virginia Central, and most advantageous to the Piedmont & Cumberland Company; and that the rate of earnings proposed in said lease as a compensation to the West Virginia Central was inadequate, and would be a fraud on the stockholders of that company. (4) When the lease was proposed to the stockholders, the plaintiff made a violent protest against any lease being executed until the account between the two companies should be first adjusted, without which adjustment the earning capacity of the Piedmont & Cumberland road, the expense incident to maintaining it, or a fair rate of rental could not be ascertained; that the confused state of the accounts kept by the West Virginia Central renders any accurate statement impossible, and it would be a fraud on the stockholders of the West Virginia Central to have any lease made before a full settlement of these accounts between the two companies; that Messrs. Davis and Elkins consented to adjourn the stockholders' meeting until March 15, 1890, and that it is their design at that meeting to use the power which they have as the holders of the majority of the stock of the West Virginia Central to compel the ratification and acceptance of the lease, which they, as officers of the West Virginia Central, have agreed upon with themselves, as officers of the Piedmont & Cumberland Company. The prayers for relief are—First, for a discovery of the ownership of the stock of the Piedmont & Cumberland Railway; second, for a discovery of the holdings of the stock of the Piedmont & Cumberland Company by the West Virginia Central Company, and the moneys spent by the latter company on the road of the first-named company; third, for an account as to how much money is due to the West Virginia Central by the Piedmont & Cumberland Company for advances made by the West Virginia Central on any account, and particularly, on account of the completion of the Piedmont & Cumberland, which was paid by the West Virginia Central out of the 60 per cent operating expenses received under the verbal lease, and which ought to have been charged to the Piedmont & Cumberland and paid out of the 40 per cent of the gross earnings received by it; and, fourth, for an injunction to restrain the execution of the proposed lease, or any other lease, until the court can ascertain what would be a proper apportionment of the earnings between the leased road and the operating road, and what, in a word, ought to be the terms, conditions, and covenants of such a lease. An injunction as prayed was granted on March 14, 1890, and on April 24 the defendants answered, denying the material allegations of the bill, and moved for a dissolution of the injunction. A general replication was filed, and a large mass of evidence, covering nearly a thousand printed pages, was taken. At the hearing the circuit court of Baltimore city on March 23, 1893, dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill. From that decree this appeal was taken.

It will be observed at the threshold that the relief prayed for has no relation whatever to the first seven paragraphs of the bill, and whether the averments contained therein be true or be false is purely a speculative question under the present structure of the bill of complaint. If those averments had been conceded by the answer to be true, relating as they do exclusively to alleged transactions between Messrs. Davis and Elkins and the West Virginia Central Company, it is not perceived how they could influence or affect, one way or the other, totally different transactions, in no way connected with or dependent on them. No relief is sought as to anything averred in these seven paragraphs. The case, then, before us is that of a minority stockholder filing a bill in his own behalf, and in behalf of others who may subsequently join him, to restrain by injunction the majority stockholders of one railroad company from leasing, except with the leave of a court of equity, and upon the terms which it may prescribe, the road of another railway company, in which latter company the majority stockholders are the same persons who are the majority stockholders in the proposed lessee company; and also praying for an account between the two companies of antecedent financial transactions. Naturally, the inquiries which such a case suggests at the very outset are—First, what jurisdiction has a court of equity to control the internal management of a corporation at the instance of a minority stockholder? and, secondly, in what manner does the circumstance that the majority of the stock is held by the same persons in both the companies, affect the question of jurisdiction? And, first, it may be stated, as the result of all the authorities, that whenever any action of either directors or stockholders is relied on in a suit by a minority stockholder for the purpose of invoking the interposition of a court of equity, if the act complained of be neither ultra vires, fraudulent, nor illegal, the court will refuse its intervention because powerless to grant it, and will leave all such matters to be disposed of by the majority of the stockholders in such manner as their interests may dictate, and their action will be binding on all, whether approved of by the minority or not. "In this country," said the late Mr. Justice Miller, in speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827, "the cases outside the federal courts are not numerous, and, while they admit the right of a stockholder to sue in cases where the corporation is the proper party to bring the suit, they limit this right to cases where the directors are guilty of a fraud, or a breach of trust or are proceeding ultra vires." And so, in MacDougall v. Gardiner, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 14, James, L. J., said: "I think it is of the utmost importance in all these companies that the rule, which is well known in this court as the rule in Moeley v. Alston, 1 Phil. Ch. 790, and Lord v. Governor & Co. of Copper Miners, 2 Phil. Ch. 740, and Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461, should be always adhered to; that is to say, that nothing connected with internal disputes between the shareholders is to be made the subject of a bill by some one shareholder in behalf of himself, and others, unless there be something illegal, oppressive, or fraudulent,—unless there is something ultra vires on the part of the company, qua company, or on the part of the majority of the company, so that they are not fit persons to determine it; but that every litigation must be in the name of the company, if the company really desire it. Because there may be a great many wrongs committed in a company, there may be claims against directors, there may be claims against officers, there may be claims against debtors, there may be a great variety of things which a company may be well entitled to complain of, but which, as a matter of good sense, they do not think it right to make a subject of litigation; and it is the company as a company which will make anything that is wrong to the company the subject of litigation, or whether it will take steps to prevent the wrong being done. . . . Everything in this bill, so far as I can see, if it is a wrong, is a wrong to the company. Whether it ought to have been done, or ought not to have been done, depends on whether it is for the good of the company it should have been done, or for the good of the company it should not have been done; and, putting aside all illegality on the part of the majority, it is for the company to determine whether it is for the good of the company that the things should be done, or should not be done, or left unnoticed." In the same case Mellish, L. J., after observing that very often, in companies, things are done which ought not to be done, proceeds: "Now, if that gives a right to every member of the company to file a bill to have the question decided, then, if there happens to be a cantankerous member, or one member who loves litigation, everything of this kind will be litigated; whereas, if the bill must be filed in the name of the company, then, unless there is a majority who really wish for litigation, it will not go on. In my opinion, if the thing complained of is a thing which, in substance, the majority are entitled to do, or if something has been done irregularly which the majority of the company are entitled to do regularly, or if something has been done illegally which the majority has the right to do legally, there can be no use in having litigation about it, the ultimate end of which is only that a meeting has to be called, and then, ultimately, the majority gets its wishes. Is it not better that the rule shall be adhered to that, if it is a thing which the majority are the masters of, the majority, in substance, shall be entitled to have their will followed? If it is a thing of that nature, it only comes to this, that the majority are the only persons who can complain that a thing which they are entitled to do has been done irregularly; and this is what as I understand, was decided by the cases of Moeley v. Alston and Foss v. Harbottle. In my opinion this is the rule to be maintained." See also Gray v. Lewis, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1050.

Secondly. The fact that the same persons hold the majority of the stock in both companies does not, of itself, enlarge the court's jurisdiction. The act complained of furnishes the test of jurisdiction, and it must be ultra vires, fraudulent, or illegal. Nothing short of this will suffice. This is true even in a case where directors, and not stockholders, do the act complained of. Booth v. Robinson, 55 Md. 441. And for stronger and more obvious reasons it is also true in a case where stockholders themselves act directly. They are not trustees or quasi trustees for each other. Even a director is not, strictly speaking, a trustee. Spring's App. 71 Pa. 11, 10 Am. Rep. 684; Smith v. Anderson, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 247. In Pender v. Lushington, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 70, Jessel, M. R., in speaking of the rights of a stockholder, said: "I cannot deprive him of his property, though he may not make use of the property in the way I approve. This is really the question, because, if these stockholders have a right of property, then I think all the arguments which have been addressed to me as to the motives which induced them to exercise it, are entirely beside the question." Then, after referring to a decision by Mellish, the master of the rolls proceeded: "In other words, he [Mellish, J.] admits a man may be actuated, in giving his vote as stockholder, by interests adverse to the interests of the company as a whole. He may think it was for his particular interest that a certain course may be taken which may be, in the opinion of others, adverse to the interests of the company as a whole; but he cannot be restrained from giving his vote in what way he pleases, because he is influenced by that motive. There is, if I may so say, no obligation on a shareholder of a company to give his vote merely with a view to what other persons may consider the interests of the company at large. He has a right, if he thinks fit, to give his vote from motives or promptings of what he considers his own individual interests. This being so, the arguments which have been addressed to me, as to whether or not the votes which were given would bring about the ruin of the company, or whether or not the motive was an improper one which induced these gentlemen to give their votes, or whether or not their conduct shows a want of appreciation of the principles on which this company was founded, appear to me to be wholly immaterial." And, in Manhattan Elec. R. Co's Case, 11 Daly, 516, the court says: "It is argued that, if common directors are disqualified from acting, so are common stockholders incapable to ratify agreements between their companies, and that the holder of one share of stock in each company could prevent any action at a stockholders' meeting relating to the two companies, no matter how advisable that action might seem to the holder of every other share. I do not say that the disqualification extends to a shareholder. I see no reason why it should. The disqualification rests entirely on the fiduciary relation. A shareholder is trustee for nobody. He has only his own interests to look after as such stockholder. Closely connected, undoubtedly, he is in practice with every other stockholder, but he holds no such fiduciary relation to the corporation as stockholder as he holds as director." Beach, Corp. chap. 18, § 247.

Accepting these propositions as the fixed and settled law, it remains now to inquire whether the proof sustains the allegations of the bill, and brings the case within the legal principles to which reference has just been made. If the Messrs. Davis and Mr. Elkins selected, as alleged, an improper location for the Piedmont & Cumberland road, and improperly constructed that road, so that it would be ruinous to operate it, and if they did this with a view to throwing the heavy cost of operating it on the West Virginia Central, it is difficult to assign a reason for such singular conduct. On its face the allegation is, to say the least, improbable. Those gentlemen owned over 30,000 shares of the 55,000 issued shares of the West Virginia Central Company, while they owned but 7,295 shares of the Piedmont & Cumberland road; and that they would purposely and designedly wreck their larger and more valuable holdings in the West Virginia Central merely for the purpose of realizing an income from a smaller and dependent road, in which their aggregate shares were not one fourth of the amount owned by them in the main enterprise, is quite incomprehensible. Certainly, no motive for such a strange course has been shown. But, apart from the improbable character of the allegation, it is not supported by the evidence. The Piedmont & Cumberland road was located by an experienced and competent engineer, who was the chief assistant of the late J. N. Du Barry, at that time second vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. He made a careful examination of the route of the proposed road, and selected, according to his testimony, the most suitable location that was available. He submitted his surveys and profiles to the engineering department of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and even laid them before Mr. George B. Roberts, the president of that company, and an engineer of high reputation, and they were fully approved by both. He testified that the grades were arranged as high as was deemed necessary to keep beyond the reach of extreme high water, and that, taking into consideration its location, alignments, its grades, and the mode in which it was built, the road, for economical operation, was equal to that of the Baltimore & Ohio. Besides this, it was proved by Mr. Charles H. Latrobe, an accomplished engineer in no way connected with or interested in this litigation, that he had made an examination of the Piedmont & Cumberland road, that its general alignment was good, that it had a very considerable proportion of long tangents, and not more than the usual amount of curvature, which might be reduced at very moderate expense, and that it was superior in this respect to the West Virginia Central, because rectifications of the line could be more readily made. As opposed to this, the record contains the testimony of Mr. Wrenshaw, also an engineer, criticising the location and construction of the road. Though there is this difference of opinion between these engineers, and though, too, a freshet did some small amount of injury to the road in 1888, and an unprecedented flood in 1889 caused considerable damage to it, that might not have happened had the road been built higher above the Potomac river, still, we are not authorized to decide whether, in point of fact, the best location was selected that might have been selected, but only to determine from the evidence whether the location, as made, was made in good faith, or, on the contrary, with the fraudulent design imputed in the bill. We not only see nothing in the record to support this allegation of fraud, but, on the other hand, we are quite fully satisfied, after carefully considering the evidence, that the Piedmont & Cumberland Railway was projected, located, and constructed in entire good faith, with a view of furnishing a necessary outlet for the traffic of the West Virginia Central road, whereby the property of the latter company would be made valuable to its owners.

Now, as to the charge that, before the Piedmont & Cumberland road was in a fit condition for the transportation of freight and passengers, Messrs. Davis and Elkins used their powers as officers of the West Virginia Central to make that company complete the Piedmont & Cumberland, and that, without authority from the stockholders, but by virtue of their control over the West Virginia Central as majority stockholders, and in their capacity as officers of the two companies, they made an agreement under which the West Virginia Central undertook to operate the Piedmont & Cumberland upon such terms as would benefit themselves as stockholders of the Piedmont & Cumberland, and would permanently better and improve the latter road, to the detriment of the stockhold ers of the former road. There is no foundation in the evidence to support this accusation. The West Virginia Central began to operate the Piedmont & Cumberland in August, 1887; and while the road was then, as is necessarily the case, to a greater or less extent, with all newly built railroads, less complete than it was made afterwards, yet, so far from its being unfit for the transportation of freight, it is in testimony by the superintendent that from that day up to the time he was examined as a witness there never had been a car derailed, or, as he states it, there never had been a wheel off the track. He further testified that the road was well ballasted with stone, except in a few bottoms, where sand ballast was used, and that, when turned over to the West Virginia Central to be operated, it was superior to the condition of the Parkersburg Branch of the Baltimore & Ohio when it was turned over to the latter company. Going no farther back than January, 1887, we find that Mr. Davis and the directors, among whom was the plaintiff, Mr. Shaw, stated, in the annual report to the stockholders of the West Virginia Central Company, that it would probably be found to the interest of the West Virginia Central to operate the Piedmont & Cumberland road, which was not then completed; and accordingly, at the meeting of the new board of directors, convened the next month, a resolution was adopted conferring upon the president, Mr. Henry G. Davis, full authority, with the advice and assistance of the company's counsel, the Honorable William Pinkney Whyte, to make such an agreement for the operation of the Piedmont Cumberland road by the West Virginia Central, as he might deem best, in the interest of the West Virginia Central, and directing him to report the result to the next stockholders' meeting. In January, 1888, Mr. Davis reported to the stockholders of the West Virginia Central, at their annual meeting, that no permanent arrangement had been made for the lease of the Piedmont & Cumberland road, but that the latter road was then being operated by the West Virginia Central for 60 per cent of the gross earnings of the new road. And this statement was repeated in the annual report made to the stockholders of the West Virginia Central in January, 1889. These reports of 1887, 1888, and 1889 were all unanimously adopted and approved by the stockholders of the West Virginia Central. This temporary arrangement, under which the West Virginia Central operated the Piedmont & Cumberland road up to the time of the filing of the bill, was therefore not made merely by the officers of the two companies, but its terms were known to, and fully and explicitly ratified and approved by, all the stockholders of the West Virginia Central who were present or represented at the annual meetings of 1887, 1888, and 1889, without dissent. At the annual meeting of the stockholders of the same company in 1890, where 54,268 shares out of the 55,000 issued shares were represented in person or by proxy, a resolution was offered by one of the stockholders proposing to lease the Piedmont & Cumberland road, the lessee to pay all the costs and expenses of operating the road and to receive 60 per cent of the gross revenues, and accompanying the resolution was a draft of the proposed lease. A substitute was moved to the effect that the proposed lease be referred to the board of directors for examination, with a view that it might be determined whether its provisions would "promote and protect the interests of the company." Thereupon Governor Whyte proposed the following amendment, which was adopted without any dissenting vote, so far as the minutes disclose, though Mr. Shaw was present in person, viz.: "Resolved, that the lease proposed be referred to a committee of three stockholders, to report as to the propriety of its acceptance, to an adjourned meeting of the stockholders, and when this meeting adjourns, it shall be adjourned to the 15th day of March, 1890, at 12 M., at this place, when this subject shall be considered." On the 15th of March, when the meeting of stockholders reconvened, the committee appointed under Governor Whyte's resolution reported the form of a lease which they had prepared, varying somewhat the terms of the one proposed at the meeting in January, and recommended that the percentage of gross earnings to be paid to the West Virginia Central by the Piedmont & Cumberland should be 63 per cent instead of 60 per cent; but no action was taken by the stockholders, because the injunction applied for and issued the day previous was served before the meeting assembled. These facts demonstrably show the errors of the averment which charged that the Messrs. Davis and Elkins designed to use the power which they held as owners of a majority of the West Virginia Central's stock to compel the ratification and acceptance of a lease which they, as officers of the West Virginia Central, had agreed on with themselves, as officers of the Piedmont & Cumberland road.

We come now to the averment that large sums of money, expended on account of construction of the Piedmont & Cumberland road after August 1, 1887, were improperly charged to the West Virginia Central, and improperly paid by it out of the 60 per cent of gross earnings received by it for operating the Piedmont & Cumberland road, while they should have been charged to the Piedmont & Cumberland, and should have been paid out of its 40 per cent of those earnings. The total aggregate of these alleged erroneous charges, as calculated by Maj. Buckley, an expert accountant produced by the plaintiff, is the sum of $82,248, and without pausing to examine the lengthy statement item by item, we will assume that the aggregate amount was improvidently charged to the West Virginia Central, and that upon a strictly technical system of accounting the whole of this should have been paid by the Piedmont & Cumberland company; but still the material question recurs, Was the charge of this sum to the West Virginia Central, as made, made merely in error, or in bad faith, or fraudulently? If made in good faith, though inaccurately made, a court of equity has no jurisdiction, at the suit of a stockholder, to readjust the account. Under such conditions, the company injuriously affected must itself seek the appropriate redress. Courts cannot intervene, in the absence of fraud or illegality, or where the act is not ultra vires, to control, manage, or regulate corporate business. The question of ultra vires has nothing to do with this branch of the case. The leasing of the one road by the other was perfectly lawful, and a mere dispute as to the method of keeping certain of the accounts between them could not raise an issue of ultra vires, especially when there is no unvarying, fixed, or unbending system controlling the classification of items in such an account as this. But the evidence signally fails to show any fraud whatever in this transaction. It is often a debatable matter whether particular items ought to be charged to operating expenses or to construction account. Different accountants may honestly disagree as to which of the two accounts a given item should be charged. Necessarily, then, some officer of the lessee company must, in the first instance, decide the question. If he decides wrongly, it does not follow that he has decided wrongfully or fraudulently. This is made perfectly clear by Mr. Keyser in his intelligent testimony, from which we now quote briefly: "Taking the two accounts together and looking at them from all the light that I can get, I should say the president of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company had dealt liberally by the Piedmont & Cumberland road in his method of charging these accounts. If the system of an accountant was to be adopted, and every item charged upon the strict basis of a construction account, I think the carrying out of that principle would eliminate a large amount of these charges against the Piedmont & Cumberland road growing out of the flood. In other words, I cannot see how the president could be tied down to any strictly defined method of accounting that would enable him to accept, on the one side, Mr. Bulkley's accounts, and, on the other side, justify him in his method of charging the Piedmont & Cumberland road with these large items of practical repairs,—because that is what they were,—growing out of an unusual and disastrous flood. . . . I think the discretion in a case of this kind should be placed in the hands of the president, in the absence of anything which binds it down by any definite rule, as adopted by the two companies. . . . I think, in this case, and I speak now as a stockholder in the West Virginia Central road, that, looking at these accounts, and looking at the lease as I did when I was on the committee, and in the absence of anything in the way of a definite, clear provision for this business between the two companies, that the matter of stating the accounts has been a fair one on the part of the president, and if I were to criticise it at all, I should say he leaned against the interests of the Piedmont & Cumberland Railroad in charging rather too much." But there is still another view of the subject. While President Davis charged up this sum of $82,248 to the West Virginia Central, he charged to the Piedmont & Cumberland a much larger sum for other and different expenses, which ought to have been paid by the West Virginia Central; and, therefore, whatever error he made in the first instance was more than counterbalanced by the subsequent error against the Piedmont & Cumberland road. There is one other account alluded to, which may be disposed of in a very few words. There is an allegation that there is money due by the Piedmont & Cumberland for advances made to it by the West Virginia Central for original construction, and growing out of other dealings since. The evidence, however, shows that it is the West Virginia Central which is indebted to the Piedmont & Cumberland.

What we have said in considering the subjects just discussed applies equally to so much of the prayer of the bill as relates to the relief sought by way of account; and, without repetition, we need only add that the plaintiff has failed to support by evidence the averments upon which the jurisdiction to grant that particular relief depends. There is no pretense that the two companies had not the necessary powers, under their charters and under the laws, to enter into the business relations out of which these questions of account arose. The transactions themselves were not illegal, and, however erroneous the accounts may be conceded to be, when considered from the standpoint of a professional accountant, there has been literally nothing adduced to show that the alleged errors were fraudulently or designedly committed, with a view of benefiting the stockholders of the Piedmont & Cumberland Company at the expense of the stockholders of the West Virginia Central Company. Nor does the making of a lease by the Piedmont & Cumberland road to the West Virginia Central Company necessarily depend upon the state of antecedent accounts between the two companies. Whatever unadjusted or erroneously adjusted accounts there may be can as readily be balanced and settled after, as before, a lease has been executed. And if the proposed lease be not ultra vires or unlawful or fraudulent, no court, at the instance of a minority stockholder, or at the instance of any one else, has the power or the right to restrain the majority from dealing with the property as they may deem most advantageous to their own interests. Any other doctrine would put it in the power of a single stockholder, owning but one share out of many hundreds, to transfer the entire management of a corporation to a court of equity, and would effectually destroy the right of the owners of the property to lawfully control it themselves. It would make a court of equity practically the guardian, so to speak, of such a corporation, and would substitute the chancellor's belief as to what contracts a corporation ought, as a matter of expediency, or policy, or business venture, to make, instead of allowing such questions to be settled by the persons beneficially interested in the property. No such arbitrary or dangerous power has ever been claimed by any court, and, if laid claim to, it would never be tolerated in a free government. The injunction granted on March 14, 1890, prohibited the making of a lease upon the terms of 60 per cent of the gross earnings, or any other lease, until the further order of the court. Apart from all questions of ultra vires, illegality, and fraud, this power, thus assumed, undertook to reserve to the court the authority to prescribe the terms of any lease, because it prohibited the making of any lease without the court's leave. When the terms are not agreed to, the conditions not named, and the covenants not formulated, what authority exists in the chancellor to assume in advance that an act ultra vires, or that fraud or illegality, will be attempted? In the case at bar the lease which was actually prepared under the circumstances we have already stated at large—which are a flat negation of any fraud or secrecy—made no provision for a 60 per cent, but for a 63 per cent, proportion of the gross earnings, and there is nothing to show, even if we had the right to go into an examination of the subject, that such a proportion of the gross earnings would be an unfair or inadequate rental. As the court had no power to decree a lease, so it had no power to prescribe the terms of one. It could prohibit the doing of an act ultra vires, illegal, or fraudulent. Beyond that it could not go. As no such act was before it, it did right in dissolving the injunction, and in dismissing the bill. For the reasons we have given we will affirm the decree appealed from.

Decree affirmed, with costs above and below.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

City of ATLANTA, Piff. in Err.,
v.

Mary J. WARNOCK.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. The municipal government of Atlanta, though invested by statute with plenary powers over the subject of streets, sewers, drainage, water supply and sanitation, has no right to create and permanently maintain a nuisance dangerous to health and life, which nuisance consists of openings, called "manholes," in a sewer located in a public street contiguous to the dwelling of a citizen, the manholes being allowed to emit poisonous gases in large quantities through perforated covers placed over them.

NOTE.—Injunction against a nuisance maintained by a municipal corporation.

Drainage generally.

Ordinarily, a city will be enjoined from using or constructing a sewer or drain so as to create a nuisance by causing a deposit of filth or noisome smells adjacent to private property. Vick v. Rochester, 46 Hun. 607; Pettigrew v. Evansville, 25 Wis. 223, 3 Am. Rep. 50; Stoddard v. Saratoga Springs, 127 N. Y. 261; Beach v. Elmira, 23 Hun. 153; Dierks v. Addison Twp. Highway Comrs. 142 Ill. 197; Butler v. Thomasville, 74 Ga. 570; Danbury & N. R. Co. v. Norwalk, 37 Conn. 109, approved, Mootry v. Danbury, 45 Conn. 550, 20 Am. Rep. 703; Flouer v. Local Board of Low Leyton, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 347, 46 L. J. Ch. 621, 36 L. T. N. S. 780, 25 Week. Rep. 545.

An injunction will be granted against a city discharging sewage on lands of an adjacent town under provision of the statute authorizing a board of health to restrain by injunction such nuisance. Gould v. Rochester, 105 N. Y. 48, reversing 39 Hun. 79.

And a license for discharge of sewage from a particular district will not authorize the discharge of sewage from a larger one. New York Central & H. R. R. Co. v. Rochester, 127 N. Y. 591.

The foregoing cases support the doctrine in the main case.

But in the case of Atty-Gen. v. Clerkenwell [1891] 3 Ch. 627, 60 L. J. Ch. 738, 65 L. T. N. S. 812, an injunction was refused to restrain the discharge of sewage from one district into another, where the first district had authorized private connections with the sewer, the remedy being a private suit against the inhabitants.

And equity will not restrain the construction of a sewer if there is adequate remedy at law. Iron Works v. Borough, 3 Lanc. L. Rev. 107; Clapp v. Spokane, 58 Fed. Rep. 515.

And an injunction will not be granted where the evil anticipated was uncertain and contingent, and 23 L. R. A.

could not arise for several years. Morgan v. Binghamton, 103 N. Y. 500.

Where the main sewer has been used for twenty-four years, a sanitary authority which did not construct sewers which are a nuisance but only permitted them to be used as formerly, cannot be restrained by injunction under the Public Health Act or the River Pollution Act of 1876. Atty-Gen. v. Guardians of Poor of Dorking Union, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 595-609, 51 L. J. Ch. 685, 46 L. T. N. S. 573, 30 Week. Rep. 579.

Drainage into watercourses.

A city will be enjoined from discharging sewage into a stream, polluting the water and causing a large deposit of filth. Goldsmid v. Tunbridge Wells Imp. Comrs. L. R. 1 Ch. 349, 36 L. J. Ch. 632, 12 Jur. N. S. 308, 14 L. T. N. S. 154, 14 Week. Rep. 562; Woodward v. Worcester, 121 Mass. 245; Spokes v. Banbury Board of Health, L. R. 1 Eq. 42; Demby v. Kingston, 60 Hun. 294; O'Brien v. St. Paul, 13 Minn. 176; Holt v. Rochdale, L. R. 10 Eq. 354, 39 L. J. Ch. 781, 23 L. T. N. S. 43, 18 Week. Rep. 885; Bell v. Rochester, 33 N. Y. S. R. 730; Hardinge v. Southborough Local Board, 33 L. T. N. S. 250.

Or into a pond. Schrifer v. Johnstown, 71 Hun. 232.

Under Indiana Acts 1867, p. 63, providing that a change in the grade of a street shall not be made before damages are tendered, a city will be enjoined from changing a highway so as to cause the drainage to ruin the water for a raceway of an hydraulic mill outside the city, where damages have not been tendered. Columbus v. Hydraulic Woollen Mills Co. 33 Ind. 435.

And 18 & 19 Vict., chap. 20, authorizing a sewer to be carried under a highway, does not grant power to convey into a river. Atty-Gen. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1 Hem. & M. 298, 9 L. T. N. S. 139, 11 Week. Rep. 820.

An injunction was granted to prevent a city from discharging its sewage into a private river,

This is true, at least, where the dangerous character of the nuisance results, in all probability, not from defects inherent in the general system, but from defective execution of the system, in failing to adapt it to local conditions, such as steep grade in the particular street in which the unwholesome sewer is constructed and maintained.

2. There was no abuse of discretion in granting the temporary injunction, enjoining the city "from continuing said manhole in such condition as to allow the escape of noxious gases." In the light of the pleadings and the evidence, the terms of the order were sufficiently definite and specific.

(November 9, 1892.)

ERROR to the Superior Court of Fulton County to review a judgment in favor of complainant in an action brought to enjoin the where the act under which it was constructed, provided that nothing in the act shall be construed to render lawful any act which is a nuisance at common law. Atty-Gen. v. Birmingham 4 Kay & J. 523.

But the decree was not binding upon a board created by act of parliament covering this and other districts. Atty-Gen. v. Birmingham Drainage Board, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 685, 50 L. J. Ch. 736, 44 L. T. N. S. 906, 29 Week. Rep. 739, 46 J. P. 36.

Where the surface flow of water has been concentrated into an artificial channel insufficient for the purpose, an injunction will not be granted against a city to prevent the enlargement of the channel so as to carry off the natural flow of water. Scranton's App. 121 Pa. 97, reversing Goulden v. Scranton, 3 Lanc. L. Rev. 940.

And an injunction in favor of an aqueduct board against a city, was denied on the ground that the apprehended pollution of the water from sewage had not yet taken place, and it was doubtful whether it would be deleterious to the city. As to whether or not the complainant could sue for pollution of water injurious to the city, was not decided. Newark Aqueduct Board v. Passaic, 46 N. J. Eq. 552, affirming 45 N. J. Eq. 393.

And it was held in the case of Glossop v. Heston & L. Local Board, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 102, 49 L. J. Ch. 89, 40 L. T. N. S. 736, 28 Week. Rep. 111, that where the local board had not caused a nuisance but neglected to provide a system of drainage, an injunction will not be granted a private person against the discharge of sewage in an abutting river, but the remedy is by mandamus.

And where the bill does not allege any negligence of the city either in the manner in which the sewage was discharged from the mouth of the sewer, or in omitting to take proper precautions to purify it, and the city is proceeding in a statutory manner, injunction will be denied. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. Worcester, 116 Mass. 453.

Or when the injury was too trifling. Atty-Gen. v. Gee, L. R. 10 Eq. 131, 23 L. T. N. S. 299.

And in the case of Blitz v. Borough, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 412, an injunction was refused against concentrating sewage into an insufficient culvert so as to injure the plaintiff by its overflow, as these matters belonged to the discretion of the borough, and no negligence was charged, and there was adequate remedy at law; and the culvert was made by private parties along the watercourse.

maintenance by the defendant of an alleged nuisance in permitting the gases to escape from sewers through perforated covers to the manholes, in the vicinity of complainant's property. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. J. B. Goodwin and J. A. Anderson, for plaintiff in error:

The injunction, under the facts and circumstances of this case is an illegal invasion of the legal discretion of the city government to establish and use a system of sewers.

at that place obstructing navigation and destroying the use of the dock. Breed v. Lynn, 126 Mass. 367; Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208.

So an injunction will be granted against draining sewage into a private canal ruining navigation, although this had continued for about eighteen years; but up to that time no material injury had been done. Boston Rolling Mills v. Cambridge, 117 Mass. 396.

And a city owning one half a pier in connection with another party, is not authorized to use its part as an offal dump, preventing plaintiff from the use of his property. New York Consolidated Act. Laws 1882, chap. 410, authorizing the use of piers, does not contemplate the use of one half a pier. Hill v. New York, 139 N. Y. 456.

But where the use of the pier as an offal dump is not the sole cause of the injury to plaintiff, nor so irreparable that compensation cannot be had, and where it is questionable whether the odors resulted from that part used by the street-cleaning department or that occupied by the board of health, an injunction will not be granted because, if, from that part used by the street-cleaning department it had legislative sanction. Cornell v. New York, 20 N. Y. Supp. 814.

And under N. Y. Laws 1882, chap. 110, and its amendment, authorizing the use of a pier as a dumping ground, an injunction, at the instance of a private person, to restrain such use, will be denied. Hill v. New York, 63 Hun, 633, affirming 15 N. Y. Supp. 398.

The proposed use of a dock in the city of New York in the midst of a residence neighborhood, for the purpose of landing emigrants, endangering the health and impairing the comfort of the residents of that vicinity, will be enjoined. Brower v. New York, 3 Barb. 254.

And an action may be maintained by the state of Illinois against the city of St. Louis, enjoining such city from obstructing a channel of the Mississippi river, by dyking the Illinois shore, this being an obstruction to navigation. People v. St. Louis, 10 Ill. 351, 48 Am. Dec. 339.

But where the legislature has determined that a dam can be erected so as at least not to materially obstruct navigation, a writ of injunction against the erection of a dam will not be granted. State v. Eau Claire, 40 Wis. 533; Atty-Gen. v. Eau Claire, 37 Wis. 400.

And under Cal. Stat. 1863, p. 414, providing that no action will lie against the city until demand of the board of trustees, a complaint by a private person for abatement of a dam built by the city of Sacramento which fails to allege the demand, will be dismissed. Yolo County v. Sacramento, 36 Cal. 198.

Messrs. Hall & Hammond, for defendant in error:

The plaintiff's evidence showed clearly that the open manholes, directly in front of her property, where she resided, permitted the free escape of foul sewer gas from the main sewer on Wheat street, and caused great annoyance, inconvenience, and damage to her and the inmates of her house. This constitutes a nuisance.

Market houses and buildings.

An injunction will be granted against the obstruction of a street, by the erection or use of a market house. State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564; Harrisburg's App. (Pa.) Oct. 3, 1887; Columbus v. Jaques, 80 Ga. 508.

Or to prevent the erection of a building designed as a market house and a pound for hogs and animals, and a jail, in a street in close proximity to a residence. Lutterloh v. Cedar Keys, 15 Fla. 306.

After a decree on information by the state in the name of certain citizens, any citizen may interfere by proceeding in revivor, to have the decree executed. State v. Mobile, 24 Ala. 701.

But in the case of Higgins v. Princeton, 8 N. J. Eq. 309, an injunction was denied against the erection of a market house on a street at the instance of a private residence owner on the ground that a market house is not a nuisance per se; but if it was a public nuisance irreparable damages were not shown and the party was left to his action at law.

This was in effect overruled in the case of McDonald v. Newark, 42 N. J. Eq. 136, which held that the use of a street for a market place is a public nuisance, and the city will be enjoined from such use at the instance of a private citizen, annoyed by noise, smell, smoke from torches, and other disturbances which attend a market.

But the erection of an engine house by a city under its charter will not be enjoined at the instance of an adjoining owner, as an engine house is not per se a nuisance. Van De Vere v. Kansas City, 107 Mo. 83.

Railroads and other uses of streets.

A city council, violating an injunction against allowing a railroad the use of a street, will be punished. People v. Dwyer, 90 N. Y. 402; Negus v. Brooklyn, 10 Abb. N. C. 132; Davis v. New York, 1 Duer, 501.

But in this last case, supra, a taxpayer who does not reside or own property upon a street affected cannot enjoin the city from granting a railroad the right to use the street, and under New York practice, it is improper to authorize an amendment, adding, as a party plaintiff, the attorney-general in such a case. Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 505, 87 Am. Dec. 186.

Where a city closed up part of a street and permitted wooden buildings to be placed thereon, to the danger and annoyance of complainant, he will not be granted an injunction until the matter has been tried at law. Dunning v. Aurora, 40 Ill. 481.

A court of equity has power to enjoin the continuance of a nuisance.

The power to abate a nuisance within the corporate limits of a city is conferred upon the municipality (Code, 4095); but a court of equity has jurisdiction where the nuisance is created by the municipality itself.

A municipal corporation is not relieved from liability because a nuisance is caused by it in the exercise of its legislative or corporate powers.

A mandatory injunction in favor of a lessee was granted against a city, directing the removal of a bridge built in a street adjoining property occupied by him. The act authorizing it provided no compensation for the party damaged. Knox v. New York, 55 Barb. 404, 38 How. Pr. 67.

A private individual will not be granted an injunction to prevent a city from tearing up part of a street, rendering it impassable at a place not near his property, unless he makes a showing that he is especially injured. Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn., 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598.

Cemetery.

In the case of Dunn v. Austin, 77 Tex. 139, an injunction was refused to restrain the city from enlarging a cemetery, on the ground that the bill of complaint did not show how plaintiff would be injured, or that the anticipated result would be injurious, and did not allege that any part of the lands owned by complainant are contiguous to that intended to be added to the cemetery. Proximity to the cemetery itself is not ground for an injunction.

Public urinals.

Under 28 & 39 Vict., chap. 55, authorizing the erection of a public urinal, a local board will be enjoined from erecting one on land partly belonging to plaintiff and in such close proximity to plaintiff's premises as to constitute a nuisance. Sellers v. Matlock Bath Local Board, L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 923, 52 L. T. N. S. 762.

Under 18 & 19 Vict., chap. 123, authorizing a vestry to erect public urinals, an injunction will not be granted against erection of one on a garden wall on one side of a public street some distance from the house, as, under act of parliament, it is not assumed to be a nuisance in advance of its erection. Biddulph v. St. George's, Hanover Square, 3 De G. J. & S. 493, 33 L. J. Ch. 411, 9 Jur. N. S. 953, 8 L. T. N. S. 558, 11 Week. Rep. 739, reversing 33 L. J. Ch. 411, 9 Jur. N. S. 434, 8 L. T. N. S. 44, 11 Week. Rep. 524.

But where one is proposed to be built under this act, and it is to be placed in close proximity to the door of a private place, an injunction will be granted. Vernon v. St. James, Westminster, L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 449, 50 L. J. Ch. 31, 44 L. T. N. S. 229, 39 Week. Rep. 222.

Bleckley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. There was evidence indicating that the system of sewerage adopted by the city was a good and safe one, and that the nuisance complained of, or its dangerous character, did not result from any defect inherent in the system itself, but was due to defective execution, in failing to adapt the system properly to the steep grade of the street in which this particular unwholesome sewer was constructed and is maintained. There was ample evidence that poisonous gases, in large quantities, were emitted through the manholes in this sewer, which were dangerous to health and life, and that the plaintiff, whose residence was on adjacent premises, was subjected to special injury and annoyance thereby. If such a nuisance owed its origin, not to the general system of which this sewer was a part, but to a defective execution of the same at this particular place, there can be no doubt of the power to restrain the city from continuing the nuisance, notwithstanding the municipal government is, by statute, invested with plenary powers over streets, sewers, drainage, and sanitation. Whether a nuisance attributable to a mistaken exercise of the legislative power of the city in adopting an unsafe or unwholesome system of sewerage might be the subject-matter of injunction, is a question on which no decisive opinion need be expressed, the strong probability being that the nuisance now under consideration had a different origin.

2. In granting the temporary injunction restraining the city "from continuing said manholes in such condition as to allow the escape of poisonous gases," the presiding judge did not abuse his discretion; and the terms of the order were sufficiently definite and specific, construing them in the light of the pleadings and the evidence. The city officials, if they honestly and conscientiously endeavor to comply with the injunction, will have no real difficulty in ascertaining, to a reasonable certainty, what manholes they are to deal with, and what gases are to be kept from escaping through the same. Any affected ignorance on this subject is not to be anticipated.

Judgment affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Frederick E. BRADLEY et al., Plffs. in Err.,v.
THOMPSON SMITH'S SONS.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A creditor cannot set off against an assignee of an executory contract of the debtor with the creditor on which nothing was due at the time of the assignment a claim which has matured in favor of the creditor against the debtor at that time where the statute allows a demand against an assignor to be set off against his assignee only where it might have been set off against the assignor while it belonged to him, and provides further that a set-off can be allowed only in actions founded upon demands which could themselves be the subject of a set-off.
2. A creditor who fails to state his intent to apply an existing claim against his debtor on a contract between them when a guaranty is made of the debtor's contract including the payment of men to be employed by him and when the guarantor requires a change in the contract to make it payable in installments, is estopped as against such guarantor who takes an assignment of the contract to set off against it his claim against the debtor.

(January 25, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Bay County to review a judgment permitting defendant to set off against the claim of plaintiffs upon a contract with defendant which had been assigned to them by W. H. Doyle a claim held by defendant against Doyle prior to the assignment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Set-off against assigned claim of debtor's demand against assignor.

The general rule is that the assignee of a chose in action for the assignment of which no protection is specially provided by law takes subject to all rights of set-off then held by the debtor against the assignor.

The assignee of a chose in action takes subject to set-offs. Clopton v. Morris, 6 Leigh, 273.

At least if the chose in action is not assignable. Tusculum, C. & D. R. Co. v. Rhodes, 8 Ala. 206.

If, at the time of the assignment of a chose in action, an equitable right of set-off exists against the assignor, the assignee will take subject to such right. Ainalle v. Boynton, 3 Barb. 256.

An assignee takes subject to the right to set off an existing claim on a promissory note. Cary v. Bancroft, 14 Pick. 315, 25 Am. Dec. 393.

A chose in action for which assignment is not provided by law remains subject to all set-offs acquired prior to notice of its assignment. Burkett v. Moses, 11 Rich. L. 432.

Under the Pennsylvania statute, the assignee of a chose in action takes subject to set-offs then existing. Rider v. Johnson, 20 Pa. 190; Thompson v. McClelland, 29 Pa. 475; Eldred v. Hazlett, 33 Pa. 307; Faul v. Tinsman, 36 Pa. 108; Keagy v. Com. 43 Pa. 70.

An assignee, although a creditor taking in satisfaction of his debt, takes subject to a set-off. Peters v. Soame, 2 Vern. 423.

Originally choses in action were not assignable so as to give the assignee any rights whatever, but finally equity began to protect the rights of the assignee, and still later statutes were passed providing in a greater or less degree for such assignments and defining the assignee's rights.

Under the New York statute, set-off against an assignor is available against an assignee of a chose in action. McIlvaine v. Egerton, 2 Robt. 423.

If it existed at the time of the assignment, and was acquired by defendant before notice of the assignment. Faulkner v. Swart, 55 Hun. 261.

The fact that under the code the action is brought in the name of the assignee does not change the rights of the parties. Martin v. Kunsmüller, 37 N. Y. 393, 10 Bosw. 26.

There has been some question as to how far equity will protect the right of set-off since the assignment is provided for by statute and equitable protection of the assignment is no longer required to the same extent as formerly.

In Greene v. Darling, 5 Mason, 201, the question is quite elaborately discussed but no definite conclusion seems to have been arrived at, although the inclination seems to be against the set-off.

Kinds of choses in action to which set-offs are applicable.

It seems that the only kinds of choses in action which can be assigned free from the right of set-off are those made so by the law-merchant or some statutory provision.

A contract, in the absence of value paid and notice given at the time of the assignment, is subject to set-off. McGowan v. Budlong, 79 Pa. 470.

The assignee of a claim upon a recognizance takes subject to the right of set-off. Burton v. Willin, 6 Houst. 522.

Under the Iowa statute the assignee of an account takes it subject to all set-offs obtained by the debtor against the assignor before suit is commenced. Reynolds v. Martin, 51 Iowa, 324; Zugg v. Turner, 3 Iowa, 223.

An equitable assignee of an account takes subject to set-off. Andrews v. McCoy, 3 Ala. 220, 43 Am. Dec. 609.

The assignee of a bond takes subject to existing set-offs. Ragsdale v. Hagry, 9 Gratt. 406; Miller v. Centerville, 57 Iowa, 640.

An assignee of a bond after maturity takes subject to all set-offs existing before notice of the assignment. Pugh v. Grant, 36 N. C. 39.

The assignee of a bond takes it subject to every defalcation which the obligor had against the obligee at the time of the assignment, or notice of the assignment. Wheeler v. Hughes, 1 Dall. 23.

The surety on a sheriff's bond, who takes an assignment of the lien of the commonwealth upon the sheriff's right of action against the deputy for breach of duty, must allow a set-off of a claim by the deputy to reimbursement for money previously paid as surety for the sheriff. Harlan v. Lumsden, 1 Duv. 86.

But an assignable certificate of stock is not with-in the Alabama statute of set-off, so as to render it subject in the hands of the assignee to set-off for the debts of the assignor. Spence v. Whitaker, 3 Port. (Ala.) 297.

The assignee of a mortgage takes it subject to the right of the mortgagors to set off against it an existing judgment against the mortgagor. Rosevelt v. Bank of Niagara, Hopk. Ch. 573, 2 L. ed. 530.

Mortgages are quite frequently given merely as security for promissory notes, and the question of their assignability free from set-off is then deter-

Messrs. Hatch & Cooley, for plaintiffs in error:

Because at the time of the assignment of Doyle's interest to the plaintiffs, and at the time when defendant received notice of the assignment, nothing had been earned under the contract, the right of set-off never accrued to the defendant.

The right of set-off is a statutory right, and is governed by the provisions of 8 How. Stat., p. 3722, § 7865.

Defendant can now set-off its claim against Doyle if it could have used it as a set-off against Doyle before the assignment was made.

Doyle did not assign a debt. When the time came that two debts did not exist, they were not opposing debts, for they did not exist between the same parties. Therefore, "the demand" of the defendant was not "such as might have been set off against" Doyle, "while the contract belonged to him."

Lockwood v. Beckwith, 6 Mich. 168, 73 Am.

mined largely by whether or not the note is so assignable. Upon that question see note to VANN v. MARBURY, post, 325.

The assignment of a mortgage securing an unmatured note is not subject to set-off. Dutton v. Ives, 5 Mich. 519.

But in New Jersey it has been held that the assignee of a mortgage is not subject to set-off in the absence of an agreement between the original parties that the set-off claimed should be applied on the mortgage. Conover v. Sealy, 45 N. J. Eq. 589.

And that is put on the general ground of no set-off to mortgages. Dubois v. Schaffer, 23 N. J. Eq. 401.

The assignee of a policy in a mutual insurance company after the loss has occurred takes subject to the right of the company to set off an unpaid assessment. Archer v. Merchants & Mfrs. Ins. Co. 43 Mo. 434.

Assignment will not defeat set-off.

So the general rule is that an assignment will not defeat the right of set-off, if both causes of action existed at the time it was made. Bent v. Peirce, 89 Mo. 381.

But in Howe v. Sheppard, 2 Sumn. 409, it is said that where there are mutual debts which may be set off in law or equity, the right of set-off is extinguished by a bona fide assignment of one of the debts, but in that case the debt on one side was joint and was assigned without any separate title of the cross-debtor ever attaching to it.

Where rights become fixed.

Both the statutes and courts of equity have generally fixed some point of time claims existing before which could be allowed in set-off and these acquired later could not be made available.

The right of set-off is determined by the date at which notice is given of the assignment. Miller v. Kreiter, 76 Pa. 78.

Under the Oregon statute, any demands may be set off which were acquired by the debtor prior to notice of the assignment. Rayburn v. Hurd, 20 Or. 229.

Under the Michigan statutes, claims are a proper set-off which belong to the defendant before notice of the assignment. Smith v. Warner, 16 Mich. 390.

Notice of the assignment is necessary to prevent claims against one to whom rent is due from being procured and set off by the obligor against the assignee. Adams v. Lavens, 20 Conn. 73.

An assignment by a banker of a bond given to secure money loaned is subject in the hands of the assignee to set-off of money on deposit with the banker when he becomes bankrupt, if no notice of an assignment is given. Cavendish v. Greaves, 24 Beav. 163, 27 L. J. Ch. 814, 3 Jur. N. S. 1086.

Claims accruing after notice of the assignment cannot be set off, although they arise out of transactions previously entered into, unless they are connected, or the parties intended that they should be set off. Watson v. Mid-Wales R. Co. L. R. 2 C. P. 568, 35 L. J. C. P. 285, 17 L. T. N. S. 94, 15 Week. Rep. 1107.

If a debtor has notice that his debt has been assigned to a third person, he cannot buy up a claim against his original creditor which can be used as a set-off against the claim in the hands of the assignee. Whitaker v. Pope, 2 Woods, C. C. 463.

Set-offs arising after notice of the assignment are not available. Bowman v. Halstead, 2 A. K. Marsh. 201, 12 Am. Dec. 380.

Demands procured after notice of the assignment are not available as set-offs. Thompson v. Emery, 27 N. H. 274.

When notice of the assignment and the credit sought to be set off by the debtor was received by the same mail, the debtor cannot acquire such title to the claim as to make it available against the assignee. Goodwin v. Cunningham, 12 Mass. 196.

Where notice of an assignment is given to the debtor he cannot plead in set-off a note given subsequently to the notice, although the debt in consideration of which it was given existed prior to the notice. Weeks v. Hunt, 6 Vt. 15.

An assignee of marginal receipts, given by a banker as security for deposits to insure against loss on discounted drafts, takes subject only to such set-offs by the bank as had accrued at the time they became payable upon obligations contracted prior to notice of the assignment. Jeffries v. Agra & Masterman's Bank, L. R. 3 Eq. 674, 35 L. J. Ch. 686, 14 Week. Rep. 889.

The time of giving notice has not, however, been accepted by all the courts as the time when the rights of the parties became fixed. At one time it was held that under the New York statutes, demands acquired after the assignment cannot be set entitled to counterclaim an amount due from the assignor's firm.

Denton*, 3 Head, 380.

In several of the Michigan cases the rule is stated that the assignee of a contract takes it subject to antecedent equities.

But the cases relied upon in support of that rule are none of them cases where the statute of set-off was involved.

Warner v. Whittaker, 6 Mich. 133, 72 Am. Dec. 65; Bloomer v. Henderson, 8 Mich. 395, off, although they were acquired without notice of the assignment. Mead v. Gillett, 19 Wend. 397.

But a later decision seems to have recognized the time of giving notice as the time established to fix the rights of the parties. Faulkner v. Swart, 55 Hun, 231.

In some other jurisdictions the time of assignment seems to be recognized as the dividing line, and in some of the cases it is stated that claims cannot be set off which did not accrue prior "to the assignment or notice of it." Francis v. Leak, 6 Ind. App. 411; Brisban v. Caines, 10 Johns. 45; Mason v. Knowlson, 1 Hill, 218; Fay v. Jones, 18 Barb. 340; Martine v. Willis, 2 E. D. Smith, 524; Solomon v. Holt, 3 E. D. A claim cannot be assigned, after suit brought, to the attorney so as to defeat the right of set-off then existing. Norwich Printing Co. v. Kloppenberg, 50 Conn. 205.

Under the English doctrine of mutual credits it seems that the fact that the claim sought to be set off had not accrued at the time of the assignment is not in all cases fatal for the doctrine has been there stated to be that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to the right of set-off of claims then existing, or flowing out of and inseparably connected with the previous dealings of the parties. Smith v. Parkes, 16 Beav. 119.

Under this doctrine of claims not existing at the time of the assignment are the decisions upon claims which were held by the debtor but had not matured at the time of the assignment. The general rule is that a claim not matured at the time of the assignment cannot be set off. Chambles v. Matthews, 57 Miss. 308; Beckwith v. Union Bank, 9 N. Y. 211, 4 Sandf. 604; *Watt v. The assignment of a chose in action before due defeats a set-off of an independent cross-demand on which no right of action had accrued at the time of the assignment. And this rule is applicable to assignees for creditors. Fuller v. Steiglitz, 27 Ohio St. 355, 22 Am. Rep. 812.

The insolvent maker of a note, who assigns for value his account against an indorser, passes the title free from the indorser's claim to reimbursement for the amount which he is compelled to pay, if his liability was not fixed at the time of the assignment. Kinsey v. Ring, 38 Wis. 536.

A surety cannot set off a demand which he had paid after notice of the assignment. Walker v. McKay, 2 Met. (Ky.) 295.

That the assignment was before the cross-demand became due must be shown by the assignee. Jervay v. Straus, 11 Rich. L. 376.

An assigned bond is subject to set-off of a debt due but not payable at the time of the assignment, but not of a debt which becomes due afterwards. Mann v. Dungan, 11 Serg. & R. 75.

An assigned claim cannot be set off on a demand that had not matured when the assignment was made. Kull v. Thompson, 38 Mich. 685.

Equity generally follows the law upon this question. So it has been held that equity will not prevent the set-off on the ground of the assignment of the contract before the debt accrued if no notice of the assignment was given until after the subject-matter of set-off had accrued. Wilson v. Gabriel, 4 Best & S. 243, 8 L. T. N. S. 502, 11 Week. Rep. 803.

Although it has also been held that equity may protect the liability of a surety, although it is not fixed at the time of an assignment. Feazle v. Dillard, 5 Leigh, 34.

The authorities upon this question of setting off claims not matured at the time of the assignment in case of insolvency will be found fully collated in a note to Fera v. Wickham (N. Y.) 17 L. R. A. 456.

Rights connected with assigned contract.

The assignment of a contract is generally held to be subject to the equities including set-off growing out of the contract itself, regardless of when they mature.

Breach of the contract out of which the claim arose is available to extinguish the cause of action in the hands of the assignee. Newton v. Lee, 69 Hun, 90.

No rule is more necessary to enforce good faith than that which compels a person to relinquish claims which he has induced others to suppose he would not rely on; not because he obtains any advantage thereby, but because he has induced others to act so as to be seriously prejudiced if he is allowed to fall in the performance of what he has encouraged them to expect.

Under a contract by the government to subsidize a railroad company, it may set off against the subsidy a claim for breach of the construction contract in the hands of an assignee. New Foundland v. New Foundland Railway Co. 13 App. Cas. 213, 57 L. J. P. C. 35, 58 L. T. N. S. 285.

The assignee of money to be earned under a contract to furnish timber takes the assignment subject to the right of the debtor to set off against the claims the amount which he is damaged by the failure of the contracting party to perform his contract prior to the time when anything becomes payable under the contract. *Smith v. The assignee of a bond given by one member of a dissolved partnership to the other to pay the debts of the firm takes it subject to the right of the obligor to set off a note given him by his co-partner in settlement of a balance of account which the latter owed the former. Merrill v. Green, 55 N. Y. 270.

The assignee of a vendee under a land contract, with notice of the rights of a sub-vendee of a portion of the property, takes subject to the latter's right to set off against his assignor a claim which will satisfy the purchase price, although he has subsequently acquired an assignment of the rights of the original vendor. Cavill v. Allen, 57 N. Y. 515.

A claim against the landlord for breach of the contract contained in the lease may be set off against the assignee of the rent. Brown v. Coleman, 55 Hun. 501.

One seeking to reach, under the mechanics' lien statutes, the amount due a contractor as damages for the breach by the owner of his contract to permit a completion of the building, must recognize the right of the owner to set off his claim against the contractor for money loaned, etc., the same as though he was assignee of the claim. Miner v. Hoyt, 4 Hill. 193.

In that case the court reviews some of the cases in which it was held that the absolute assignee of a promissory note, even after it was due, takes free from the right of set-off, and holds that the case before it was not within the principle of those cases, because the assignor still continued to be the real owner of the claim, as its recovery would satisfy his debt to the claimant. Ibid.

But the counter-demands must flow directly from the contract itself. It is seldom held sufficient 23 L. R. A.

Effect of agreement to set off.

If the set-off has practically been reached by the parties to the knowledge of the assignee before the assignment, he will be bound by it. Fitch v. Gates, 39 Conn. 373.

But in California it was held that the assignee, without notice of a street improvement contract, does not take subject to the right of a taxpayer to set off his claim against the original contractor, although an agreement had been made between the original parties that such set-off might be made. Himmelmann v. Reay, 38 Cal. 168.

Perhaps that agreement was, however, so far collateral to the main contract that within the authorities the assignee would not be affected by it.

Now if Doyle's assignment to plaintiffs did not operate in presenti, because there was no chose in action then in existence, but only attached and became operative when the work was completed and the money earned, then there was complete mutuality between defendant's claims against Doyle, and Doyle's claims against the defendant. The statute of set-off does not stand in the way, because if, when the work was completed and the money earned and became due (the first instant in which Doyle could sue) Doyle had commenced a suit, then the statutes would be complied with.

Equitable causes for set-off.

In some instances when the facts were not within the statute of set-offs relief has been sought in equity on the ground of the existence of some peculiarly equitable cause for relief.

Where insolvency is the one equity for enforcing a set-off contrary to the provisions of the statute, such equity gives no right to compel the insolvent to pay before the demand against him becomes due. Keep v. Lord, 2 Duer, 78; Hicks v. McGrorty, 1d. 295.

Insolvency occurring after notice of the assignment has been given will not entitle to a set-off. Wathen v. Chamberlin, 8 Dana, 184.

The removal of an assignor from the state of the assignment is not a sufficient equitable cause to allow a set-off against an assignee. Talbot v. Warfield, 3 J. J. Marsh. 83.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was a creditor of one Doyle. On March 24, 1891, it and Doyle made a written contract, by which Doyle agreed to drive a quantity of logs for it. On the same day, plaintiffs guaranteed said contract, and the payment of the men promptly, by W. H. Doyle, in writing, upon the contract, and in defendant's presence. Immediately below this guaranty was the following, viz.: "I hereby sell and assign to F. E. Bradley & Co. all my right, title, and interest in and to the within contract, and direct that all payments to become due on this contract to me be paid to them. W. H. Doyle. Dated March 24th, 1891." On April 7, 1891, a contract was made by telegraph between Doyle and the defendant, whereby Doyle was to "break in" the logs for 20 cents per 1,000 feet. This contract was also assigned to plaintiffs, of which defendant was notified April 17. Under these contracts, Doyle earned $2,202, of which $367 was for breaking in. The first work was done April 23. The plaintiffs offered evidence to show that the work was done at their expense, but this was excluded, and plaintiffs excepted. The defendant proved its claim against Doyle, amounting to $1,524.89, which the court alto take an assignment of the sheriff's claim on the bond, until after the assignment has been made and the remedy on the execution gone, will not be permitted to set off his claim on the note against the claim on the bond. King v. Fowler, 18 Mass. 397.

In an action by an assignee against one who has covenanted to pay a mortgage, claims by the covenantor against the mortgagor cannot be set off. Boyle v. Youmans, 29 N. Y. S. R. 883.

If the debtor accepts an order for the transfer of the claim, he will not afterwards be permitted to set off his own claim existing against the assignor at that time against the claim in the hands of the assignee. McLellan v. Walker, 26 Me. 114.

The fact that a bank does not apply a deposit upon the depositor's note when it becomes due, but proceeds to obtain judgment on the note, will not prevent it from making the application after the judgment is obtained, although the deposit has then been assigned to a third person. Marsh v. Oneida Central Bank, 34 Barb. 296.

It will not bar a right of set-off against a non-negotiable note, that at the time it was given the maker owned the accounts against the payee which are relied on as the subject-matter of the set-off. Rayburn v. Hurd, 20 Or. 223.

An agreement to pay the surplus of securities to the debtor will not prevent the creditor from retaining it as a set-off to a claim, if at the time there was an agreement for extension which was not fulfilled by the debtor, so that the debt again became payable immediately before the proceeds were available for repayment. Miller v. Florer, 15 Ohio St. 143.

It seems that when notified of the assignment notice must be given of the set-off. Albee v. Little, 5 N. H. 277.

Counter set-off.

A debtor will not be holden to an assignee for a debt due from him to the assignor, if he was liable in a greater or equal amount to another person as surety for the assignor, which he has to pay, although it was not due at the time of the assignment. Barney v. Grover, 28 Vt. 391.

A note procured by the assignee after the date of the assignment cannot be set off against a bond due from the bankrupt to the maker of the note. Mo-Iver v. Wilson, 1 Cranch, O. C. 423.

What assignment may be sufficient.

The fact that a mortgage given to secure promissory notes is not actually transferred until after set-offs are acquired against the mortgagee will not make it subject, in the hands of the assignee, to such set-offs, if the notes were indorsed and the mortgage delivered to the assignee prior thereto. Breen v. Seward, 11 Gray, 113.

What notice of assignment sufficient.

Under Mass. Pub. Stat., chap. 163, § 10, which provides that if the demand on which the action is brought has been assigned and the defendant had notice of the assignment, he shall not set off a demand that he acquires against the original creditor after such assignment, notice to the attorney representing the claim is sufficient. Smith v. Brown, 151 Mass. 333.

Counterclaims.

An assignor's debt cannot be used as a counterclaim in a suit against the assignee. Mantanye v. Montgomery, 47 N. Y. S. R. 114.

The demand cannot be pleaded as a counterclaim, but must be pleaded as a defense. Ferreira v. Depew, 4 Abb. Pr. 131; Dillaye v. Niles, 1d. 253.

Under the New York statute which provided for a judgment in favor of the one having the largest claim, no set-off could be allowed except it existed between the parties to the record. Alsop v. Caines, 10 Johns. 396.

The assignee is not bound to pay the excess of the demand sought to be set off over the amount of his claim. Kast v. Katherin, 3 Denio, 344.

The right cannot extend to an independent recovery against the assignee. Duncan v. Stanton, 30 Barb. 533.

In Wolf v. H—, 13 How. Pr. 54, it is held that the right of set-off against the assignor cannot be set up as a counterclaim against the assignee, but must be set up as a defense in the same manner as the set-off before the code.

But where the original creditor has assigned the claim to himself and his wife, who brings suit, the debtor can avail himself of a demand against the husband alone, which was due before the assignment, as a counterclaim, and recover a personal judgment against the husband for the amount of excess. Davidge v. Mayo, 5 N. Y. Supp. 475.

This raises the question whether a creditor can set off against the assignee of a chose in action not due at the time of the assignment a claim which was mature before that time. Had both claims been mature, i. e. due and payable, at the time of the assignment, no doubt of the right to set off either could be entertained. And it is equally clear that, if the assigned claim had been mature, an immature one could not be set off. We find numerous cases sustaining this proposition, and in one of them (Coffin v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 568) is a dictum which denies the right of set-off under the facts in this case. Mr. Justice Folger says: "Nor is it [set-off] permitted, except when the demands are mutual; that is, where both were due and payable before the transfer of either to a third party." In that case the claims sought to be set off were of two kinds. Some fell due before the assignment to the plaintiff, and some after. As to the former, we see no reason why it should not have been set off, except that the obligation was joint, while that sued upon was several. This is one ground upon which that decision is based, and applies to all of the claims sought to be set off. The other claim was open to the objection that it did not fall due until after the assignment. But the question of the right to set off a claim mature at the time of the assignment against a plaintiff assignee of an immature claim does not arise. Three New York cases are cited to sustain the two reasons for the decisions: Beckwith v. Union Bank, 9 N. Y. 211; Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 384; Jordan v. National Shoe & Leather Bank, 74 N. Y. 468, 30 Am. Rep. 319. The cases of Beckwith v. Union Bank and Jordan v. National Shoe & Leather Bank were cases where the claims attempted to be set off matured after the assignment to the respective defendants. That of Patterson v. Patterson was where a bond was taken by plaintiff's testator, in his lifetime, conditioned to pay a sum to his executor after testator's death. This was held to be a claim against which a debt due from the testator in his lifetime could not be set off. The opinion in this case was also written by Mr. Justice Folger. In demonstrating that the cause of action upon the bond did not arise until after testator's death, he asserts that a cause of action does not arise from the contracting of an indebtedness alone, but out of the nonperformance of it as well; and he cites authorities to sustain the proposition that a cause of action does not run from the making of the promise to do something at a future time, but only from the expiration of that time. Were we to apply this logic to the present case, we should be compelled to admit that at the time of the assignment the plaintiff's assignor had no demand whatever, except a contract to be performed, whereby the defendant might later become indebted. Had the assignment not been made, the obligation would have matured immediately upon the performance of the contract by Doyle, and the right of set-off by either Doyle or the defendant would have been complete. In such case, Doyle's subsequent assignment would not deprive the defendant of the right of set-off. But defendant's contention is that if Doyle assigned his contract before it matured, though it were but an hour before, his assignee could collect the consideration, to the exclusion of the defendant's set-off. Doyle is permitted to sell his claim before it matures. Plaintiff says: "I bought my claim against the defendant before it was due, and therefore it was not the subject of set-off when I bought it. It is true that by the terms of your contract with Doyle you had a right to become Doyle's debtor, and all rights that I have acquired are those which Doyle had under the contract. I own the claim against you because I bought it, and I will collect it from you because when I bought it there was no claim against you. It not being due, there was no debt." The right of set-off has its origin in the injustice of allowing a person to collect a debt when he is at the same time indebted to his debtor in a sum as large or larger than his own claim. And one who buys a claim against another, not negotiable, takes it subject to all rights of set-off due at the time of his purchase. If A. buys a claim due to-day, B. can set off a debt which is due. If, however, A. has bought the claim half an hour before midnight, the rule is said to be otherwise, though it is difficult to see much difference in defendant's equities in the two cases.

It is urged that the assignor had merely a contract, which performance would ripen into a valid demand. This he sold, and plaintiffs took it with all its obligations and equities. As the assignor could not avoid defendant's right of set-off, if he had kept it, and could not convey any greater right than he had, it is said that plaintiffs took no more than the assignor could convey. Until performance, the plaintiffs had no claim against defendant. Coincident with the maturity of the demand, the right of set-off attached. There is apparent force in this reasoning. The case of Atkinson v. Mutual Assur. Soc. against Fire on Bldgs. of Virginia, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 202, 3 L. ed. 199, is a case decided by Mr. Justice Johnson, which seems to recognize this doctrine that the assignment of a claim before maturity does not relieve it from set-off. On April 25, 1807, A. gave H. a note, which came to the hands of plaintiff, S., by assignment, on August 14; being before maturity, the note being due about October 25, 1807. On June 29, H. gave A. a note payable in sixty days, i. e. September 1, 1807. Stewart brought an action against A., who was allowed to set off his note against H. It will be observed that Stewart acquired a claim that was not due, yet the set-off was allowed, and this, too, though the note set off was not due; the case differing from, and going further than this, in that particular. It should be remembered that the act of the Virginia assembly under which this decision was made provided that: "Assignments of bonds . . . shall be valid; and an assignee . . . may thereupon maintain an action of debt, in his own name, but shall allow all just discounts, not only against himself, but against the assignor, before notice of the assignment was given to the defendant." It was argued upon the trial that a "claim could not be just discount until it became payable, and that money cannot be offset until it be due." This case appears to support defendant's contention. But it differs from the present case, in that there was a debt to be set off. It was not a case of executory contract, under which a debt might at a future time be created. True, this debt was not due, but the consideration had passed. The sum had been earned, as the giving of the note implies. The maker of such note was a debtor before maturity, and the holder a creditor. Unless by reason of its negotiability, he could only dispose of such note subject to equities; and while we do not find it necessary to hold that the maker had an equity to the right to set off his existing claim, already due, when the note should mature, and do not so hold, we can see that such a conclusion, as in the Cranch case, falls far short of the doctrine that such right should apply to a case of a promise to pay at a subsequent date, when the promisee should have earned the amount. It is a difference between an existing obligation to pay money already earned, at a future date, and an existing contract, where the debt does not exist, and will not, unless the consideration, whatever it may be, shall be performed. In the one case the holder of the promise to pay has an existing liquidated demand, contingent upon nothing, which he will inevitably have the right to demand and collect at the end of a specified time. In the other, he has no such demand, but an executory promise to pay upon the performance of something else. His right of action, when it accrues, may be a mere action for damages for a breach of contract. He could not set off such right, if the promisee should sue him upon the cross-demand, and it is a matter which may never become a debt. The case in Cranch, under the Virginia statute, seems to have permitted set-off in the former case, but we have found no authority that extends the rule to the latter. Furthermore, there is no opportunity to enlarge the doctrine of set-off. It is a statutory right, in derogation of the common law, and must be strictly construed. Woods v. Ayres, 39 Mich. 848, 83 Am. Rep. 396; Robbins v. Brooks, 42 Mich. 68. Section 7365 of Howell's Statutes provides that, "in the following cases, . . . a defendant may set off demands which he has against the plaintiff." First, then, it must be a demand, as contradistinguished from a right of action. Hanna v. Pleasants, 2 Dana, 269; Gould v. Kelley, 16 N. H. 560; Drew v. Towle, 27 N. H. 412, 59 Am. Dec. 880; Hepburn v. Hoag, 6 Cow. 614. If the demand has been assigned to the plaintiff, a demand existing against his assignor at the time of the assignment, and belonging to such defendant before notice of assignment, may be set off, if it was such as might have been set off against the assignor while it belonged to him. How. Anno. Stat. § 7365, 23 L. R. A.

subd. 8. The language of this subdivision is a little blind, by reason of the use of the word "by," instead of "to," in the second line, but we think that its meaning is unmistakable. This claim of defendants was a proper subject of set-off against the plaintiff assignee only if it was such against the assignor while he was the owner of it. That it was not is plain, because this claim, i. e. that assigned, was not then due; and subdivision 5 provides that "it can be allowed only in actions founded upon demands which could themselves be the subject of set-off according to law." Under these provisions, defendant's claim, though due, did not become a subject of set-off before the assignment, because the assignor never had a right upon a demand subject to set-off. As there never was a time, while Doyle owned the contract, when, under this statute, it might have been set off against him, it is not such a demand as can be set off against the assignee. Subdivision 8; Richards v. La Tourette, 58 Hun, 623; Richards v. Union, 48 Hun, 263.

The evidence shows that the contract for driving the logs was altered before it was executed, at the suggestion of the plaintiffs, who were to guarantee performance by Doyle. The following language was inserted, viz.: "A payment of fifty cents per thousand is to be made when the jam has passed the East branch, and the balance when the rear is within the Boom Co's limits. It is understood that the jam mentioned is of the — logs." The request of the guarantors that the defendant so amend the contract as to provide for payment in installments is significant. Evidently, they were providing a way for Doyle to obtain money to do the job with, and thereby lessening the danger of their being subjected to loss upon their guaranty. The defendant could not shut its eyes to this, and was in duty bound to inform the guarantors of its intention to apply the existing claim against Doyle, of which the guarantors were ignorant, in payment. This is the more apparent when we consider that the guaranty which defendant was exacting included the payment of the men who were to be employed by Doyle, and which defendant was insisting that the plaintiffs should assure. Under such circumstances as the plaintiffs claim to exist, the defendant would be estopped from setting off its claim upon the larger contract (if not both), which it had not disclosed, to the extent, at least, of the amount paid by plaintiffs; and this might be so although there was an express agreement, of which they were ignorant, between Doyle and the defendant, that the work should be performed and applied in payment of defendant's claim against him. The question of estoppel would be one for the jury, under all the facts which could be shown to bear upon it.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The other Justices concur.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Edward O. MERRILL et al.
v.
CAPE ANN GRANITE CO.

(.....Mass.....)

Set-off may be allowed in equity of the dividend payable out of the assets of a corporation in the hands of a receiver to a stockholder who, after the receiver's appointment, made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors of whom the corporation was one, upon the corporation's claim against the stockholder; the equities of the other stockholders represented by the receiver being superior to those of the insolvent's remaining creditors represented by his assignee.

NOTE.—Right to set off insolvent's obligation upon a claim in the hands of a receiver, or assignee or trustee for creditors.

As appears from the note to BRADLEY v. THOMPSON SMITH'S SONS, ante, 306, the general rule is that an assignee for value takes a chose in action subject to rights of set-off existing against it. When the case becomes that of one who has merely taken possession of the estate of an insolvent to pay debts and wind it up the equities against the right of set-off are not nearly so strong as in the former case, and in addition there is the influence of the English insolvency statutes which have for many years provided for the allowance of set-offs in such cases.

Assignees for creditors.

The general rule is that, an assignee for creditors takes subject to the right of set-off. Rubey v. Watson, 22 Mo. App. 423; Richards v. La Tourette, 119 N. Y. 54; Nelson v. London Assur. Co. 3 Sim. & Stu. 297; Bean v. Cabbaness, 6 Ala. 342; Donelson v. Posey, 13 Ala. 733; Third Swedish M. E. Church v. Wetherell, 43 Ill. App. 414; Van Sandt v. Dowa, 63 Iowa, 594, 50 Am. Rep. 759; Martin v. Pillsbury, 23 Minn. 176; Benoit v. Darby, 12 Mo. 196; Jones v. Piening, 85 Wis. 264; Lewis v. Barber, 3 Lanc. L. Rev. 116; Stow v. Yarwood, 20 Ill. 497.

This rule is stated with variations and sometimes with qualifications.

An assignee for creditors takes subject to the right to set off cross-indebtedness arising out of mutual dealings, if the assignor's liability had become fixed at the time of the assignment. Schlietfeld v. Hawkins, 14 Abb. Pr. 112.

A set-off, if good against the insolvent, is good against the assignee. Kinsler v. Pope, 5 Strobb. L. 123.

An assignee for creditors takes, under the Missouri statute, subject to all set-offs existing at the time of the assignment. Green v. Conrad, 114 Mo. 651.

An assignee of an insurance company takes a claim against a borrower from the company subject to the right of the borrower to set off a claim for loss upon which the company was at the time liable. Drake v. Rollo, 3 Bias. 274.

An assignee for creditors of a bank takes subject to the right of a depositor to set off a deposit against a note not yet due. McCagg v. Woodman, 23 Ill. 54.

In a suit by the assignee of a bank upon a note which became due after the assignment, a debt to the maker from the bank before the assignment may be set off. Smith v. Spengler, 33 Mo. 408.

APPEAL by the administrators of the estate of Benjamin F. Butler, deceased, from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County distributing assets in the hands of the receivers of the Cape Ann Granite Company. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. George O. Shattuck and Frank L. Washburn, for the estate of Benjamin F. Butler:

When the company went into the hands of a receiver that its affairs might be wound up, a trust was created to apply the assets as far as might be necessary to the payment of debts, and to distribute the balance among the stockholders pro rata. It was precisely like the case of the estate of a deceased intestate; the debts are first to be paid and the balance is to go to the distributees. But it

The insolvency assignee of an heir takes the latter's claim against the estate subject to the right of the administrator to set off against the claim the insolvent's debts to the estate. Gosnell v. Flack, 18 L. R. A. 155, 76 Md. 423.

In Shipman v. Lansing, 25 Hun, 200, the court says that the assignee, as such, takes such rights as the assignor had at the time of the assignment; and it was held that where a firm holding a deposit of trust funds became insolvent and assigned for creditors, and the individual debts were paid out of individual assets, the trustee could set off against the partnership liability in the hands of the assignee a fund which became payable from the trust to one of the individual partners after the assignment, which the assignee were attempting to reach.

The current is, however, not unbroken, for some cases have denied a right of set-off against the assignee.

In Ryall v. Larkin, 1 Wils. 155, it was held that the statute allowing set-off in case of bankruptcy did not extend to the assignee.

But the right to set-off against the assignee in bankruptcy was recognized in Edmonds v. Newman, 1 Barn. & C. 418, 2 Dowl. & R. 568.

And Ryall v. Larkin, supra, is overruled in Ridout v. Brough, Cowp. 135, in which it is said the assignees are the bankrupt.

While it was decided that the assignee in bankruptcy takes subject to set-off, under 4 Anne, chap. 17, in Lanesborough v. Jones, 1 P. Wms. 323.

And in Hicks v. McGrorty, 3 Duer, 295, it was held that the assignees for creditors are entitled to the same protection as assignees for value.

The Massachusetts court took the same position in case of assignment of commercial paper. See Holland v. Makepeace, infra.

And in Alabama it has been held that if a note to a bank has been assigned for creditors, notes of the bank are not a good set-off against it. Gee v. Bacon, 9 Ala. 609.

Receiver.

The general rule is that a receiver takes subject to the right of set-off. Van Wagoner v. Paterson Gas Light Co. 23 N. J. L. 233; Darby v. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. 3 McArthur. 349; Re Middle Dist. Bank, 9 Cow. 413, 1 Paige, 585, 3 L. ed. 762, 19 Am. Dec. 433; Farmers Deposit Nat. Bank v. Penn Bank, 3 L. R. A. 273, 123 Pa. 233; Smith v. Felton, 43 N. Y. 419; Smith v. Fox, 43 N. Y. 674; Miller v. Franklin Bank, 1 Paige, 444, 2 L. ed. 706; Mel v. Holbrook, 4 Edw. Ch. 539.

was settled prior to any statute that if a distributee owed the estate anything, the debts were to be offset. The fact that it might be uncertain until the debts were paid whether there would be any distributive share did not prevent the offset.

Blackler v. Boott, 114 Mass. 26.

Under the laws of Massachusetts the debt of a stockholder can be offset against his claim to a dividend.

Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co. 8 Pick. 90, 19 Am. Dec. 806.

The insolvency and the assignment give additional force to the claim to a set-off.

Under the New Jersey statute, the receiver is bound to allow all just set-offs. State Bank at New Brunswick v. Receivers Bank of New Brunswick, 3 N. J. Eq. 266.

If there has been an appropriation of deposits to a debt prior to the insolvency, the receiver is bound by it. Chase v. Petroleum Bank, 66 Pa. 166.

The receiver of an insurance company, which becomes insolvent holding an unpaid premium note and owing an unadjusted loss, takes the note subject to a set-off for the loss. Osgood v. De Groot, 36 N. Y. 348; Holbrook v. American F. Ins. Co. 6 Paige, 220, 3 L. ed. 962.

But the receiver is not bound to allow in set-off debts or credits which are not so mutual as to have been proper subjects of set-off against the insolvent. Gray v. Bello, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 629, 21 L. ed. 927.

A right of set-off perfect and available against a bank is not affected by the bank's becoming insolvent and the appointment of a receiver. Hade v. McVay, 31 Ohio St. 231.

The assignee of a bank takes subject to set-offs. Terry v. Wooding, 3 Patton & H. (Va.) 178.

A receiver of a bank takes subject to a right of a depositor to set off deposits against the amounts which become due on his note to the bank, after it passes into the receiver's hands. Platt v. Bentley (N. Y.) 11 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 171.

A debtor of a bank whose charter is repealed has an equitable right to set off every demand which he had against the bank at the time, but not demands subsequently purchased. McLaren v. Pennington, 1 Paige, 102, 3 L. ed. 577.

The receivers of a bank, appointed under Mass. Stat. 1861, chap. 127, in a suit upon a debt contracted before the institution of insolvency proceedings, must allow as a set-off debts held by the debtor prior to the commencement of such proceedings. Colt v. Brown, 12 Gray, 238.

Under the Kentucky act for winding up insolvent banks the commissioners must allow set-offs. Finnell v. Nesbit, 16 B. Mon. 361.

And the provisions of the National Banking Act do not prevent his setting off against a debt to a bank, at the time of its passing into the hands of a receiver, a claim against the bank payable at the 28 L. R. A.

Messrs. Charles Almy and William H. Coolidge, for assignees of Jonas French:

Article 12 of French's deed of assignment is as follows:

"We, the undersigned, creditors who have signed these presents, parties of the third part, do severally (each of us contracting for himself and not for any other) covenant and agree to take, and do hereby accept and take, full payment, satisfaction, and discharge of our respective debts, demands, claims, actions, and causes of action against the party of the first part existing at the date hereof, whether payable now or in the future, which shall be payable to us respectively under the provisions of this instrument out of the proceeds of the property herein conveyed in trust, and do severally release, acquit, and forever discharge the party of the first part from all such demands, claims, actions, and causes of action, and these presents shall be pleadable in bar thereof, except as herein time of its suspension. Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 38 L. ed. 1059, reversing 36 Fed. Rep. 63.

Limitation upon the rule.

While the general rule is as above stated yet there are several limitations which are quite as important as the rule.

An assignee for creditors does not take subject to set-offs procured after the assignment. Johnson v. Bloodgood, 1 Johns. Cas. 51, 1 Am. Dec. 93; Spencer v. Barber, 5 Hill, 568.

Debts procured after the appointment of a receiver cannot be used in set-off. Clarke v. Hawkins, 5 R. I. 219.

A claim procured by a debtor to an insolvent bank after its insolvency is not available as a set-off. Venango Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 56 Pa. 14; Thorp v. Wegefarrth, 56 Pa. 32, 38 Am. Dec. 789.

Bills of a bank obtained after it becomes insolvent cannot be used as a set-off in a suit by the receiver. Diven v. Phelps, 34 Barb. 224.

Bills of an insolvent bank acquired after the insolvency are not available as set-offs. Exchange Bank of Virginia v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 739; Saunders v. White, 20 Gratt. 327.

Notes of a bank purchased after it is insolvent and after notice of the assignment of its claim against defendant, are not a proper set-off against a claim in the hands of an assignee. Phillips v. Bank of Lewistown, 18 Pa. 394.

But in North Carolina it has been held that a bank's assignee for creditors is bound to receive bills of the bank in payment of debts. This right is not based on the ground of set-off, but on a distinct provision of the statute. Blount v. Windley, 68 N. C. 1, 12 Am. Rep. 618.

And under the Maryland laws, the receiver of an insolvent bank is bound to receive bills of the bank in satisfaction of debts due it, regardless of when they were obtained. Union Bank of Tennessee v. Elliott, 6 Gill & J. 263.

A receiver has no power to permit a set-off of claims procured after the estate passed into his hands. Van Dyck v. McQuade, 35 N. Y. 616.

A judgment recovered against the assignor after an assignment for creditors is not a set-off in a suit by the assignee. Ordan v. Prentice, 33 Barb. 160.

An assignee for creditors is not charged with equities subsequently acquired. Brown v. Britain, 84 N. C. 552.

A judgment assigned for benefit of creditors will not be opened to permit a set-off of a claim otherwise provided: reserving unto ourselves, however, all our rights respectively against indorsers, sureties, and all other parties collectively or contingently liable as herein otherwise provided."

The receivers of the defendant company became parties to the assignment containing the above paragraph by leave of the superior court, with no fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, and with full knowledge of the effect of it, as appears from their petition.

See Horne Sav. Bank v. Peirce, 158 Mass. 807.

It is a reasonable assumption that other creditors who became parties to the assignment were influenced to do so by the fact that a large creditor like the Cape Ann Granite Company had signed.

The receivers have waived any claim for a set-off.

Hall v. United States Ins. Co. of Baltimore, 5 Gill, 484.

Independently of the effect of the fact that the receivers became parties to the deed of assignment, the question seems covered by the decision in Merchants' Bank of Easton v. Shouse, 103 Pa. 483.

See also Brent v. Bank of Washington, 3 Cranch, C. C. 517.

A corporation has no lien on its capital stock for debts due it from a stockholder.

In order to have a set-off "the debts must be mutual—must be in the same right."

Savoy v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 781.

A stockholder cannot set off a debt due him from an insolvent corporation in an action brought against him by the receivers for unpaid subscriptions to the stock, or for assessments on the stock.

against the insolvent acquired after the assignment. Collins v. McKee (Pa.) Oct. 25, 1886.

The precise act which fixes the rights of the parties does not appear to have been judicially determined. Perhaps the reason may be that the contention has not been so much over the general character of the act as over the question whether or not the act in the particular case was sufficient to cut off rights thereafter acquired.

A set-off acquired after the bankruptcy proceedings are instituted cannot be allowed. Re Gillespie, L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 963.

Claims against an insolvent bank purchased after proceedings to wind it up are not good against the receiver. Finney v. Bennett, 27 Gratt. 365.

Notes procured after proceedings to wind up a bank are not available in set-off. Farmers Bank v. Willis, 7 W. Va. 31.

In Clark v. Brockway, 8 Keyes, 12, the court held that claims procured after the commencement of a proceeding to set aside an assignment for creditors on the ground of fraud, which was successful and which transferred the property to a receiver, cannot be set off against claims which passed to the receiver against the holder on the ground that it would give a preference to the person holding the set-off inconsistent with the rights of the ones instituting the action to have the assets distributed ratably.

In a suit by a receiver of a bank, one seeking to set off a certificate of deposit has the burden of showing that he obtained it before the proceedings of insolvency were begun. Smith v. Mosby, 9 Heisk. 501; Lanier v. Gayoso Sav. Inst. of Memphis, Id. 506.

Claims existing at the time of the first publication of the notice of the issuing of the warrant in insolvent proceedings may be used as set-offs against suits by the assignee. Aldrich v. Campbell, 4 Gray, 234.

Notes may be set off if acquired after knowledge that the bankrupt had stopped payment, but before notice of the commission of an act of bankruptcy. Hawkins v. Whitten, 10 Barn. & C. 217, 5 Mann. & R. 219.

A set-off procured after notice of the assignment for creditors will not be allowed. Anderson v. Van Alen, 12 Johns. 343.

Some of the cases have gone so far as to make notice of insolvency preclude a right to obtain an available set-off.

Claims acquired after insolvency cannot be set off. Crain v. Ballio, 2 La. 82; Case v. Cannon, 23 La. Ann. 112.

To enable the defendant to set off cash notes against the claim of the assignees of the bankrupt, he must show that they came to his hands before the bankruptcy. Dickson v. Evans, 6 T. R. 57.

The assignee of a bankrupt is not affected by a check of the bankrupt obtained by a debtor of the estate after the bankruptcy occurred. Ogden v. Cowley, 2 Johns. 274.

Debts purchased with knowledge of the debtor's insolvency and with reason to believe that the insolvency proceedings will be begun against him cannot be set off in an action by the assignee in insolvency upon a debt due from the purchaser to the debtor. Smith v. Hill, 8 Gray, 572.

As to the right to set off a claim purchased after notice of the insolvency, see Stones v. Dodge (Mich.) 21 L. R. A. 280, and note.

Claims not due.

Of the some character as claims procured after the assignment are those held before but which do not become due until afterwards. The authorities upon that question will be found in the note to Fera v. Wickham (N. Y.) 17 L. R. A. 458.

A sufficient number will, however, be inserted here to illustrate the trend of the authority.

A receiver is not liable to set-off for debts not due when he took possession. Fogerty v. Philadelphia Trust, S. D. & Ins. Co. 75 Pa. 125; United States Trust Co. v. Harris, 2 Bosw. 75; Crosbie v. Leary, 6 Bosw. 312.

The receiver of a national bank will not be compelled by equity to allow against a note due the bank a note of the bank which is not due at the time of the insolvency, if the transactions are not mutual or connected. Balch v. Wilson, 25 Minn. 299, 38 Am. Rep. 467.

A claim which first becomes payable after it reaches the hands of a receiver of a national bank is not subject to set-off of the defendant's deposit account. Stephens v. Schuchmann, 32 Mo. App. 388.

An insurer cannot set off claims for losses occurring after the insolvency of the insured and the amounts becoming subsequently due for return premiums upon the premium account of the bankrupt due at the time of the assignment. Glennie v. Edmunds, 4 Taunt. 775.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for decision is raised by the appeal of the administrators, with the will annexed, of the estate of Benjamin F. Butler, from a decree of the superior court upon the petition of the receivers of the Cape Ann Granite Company for instructions as to the division among its stockholders of a considerable amount of money which remains in their hands after having discharged in full all the obligations of the corporation to its creditors. The corporation was organized in the year 1869, and its business was the quarrying and furnishing of granite for buildings, and for other purposes. In the autumn of 1891, finding itself unable to obtain money with which to carry on its operations, its stockholders, by vote, directed its president to cause proceedings to be instituted for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of its assets and effects, and the liquidation and closing up of its concerns, and especially to complete certain contracts to furnish stone for the erection of certain buildings. The capital stock of the corporation was divided into 500 shares, of the par value of $100 each, 250 of which shares were held by Mr. Butler, 225 by Jonas H. French, and the other 25 by other persons. The vote mentioned was passed on November 15, 1891, by stockholders representing 475 shares, one of whom must therefore have been French; and the same stockholders united in a request in writing for the appointment of receivers. Thereupon, a petition to the superior court was signed on November 16, 1891, by the firm of E. O. & F. H. Merrill, who were creditors of the corporation to the amount of only notes which had been given to the company for borrowed money. Com. v. Shoe & Leather Dealers' F. & M. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 131.

A premium note on an insurance policy assigned by the officers of the company to be collected for the benefit of creditors is not subject to set-off of a loss upon a policy occurring subsequently to such an assignment. Nelson v. Edwards, 40 Barb. 279.

The holder of insurance policies not due at the time of the appointment of a receiver cannot set them off in a suit by the receiver on claims held against him by the company. Newcomb v. Almy, 96 N. Y. 308.

In Richards v. Union, 48 Hun, 263, a village had money on deposit with a banking firm and purchased supplies from one of the partners individually, giving him an order on the bank for the amount. The firm individually and collectively assigned for creditors and the court held that the assignees receiving the order before maturity took it freed from any right of the village to set off the amount of the bank deposit against it.

And a similar ruling was made in reference to an assigned mortgage in Richards v. La Tourette, 58 Hun, 623.

The assignee for creditors is not bound to permit a set-off of a liability of the assignor which does not accrue until after the assignment. Chipman v. Ninth Nat. Bank, 120 Pa. 86.

So in an action by an assignee for creditors for a deposit, the bank cannot set off notes of the depositor which did not mature until after the assignment. Ibid.

An assignee for creditors is not bound to allow a set-off of a debt not due at the time of assignment. Thompson v. Hooker, 4 N. Y. Legal Obs. 17.

But it has been held that if it is equitable, the assignee for creditors may be compelled to allow a set-off of a demand of the debtor not due at the time of the assignment. Fry v. Boyd, 8 Gratt. 73.

And that the assignee for creditors must allow a set-off of a claim maturing before the assigned claim, although it is not due at the time of the assignment. He is not entitled to be regarded as an assignee for value. Maas v. Goodman, 2 Hill. 275.

Although that is a decision by an inferior court and has not been generally followed.

In Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank of Nashville, 15 L. R. A. 716, 91 Tenn. 236, the right of set-off was upheld against an assignee for creditors, although the debt of the insolvent was not due at the time of the assignment.

If a banker whose deposit accounts are not due because not demanded, assigns for benefit of creditors with a direction to apply the proceeds in the same manner as under the bankrupt law, the depositors are entitled to set off the amount of their deposits against debts due by them, although the rule might be otherwise if the assignment had not contained such provision. Fort v. McCully, 59 Barb. 57.

But the implication from that case seems to be negatived by the decision in Seymour v. Dunham, 24 Hun, 93, where a set-off was allowed although the assignment contained no such direction.

One indebted to a corporation, who, at the same time, holds the express contract obligation of the corporation to deliver a certain amount in value of manufactured goods, for which no demand has been made at the time the corporation becomes insolvent, and assigns for the benefit of creditors, may set off in equity against his indebtedness to the corporation the claim against the insolvent. Laybourn v. Seymour (Minn.) April 27, 1893.

Set-off between corporation and stockholder.

In the attempts of stockholders to procure a set-off of their claims against the corporation upon the receiver's demands upon them, the character of the demands is frequently so different as to preclude a set-off. In many instances the demand of the receiver is a trust fund while the stockholder's demand is not, which is of itself sufficient to defeat the set-off.

An ordinary claim against a corporation cannot be set off by a stockholder against his unpaid stock subscription after notice of insolvency, since after insolvency the debts are not of the same character, the one being a trust fund. Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 781.

A stockholder of an insolvent bank, who is also its creditor, cannot set off an assessment upon his stock for payment of debts against his claim on the bank. Re Empire City Bank (United States Trust Co. of New York v. United States F. Ins. Co.) 13 N. Y. 199.

A stockholder of an insolvent bank cannot set off his deposits against his unpaid subscriptions to stock. Williams v. Traphagen, 38 N. J. Eq. 57.

A stockholder in an insolvent national bank cannot diminish his liability for assessments to make good its debts by set-off of amount of his claim against the bank. Hobart v. Gould, 8 Fed. Rep. 57.

A stockholder in an insolvent corporation cannot set off purchased claims on losses against his liability.

$71.24, and by Jonas H. French, praying that receivers might be appointed to take charge of the state and effects of the corporation, and to manage and control its affairs, and to close up its concerns, and dispose of its property, should such a course become necessary; to carry out the contracts, if found advisable; and to do such things in connection with the estate as the court should decree, and as should be proper and for the benefit of the corporation, its stockholders, creditors, and other persons interested. On November 20, 1891, receivers were appointed to take possession of all the assets of the corporation, and were authorized to carry out its contracts, and to incur and defray such expenses, consistent with the purposes of the corporation and the management of its business, as might be necessary for the protection and maintenance of the property received by them, and the winding up of the affairs of the corporation. At this time, French was himself indebted to the corporation to an amount, as the receivers now allege, exceeding $75,000, and which the agreed facts state is far in excess of the amount now in the hands of the receivers for distribution, and no part of which has since been paid. On November 25, 1891, French made a general assignment to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, to which a great majority of them, in number and amount, have assented, and his indebtedness to them far exceeds the assets of his estate. The receivers of the corporation, in accordance with an order of court granted May 18, 1892, assented to French's assignment, and became parties thereto, before June 1, 1892; and on August 17, 1892, they filed with the assignees or trustees of French a proof of the claim of the corporation against him, to which was annexed a statement that it was "without waiving any rights, in law or equity, which we may have, by way of set-off or otherwise on account of ity to assessment on his stock. Long v. Penn Ins. Co. 6 Pa. 421.

In a suit against all the stockholders of an insolvent corporation to collect unpaid stock subscriptions, individuals will not be permitted to set off debts due to them by the corporation. Mathis v. Pridham, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 58.

In a suit by the receiver of an insolvent insurance company to recover dividends declared and paid when the company was insolvent, a stockholder defendant cannot set off claims for losses on policies, since the suit by the receiver is as representative of creditors and not as a representative of the company, and there is no mutuality in the demands. Osgood v. Ogden, 4 Keyes, 70, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 425. Stockholders of a bank undertook to increase the capital but before the increase was perfected the bank became insolvent and passed into the hands of a receiver, and a stockholder, who was also a debtor to the bank, was permitted to set off the amount which he had paid as his share of the increase of stock upon the amount of his indebtedness. Armstrong v. Law, 27 Ohio L. J. 100.

Shareholders of a limited company are not entitled to set off a claim against the company against calls made necessary for winding up the concern; nor can they set off their shares of a prospective dividend. Ex parte Grissell, L. And this was so although the claim against the company arises out of breach of the contract under which the shares were taken. Ex parte Black, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 254, 42 L. J. Ch. 404, 28 L. T. N. S. 50, 21 Week. Rep. 249.

A deposit account cannot be assigned free from liability to stock assessments after the insolvency of the bank, but before the appointment of a receiver. King v. Armstrong, 20 Ohio L. J. 376.

But if a receiver on taking possession of a bank converts into the general assets of the bank a trust fund which had been devoted to a special purpose, to a share of which a stockholder had a right which takes precedence to the rights of other creditors, he may set it off against an assessment on his stock to pay debts. Welles v. Stout, 38 Fed. Rep. 807.

On the other hand if a shareholder of a corporation has become bankrupt, the relative rights of the assignee and the liquidator of the corporation are settled under the bankrupt act and there may be a set-off. Re Duckwoith, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 577, 36 L. J. Bankr. 24, 16 L. T. N. S. 580, 15 Week. Rep. 358; Re Anglo-Greek Steam Nav. Co. L. R. 4 Ch. App. 174. 23 L. R. A.

And the rule is the same although the bankrupt's claim has been assigned to a third person. Ex parte Strang, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 491, 39 L. J. Ch. 644, 28 L. T. N. S. 519, 18 Week. Rep. 475.

Claims by and against mutual insurance companies are usually not in the same right so as to permit a set-off.

One who gives his note as part of the guaranty fund to enable a mutual insurance company to begin business cannot set off against it, in case of the insolvency of the company, the amount which the company had agreed to allow him for the use of the note. Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Weed, 28 Conn. 51.

A loss claimed against an insolvent insurance company cannot be set off against notes given in payment of the capital stock of the company. Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U. S. 362, 23 L. ed. 483.

A member of a mutual insurance company cannot, upon its insolvency, set off against his indebtedness for premiums a loss sustained by him, adjusted and payable by the company. Lawrence v. Nelson, 21 N. Y. 158.

A claim for loss due by an insolvent mutual insurance company to one of its members cannot be set off against the member's liability for unpaid assessments. Care v. Brown, 31 W. N. C. 501.

A loss on a mutual policy is not subject to the set-off of a premium note, if the company is insolvent. Hillier v. Allegheny County Mut. Ins. Co. 8 Pa. 470, 45 Am. Dec. 666.

A loss on a policy in a mutual company which occurs after the appointment of a receiver cannot be set off upon claims upon premium notes. Standard Mut. Livestock Ins. Co. v. Crawford, 2 Pa. Dist. Rep. 601.

Likewise a depositor in an insolvent savings bank cannot set off the amount of his deposit upon the claim of the receiver against him for money borrowed from the bank. Stockton v. Mechanics & Laborers Sav. Bank, 32 N. J. Eq. 163; Hannon v. Williams, 34 N. J. Eq. 255, 38 Am. Rep. 373.

Depositors in savings bank cannot set off their deposits against loans, unless the deposits were special. Cogswell v. Rockingham Ten Cents Sav. Bank, 59 N. H. 43.

Savings bank depositors cannot set off the amount borrowed by them against their deposits when the bank becomes insolvent. But if one was a borrower and had deposited a small amount to meet the loan, it might be set off. Osborn v. Byrne, 43 Conn. 155, 21 Am. Rep. 641.

The effect of the doctrine of mutual credits.

A policy which matures after the winding up or-dividend or dividends or payments from funds in our hands upon stock of the Cape Ann Granite Company standing in the name of Jonas H. French at the time we were appointed receivers of said Cape Ann Granite Company." The assignment executed by French recited that he was unable to pay his debts at maturity, and desirous to convey all his property for the benefit of his creditors, to be distributed in substantial conformity with the provisions of the law concerning insolvent debtors; and it transferred all his property, except that exempt by law from levy on execution, to the assignees, in trust to pay over and distribute the proceeds in the manner provided by the insolvent laws for the distribution of insolvent estates, with a clause providing that for the purpose of distribution all claims were to be made up as if due on November 25, 1891, interest being added or rebated as each case might require, and also with a clause providing that the creditors who should assent and sign should thereby accept and take, in full payment and discharge of their respective debts existing at that date, the dividend payable under the provisions of the assignment, and that they severally released and discharged French from all such demands. The order under which the receivers of the corporation became parties to this assignment was entered upon a petition of the receivers filed April 23, 1892, reciting the facts of the existence of the claim against French, and of his assignment, and that it was necessary for the corporation to become a party in order to share in the dividends, and that it was for the interest of the corporation and its creditors, and of all persons having any interest in the corporation, that the receivers should become a party to the assignment, and accept the dividends thereunder in full discharge of the liability of French to the corporation, and praying that the receivers might be order may be the basis of a set-off against sums borrowed from the company on the faith of the policy. Sovereign L. Assur. Co. v. Dodd [1892] 1 Q. B. 405.

The loss on the policy and the amount due on the premium notes are mutual credits which may be set off in a suit by the receiver on the premium notes. Pardo v. Osgood, 5 Robt. 348.

Money deposited by an insolvent corporation with a banker may, upon its insolvency, be set off by him upon his claim against it for a fire loss covered by one of its policies. Scammon v. Kimball, 32 U. S. 382, 23 L. ed. 483.

The insolvency assignee of a banker, who was a shareholder in a loan association, and with whom money had been deposited and loaned by the association, takes the bankrupt's rights to the withdrawal value of his shares subject to the right of the association to set off against it the amount of the loan and deposit. Thirty-first Street Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Wetherell, 43 Ill. App. 509.

Where one borrowed money of an insurance company to erect a building and then insured the building in the company, after which a fire destroyed the building and rendered the company insolvent, the amount due upon the mortgage may be set off against the claim on the policy. Re Globe Ins. Co., 3 Edw. Ch. 625, 3 L. ed. 918.

But the holder of an unmatured life policy in an insolvent insurance company from which he has borrowed money cannot set off against the claim of the receiver upon him for the money loaned, the amounts he has paid as premiums on the policy, nor the value of the policy. Vanatta v. New Jersey Mut. L. Ins. Co. 81 N. J. Eq. 15.

The English rule.

It is within the equity of Statute 5 Geo. II, to set off accounts due upon a bond debt to the bankrupt not payable at the time of the bankruptcy. Ex parte Prescott, 1 Atk. 230.

Under the English bankruptcy act, the assignee of the bankrupt was compelled to allow in set-off whatever mutual credits there might have been between the parties, and the questions raised in the cases were as to what were mutual debts or credits within the meaning of the act.

In some of the cases sometimes cited on this subject there was a claim to a lien on property already held by the debtor, and no claim to a set-off as such. See Hewison v. Guthrie, 2 Bing. N. C. 755; Ex parte Deane, 1 Atk. 223; Green v. Farmer, 4 Burr. 224, 1 W. Bl. 651; Rose v. Hart, 3 Taunt. 490, 3 Moore, 547.

In Ex parte Ockenden, 1 Atk. 235, a right to retain goods in defendant's possession was claimed, but 23 L. R. A.

the question is decided largely on its analogy to set-off.

A deposit account and discounted paper are mutual accounts, within the statute of set-off. Boland v. Nash, 8 Barn. & C. 105, 3 Mann. & R. 189.

But the credit must have been given to the one against whom the set-off is claimed to be available. Ibid.

And the credit cannot be changed after the bankruptcy occurs. Ex parte Hale, 3 Ves. Jr. 304; Ex parte Button, 1 Rose, 320.

A case of credit capable of becoming mutual within the statute of set-off arises when one ships goods in the name of another, and the shipper can recover the proceeds from the correspondent, or set off against them his own debt to him in case he becomes insolvent. Easum v. Cato, 5 Barn. & Ald. 861.

In Hankey v. Smith, 3 T. R. 507, it was held to be a case of mutual credit, where sugar was bought on faith of a bill which the buyer had discounted and held.

It was held a case of mutual credit where a merchant was indebted to his broker for insurance premiums and money advanced, and the broker received a loss under one of the policies, and it was held he might retain it to balance the account. Oliver v. Smith, 6 Taunt. 56, 2 Rose, 123.

An acceptance not due until after the bankruptcy may be the basis of a mutual credit. Ex parte Wagstaff, 13 Ves. Jr. 65.

The overplus of payment upon a bill of goods due may be retained upon one not due at the time of the bankruptcy. Atkinson v. Elliott, 7 T. R. 378.

It was held a case of mutual credit, where certain persons jointly purchased some pearls, one paying the purchase money, and the others interest until the pearls could be sold, and one became bankrupt indebted to the one who advanced the money, so that upon the latter's selling the property he could set off his claim against the bankrupt's share of the profits. French v. Fenn, 5 Dougl. 227.

But a breach of contract to indorse paper cannot become the subject of mutual credit. Rose v. Sims, 1 Barn. & Ad. 521.

And the surplus of securities deposited with a bank as collateral for a loan does not, prior to the sale of the securities, constitute a credit so as to make the case one of mutual credit, enabling the bank to retain such surplus for the satisfaction of notes of the bankrupt previously discounted. Young v. Bank of Bengal, 1 Deacon, 623, 1 Moore, P. C. C. 150.

dered to become parties to the assignment, and thereby compound the liability of French to the corporation, and accept the dividends paid under the assignment in full discharge of that liability. The decree, in terms, allowed the receivers to become parties to the assignment, and thereby compound the liability of French to the corporation, and to accept the dividend paid under the assignment in full discharge of that liability.

The Cape Ann Granite Company has not been dissolved, but is an existing corporation. The certificate of stock which was held by French is now in the hands of his assignees. They have, as yet, paid no dividends under the assignment. The receivers of the corporation have sold all the property of the corporation, not including its claim against French, and have performed its contracts, and paid all its debts in full, both principal and interest, and have in hand about $20,000, to be divided among the stockholders, or disposed of as the court may order. Under these circumstances, the receivers have petitioned the superior court for instructions whether, in the division of the fund, the stock standing in the name of French is to be charged with the debts due from him to the corporation. Upon this petition the superior court has adjudged that the debt due from French cannot be set off against the claim of his assignees to a distributive share of the fund in the hands of the receivers; and the receivers have been ordered to distribute the fund among the stockholders in the proportion in which they owned stock when the receivers were appointed, paying to the assignees of French the share due to the stock which then stood in his name. From this decree the administrators of the estate of Mr. Butler have appealed, and the agreed facts conclude with the statement that the question presented is whether the debt due from French to the corporation can be set off against the claim of Claims not owned.

An assignee for creditors is not affected by a claim which a debtor to the estate holds for the purpose of set-off against the estate, but in which he has no property. Goodwin v. Cunningham, 12 Mass. 188.

A claim held merely as agent for another cannot be set off against a bankruptcy assignee. Forster v. Wilson, 12 Mees. & W. 191, 18 L. J. Exch. 209.

But an agent del credere may set off a loss upon a policy happening before bankruptcy against his account for premiums for insurance. Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112.

And it is immaterial that the loss is not adjusted until after the bankruptcy. Bize v. Dikason, 1 T. R. 285.

So insurance brokers may set off losses on policies procured in their own names against liability for premiums in the hands of an assignee in bankruptcy. Koster v. Eason, 9 Maule & S. 112.

Special circumstances which will defeat right.

If commercial paper is assigned to the creditor for a particular purpose and he retains it to apply on his own debt, the assignee in bankruptcy is not compelled to allow it as a set-off. Buchanan v. Findley, 9 Barn. & C. 728, 4 Mann. & R. 593.

A bill received for a special purpose cannot be set off on general account. Ex parte Flint, 1 Swanst. 30; Key v. Flint, 3 Taunt. 21.

One to whom property is assigned for creditors cannot offset his own claim. Vincent v. Gandolfo, 12 La. Ann. 528.

A bank officer having possession of the assets at the bank cannot require the receiver to allow a set-off of his claim against the bank as a condition precedent to delivering possession of such assets. State v. Commercial & S. Bank of Kearney (Neb.) June 6, 1893.

Contingent claims.

A demand paid by a surety after assignment for creditors is not a good set-off. Nettles v. Huggins, 8 Rich. L. 273.

An indorser of a note, who is not compelled to take it up until after the maker has assigned for creditors, cannot set it off against a demand against himself which was transferred to the assignee. Chance v. Isaacs, 5 Paige, 592, 3 L. ed. 842, 2 Edw. Ch. 242, 6 L. ed. 423.

In a suit by an assignee for creditors, defendant cannot set off payments made by him after the assignment as surety for the assignor, although the payments were made on debts past due when the assignment was made. Huse v. Ames, 104 Mo. 91, 23 L. R. A.

Although insolvency assignees had been held bound to allow the amount paid by a surety after the assignment upon a demand due when the assignment was made in Morrow v. Bright, 20 Mo. 298.

The insolvency of an acceptor is not sufficient to cause equity to set off acceptances not due when the insolvency occurred against a note held by the insolvent and assigned for the benefit of his creditors, unless there was a mutuality between the accounts. Lookwood v. Beckwith, 6 Mich. 168, 72 Am. Dec. 69.

But under the English doctrine of mutual credits a contingent liability may be the subject of set-off.

Bills accepted for accommodation before the bankruptcy, which are paid afterwards but before suit brought, are good in set-off against claims in the hands of the assignee. Russell v. Bell, 8 Mees. & W. 277, 1 Dowl. N. S. 107.

A guaranty which becomes operative after the bankruptcy is not a mutual credit. Sampson v. Burton, 2 Brod. & B. 89, 4 Moore, 515.

An acceptance not taken up when bankruptcy occurs may be set off by the acceptor. Smith v. Hodson, 4 T. R. 211.

Under Statute 6 Geo. IV., chap. 16, § 50, the maker of a note, in part discount of which the banker has given a draft, which the maker of the note has indorsed for discount, may set off the draft against his liability on the note in case the banker becomes bankrupt, although at the time of the bankruptcy the bill is still in the hands of the one who discounted it. Collins v. Jones, 10 Barn. & C. 777.

And in Kentucky it was held that the maker of a note may set off as against the payee's receiver the payee's share of a joint debt of maker and payee, paid by the maker after the assignment. Chenault v. Bush, 84 Ky. 523.

Commercial paper.

There is some conflict as to the rights of the receiver or assignee in commercial paper.

On the one side it is held that—

An assignee for creditors takes an immature note subject to the right of set-off then existing against it. Jordan v. Sharlock, 84 Pa. 366, 24 Am. Rep. 198.

The receiver takes a note subject to the same rights of set-off which it may be subject to in the hands of the insolvent, although it is not due when it comes into his hands. Berry v. Brett, 6 Bosw. 627.

A set-off of a deposit against a note in the hands of the bank's syndio was allowed in Beatty v. Scud-day, 10 La. Ann. 404.

The receiver of a national bank takes notes due his assignees to a distributive share of the fund in the hands of the receivers. In dealing with this question, we are not embarrassed by technical rules as to parties or pleadings, nor limited by statute provisions as to set-off, but are at liberty, in the exercise of a jurisdiction possessed by the court of chancery before the enactment of such statutes, to apply the doctrine of set-off, as grounded upon natural equity. Ex parte Stephens, 11 Ves. Jr. 27. No doubt the general rule in equity, as well as at law, is that the demands to be set off must be mutual, and that debts accruing in different rights cannot be set off against each other. But when there are peculiar circumstances which make it necessary, as the only way to prevent a clear injustice, to allow the set-off of debts not mutual, but accruing in different rights, this may be done by courts of full equity jurisdiction. It has been held that in such cases they look beyond forms, to the essence of transactions out of which the demands arise, and beyond the nominal parties, to those to be affected by the decree; and if a party to be so affected has a clear natural equity, arising out of the transactions, and superior to any equity which can be urged in favor of those for whose benefit the claim to an equitable set off is resisted, such courts may order debts not mutual, but accruing in different rights, to be set off, and made to discharge each other. See Hollbrook v. American F. Ins. Co. 6 Paige, 220, 231, 3 L. ed. 962, 966; Blake v. Langdon, 19 Vt. 485, 47 Am. Dec. 701; Brewer v. Norcross, 17 N. J. Eq. 219; Hannon v. Williams, 34 N. J. Eq. 255, 38 Am. Rep. 378.

In the present case, those who have the ultimate interest are the creditors of French, on the one side; and, on the other, those who were his fellow stockholders when the receiver was appointed. No facts appear which give to the creditors of French a better equity or higher claim than he himself could urge. Before their rights to an interest in the corporation accrued through him, the corporation had been placed by his acts in such a position that the only possible advantage which he or any other stockholder could derive from the ownership of stock must come through the decree of a court of equity; and unless, for some reason, it should be found by the court just and equitable to discharge the receivership, and allow the corporation, as a going concern, to resume the exercise of its franchise, and again pursue the purposes of its charter, it must come in the form of a dividend to be made among the stockholders after the demands of all other persons should have been satisfied in full. No stockholder—and least of all from a depositor subject to the right of the depositor to set off his deposit account. Louis Snyders' Sons Co. v. Armstrong, 37 Fed. Rep. 13.

On the other side it is held that—

The receiver of a bank has all the rights of a purchaser for value of notes indorsed to it before maturity. Eastern Bank v. Capron, 22 Conn. 639.

If there is no mutuality between two notes, an assignment of one for the benefit of creditors will not make it subject in equity to set-off of the other note, nor will the judgment obtained on it be so subject. McConaughy v. Chambers, 34 N. C. 234.

In Hartun v. Bishop, 3 Wend. 13, it is stated that receivers of a bank are trustees for its creditors, and that if, at the time of the transfer to the receivers, a note given to the bank is not payable, it is a transfer before maturity which would prevent a set-off of bills of the bank then held by the maker.

Under a statute in force in Massachusetts in 1812, the maker of a check, which passed into the hands of the payee's trustees for creditors, cannot set off against it a negotiable note of the payee purchased prior to the assignment. Holland v. Makepeace, 3 Mass. 418.

Upon the question of set-off against commercial paper generally, see note to VANN V. MANSBURY, post, 225.

Equities connected with the assigned contract.

In Cox v. Volkert, 36 Mo. 505, it is stated that the receiver of a lessor takes subject to all the right of the lessee to set-offs arising under the lease contract.

Character of demands which may be set off.

Under the old United States bankrupt law an assignee in bankruptcy might be compelled to allow as a set-off against a claim of the bankrupt a partnership debt on which the bankrupt was jointly indebted with his copartner. Tucker v. Oxley, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 34, 3 L. ed. 29.

In a suit by the receiver of a bank against the state to recover money loaned by the bank to the state, he must permit a set-off of a tax assessed against and due from the bank. Com. v. Phoenix Bank, 11 Met. 129.

Under the Massachusetts insolvent law, providing that the insolvent's assignee shall have the like remedy to recover as the insolvent might have had, a defendant in an action by the assignee to recover upon a covenant of warranty in a deed to the insolvent may set off notes and accounts due to him from the insolvent. Bemis v. Smith, 10 Met. 194.

There may be a set-off of a claim for money loaned against a demand for damages for not accepting a bill of exchange for goods sold and delivered by bankrupt to defendant. Gibson v. Bell, 1 Bing. N. C. 743, 1 Scott, 713, 1 Hodges, 136.

An assignee in bankruptcy suing on a policy for a loss occurring after the assignment must allow set-off of claims for premiums. Graham v. Russell, 5 Maule & S. 498, 3 Price, 227, 2 Marsh. 561.

A check held by a bank for collection may be used as a set-off against a claim against such bank on the part of the assignee in insolvency of the bank on which the check was drawn. Penn Bank v. Farmers Deposit Nat. Bank, 130 Pa. 200; Farmers Deposit Nat. Bank v. Penn Bank, 3 L. R. A. 273, 123 Pa. 233.

An assignee for creditors takes a claim against a debtor to the insolvent subject to the right of such debtor to set off against it an amount which had been fraudulently procured by the insolvent from the debtor just prior to the assignment. Rothschild v. Mack, 115 N. Y. 1.

A judgment on a replevin bond, which has been assigned for benefit of creditors, will not be reduced by a set-off of the debt for the purchase price of the property replevied, in equity, on the ground that the equity of the creditors of the assignor are superior to those of the judgment debtor. Coffin v. McLean, 30 N. Y. 550.

Effect of agreement.

An agreement cannot cut off a right to the set-off. McGillivray v. Simpson, 9 Dowl. & R. 33, 2 Car. & P. 320. H. P. F.

French, upon whose petition the receivers were appointed—could justly or equitably claim the right thereafter, and while the receivership continued, to treat the corporation as a going concern, with the result of withholding from the fund to be raised to adjust its affairs the debt due to it from himself, and at the same time sharing in its dividends. The decree of receivership was equivalent, so far as his equitable rights in the adjustment of the corporate property were concerned, to a dissolution of the corporation; and his creditors, and the assignees of his estate, have succeeded only to his rights and equities.

While a corporation, ordinarily, has no lien on the shares of a stockholder who is indebted to it, it may set off the dividends of a stockholder against his debt. Massachusetts Iron Co. v. Hooper, 7 Cush. 183; Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co. 8 Pick. 90, 19 Am. Dec. 306. The interests of stockholders in a corporation which has been put into the hands of a receiver to be wound up are thereby reduced, as in the case of a dissolution (see James v. Woodruff, 10 Paige, 541, 4 L. ed. 1038), "to mere equitable rights to their several distributive shares of the corporate funds, upon principles of equal justice and equity, among all the stockholders, after paying all debts and expenses," but, in the case of a receivership without a dissolution, with the additional possibility that, if the circumstances shall be found to justify such a course, the receivership may be discharged, and the corporation allowed to resume its functions, and manage its own affairs. To do equal justice and equity among these stockholders requires that the fund to be distributed should be made to repay to the corporation, so far as it is sufficient to do so, that share of the corporate funds which French, by becoming indebted to the corporation, had withdrawn for his individual use, to the detriment of the other stockholders. This is a plain, natural equity, and his insolvency makes it impossible to do justice to the other stockholders, except by making his distributive share of this fund compensate, so far as it will, the debt which he owes to the corporation, and is therefore a peculiar circumstance, which makes it the duty of a court of equity to order the debt to be set off against the dividend. His assignees took the stock after the receivership proceedings were commenced, and subject to the equities which had thereby sprung up; and no reason is shown why his creditors whom the assignees represent, as well as the debtor, have an equity superior to that of the other stockholders. Strict technical rights, in this instance springing from the relations of the stockholder to the corporation, must, as in other cases of set-off, give way to the substantial equities of the real situation, as in other instances in which the doctrine of set-off is applied. No doubt, if the assignees had sold, or should now sell, the shares of French, the price received would be assets over which the court would have no control; but the purchaser, like the assignees themselves, taking title lis pendens, would be subject to all the equities to which French himself was subject, and could not successfully contend that a dividend on the shares should be paid without regard to the debt due to the corporation from French.

The case of Merchants Bank of Easton v. Shouse, 102 Pa. 438, is relied upon as an authority against the set-off in the present case. But that was not a case in equity. The transfer of the stock to the administrators was before the bank went into liquidation, and to have allowed the set-off claimed by the bank would have given it a preference. The case was the ordinary one of a corporation attempting to assert a lien upon the shares of a stockholder for his debt to the corporation. Nor are the numerous cases in point in which courts have refused to set off deposits in insolvent banks and similar corporations against liabilities of the stockholder to contribute to a fund to be used for the payment of all the debts of the corporation. There the controlling equity lies with the creditors of the corporation, and reverses the usual principle of set-off, which would prevail if the question were between the stockholder and the corporation alone. But here the creditors of the corporation to which French was indebted have been paid in full, so that those cases do not apply. The creditors of French have no equity, as against either the corporation or its other stockholders, because French, under whom they claim, had none either at the time when his assignment was made or before. His legal right to claim that his stock was property not subject to his debt to the corporation was not an equity, but a right of strict law; and the assignment to his assignees for the benefit of his own creditors was after he had charged it, by the institution of the receivership proceedings, with an equity in favor of his fellow stockholders.

In our opinion, the decree should be reversed, and the receivers should be directed to distribute the fund now in their hands to the holders of the other 275 shares of the capital stock, crediting upon what would otherwise be the amount of the debt due to the corporation from French a sum equal to that which would be required to pay upon his 225 shares of the stock the same dividend which the other stockholders will thus receive in cash. If, in future, the assignees of French shall pay a dividend to the receivers upon the debt of French to the corporation, its amount will be adjusted in view of the credit now to be given upon his debt to the corporation, and of such further credit as would be required by the distribution of that dividend, also, among the holders of the 275 shares to whom the present fund in the hands of the receivers is to be distributed.

Decree reversed, and decree to be entered in accordance with this opinion.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Junius DAVIS, Receiver of the Bank of New Hanover,
v.

INDUSTRIAL MANUFACTURING CO.

(.....N. C.)

The receiver of an insolvent bank in settlement with a creditor should deduct from his credit all those sums for which he is debtor, either as principal or surety, and whether or not his liability has matured; and in settlement with a debtor to the bank the receiver should allow him credit for all sums which the bank owed him when the receiver was appointed, whether the debts were then due or not.

(April 18, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Hanover County disallowing a set-off claimed by defendants, in an action brought by the receiver of an insolvent bank to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. D. Bellamy, Jr., for appellants.

Mr. George Rountree, for appellee:

It has frequently been contended that a debtor could not plead a set-off against the personal representative or assignee of an insolvent, or against the receiver of an insolvent corporation, upon the ground that the effect of the plea, if allowed, is to give the debtor pleading it a preference—more than his pro rata share of the assets—and there are cases so holding.

Armstrong v. Scott, 36 Fed. Rep. 63.

The weight of authority probably is to the effect that if the right to the set-off is complete at death or insolvency, then it is not taken away by such death or insolvency.

Yardley v. Clothier, 49 Fed. Rep. 337, 17 L. A. 462, 51 Fed. Rep. 506.

But if the right to the set-off is not complete at the time of the assignment, or death, it cannot arise subsequently. It must be due and payable—capable of sustaining an action—at that time.

Brown v. Brittain, 84 N. C. 552; Mauney v. Ingram, 78 N. C. 96; State v. Oliver, 104 N. C. 458.

This is true at law and in equity.

Fera v. Wickham, 17 L. R. A. 456, 135 N. Y. 223; Spaulding v. Backus, 122 Mass. 553, 23 Am. Rep. 391; Dougherty v. Central Nat. Bank, 93 Pa. 237, 39 Am. Rep. 750.

There is no right of action upon a certificate of deposit in ordinary form issued by a bank until demand of payment.

Munger v. Albany City Nat. Bank, 85 N. Y. 589; Shute v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 136 Mass. 437.

In our case the certificates were not due by express words until thirty days after notice on some of which notice had been given but the time had not expired, when the plaintiff's right accrued; and for the court to hold that they were due and effective as set-offs before the expiration of the time limit would be to do violence to the contract.

In a suit by plaintiff against all the defendants can one, or any number less than the whole, plead as a set-off a claim which he, or they, may have against the plaintiff?

Up to the adoption of the Code of Civil Procedure it was settled that no such plea could be allowed.

State Bank v. Armstrong, 15 N. C. 519; Weed v. Richardson, 19 N. C. 535; Jones v. Gilreath, 28 N. C. 338; Walton v. McKesson, 64 N. C. 154.

There must be mutuality in the debts both at law and in equity to entitle a defendant, or defendants, to the plea of set-off.

A set-off under the circumstances is not allowable.

Burwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the receiver of a banking corporation, the insolvency of which is alleged. Immediately before his appointment as such receiver, the bank made to him a general assignment of all its property, for the benefit of its creditors. In the proceedings instituted to effect a winding up of its affairs, in which, as stated above, the plaintiff was appointed receiver, it was adjudged that that assignment was "in contravention of the laws of North Carolina in such cases made and provided." By that adjudication, as seems conceded, his title to the assets, as assignee, was destroyed, and thereafter he held them merely in his capacity as receiver. These proceedings were instituted, and this appointment was made, on June 19, 1893, in the superior court of New Hanover county. It appears from the record that on July 11, 1893, the plaintiff was again appointed receiver of the bank, in a proceeding instituted in the superior court of Wake county by the public treasurer, under the provision of chapter 155 of the Laws of 1891, which, in certain contingencies, directs him to take such action "for the purpose of winding up and settling the affairs" of a bank incorporated by the laws of this state. In our consideration of the questions presented by this appeal, we will assume that the latter proceedings are in aid of the proceedings instituted by the creditor in the court of New Hanover county and that the plaintiff has been continuously and uninterruptedly the receiver of the Bank of New Hanover from June 19, 1893,—the date of his first appointment. It is to be borne in mind, then, that he is not the assignee of an insolvent, empowered to collect and distribute the assets of his assignor according to the terms of the deed of assignment so far as its provisions are not inconsistent with the law.

NOTE.—For authorities on the subject of how far a receiver takes subject to set-off, see note to preceding case.

He is an officer of the court, appointed to "settle and wind up" the affairs of the insolvent bank, and to that end is invested, sub modo, with the title to the bank's assets, and is authorized by statute (Code, § 668) to bring suits to collect debts due to it, either in his own name, or in the name of the corporation. Prior to the enactment of this statute, and the merging of the courts of law and the courts of equity into one tribunal, having jurisdiction of both legal and equitable rights, a receiver appointed by a court of equity, and holding the relation that plaintiff holds to the corporation, its assets, and its debtors and creditors, could not maintain in his own name a suit on a note due to the bank, and in his hands as receiver. Battle v. Davis, 66 N. C. 252. In Gray v. Lewis, 94 N. C. 392, it was decided that, as well because of the change in the system of our courts as because of the statute, the receiver might sue either in his own name, or that of the insolvent corporation. In whichever name he may elect to bring the action, it is essentially a suit by the corporation, prosecuted by order of the court, for the collection of the assets; and the rights of the defendant cannot be altered or destroyed by his choice to sue in his own name, rather than in that of the bank. In it may be adjudicated all the rights of the bank, its creditors, and the defendant debtor, both legal and equitable, pertaining to the matters set out in the pleadings; and such a judgment may be entered as will enforce the rights of the general creditors, and also protect any equities that the defendants, jointly or severally, may be entitled to by reason of their being depositors in the bank as well as debtors thereto. In the statutes of this state which relate to the winding up of the affairs of insolvent corporations there is no specific direction as to mutual debts and credits. It is said, however, that in the proceedings there shall be made such "orders, injunctions, and decrees as justice and equity shall require" (Code, § 669), and that the court shall direct the manner in which debts against the corporation shall be proved (Code, § 670). In the settlement of the estates of insolvents, it is necessary that there should be some general rule by which it may be determined what is the provable debt, in cases where the creditor is also a debtor to it, either as principal or surety. That rule must be such as equity and justice require, and, when made, must control the demands of the receiver in such cases as that which we now have under consideration; for if, from the claims of an insolvent creditor of the bank, he shall be allowed to demand a deduction, before proof, of whatever the claiming creditor owes the bank, no matter whether as principal or partner or surety or guarantor, and to allow a dividend only on the net amount after such deduction, equity and justice will require that the same principle shall be applied when, as here, the receiver seeks, not to avoid the payment of an excessive dividend, but to collect a debt due to the insolvent bank, and the debtor asks that the court's officer (the receiver) will require him to pay, not the gross sum that he owes, as principal or partner or surety or guarantor, but the net amount after deducting from all the demands against him, of whatever nature, the sum due to him from the bank.

It may be well here to note precisely who are meant by "debtors" and "creditors" of the insolvent bank, as the terms are used in its discussion of the rules of equity that should control the settlement of its affairs. By "debtors to the bank" are meant all those who, at the appointment of the receiver, were liable to the bank for the payment of money (whether their liability had matured or not), and without any regard to the exact nature of the liability (whether as principal or surety). The word, as here used, does not include those who become indebted to the receiver, for the same reason that a person who has become indebted to an administrator of an insolvent estate is not considered a debtor to the intestate, and allowed to set up against that debt a debt due from the deceased to him. He owes the administrator, while the estate owes him. State v. Oliver, 104 N. C. 458; Rountree v. Britt, 94 N. C. 104; Mauney v. Ingram, 78 N. C. 96. Nor is it intended to include stockholders or officers of the corporation against whom the receiver may be directed to bring actions to recover sums due for subscription for stock, or other like claims. In all matters pertaining to set-off, such indebtedness or liability as that last named is considered as due strictly to the receiver, and not to the corporation. By "creditors of the bank" are meant those to whom the bank was indebted at the date of the appointment of the receiver, whether the debts were then due or not. The creditor may thereafter assign his claim but the assignee will hold it subject to the receiver's right to set off against it claims he holds against the creditor, as stated heretofore. If the assignee of the claim is himself a debtor to the bank, he will not be allowed to use the assigned claim as a set-off. Brown v. Brittain, 84 N. C. 552.

Having thus stated what we here mean by debtors and creditors of the bank, we declare that, in our opinion, equity and justice require that the receiver, when he comes to make a settlement with the one who is a creditor of the bank, shall deduct from his credit all those sums for which he is debtor; and, when he settles with a debtor to the bank, he shall allow him credit for all sums for which he is a creditor of the bank. Applying this rule to the case now before us, we find that the defendant Henry P. West is a creditor of the bank in two accounts: First, by a deposit subject to check; and, second, by a certificate of deposit, bearing interest at 4 per cent, dated May 13, 1892, "payable to the order of himself, after thirty days' notice, on return of this certificate properly indorsed." To the extent of these two deposits, he is a creditor. In a certain sense, he may be said to be a debtor to the bank for the whole amount of the note, on which he is one of the eight indorsers. If it is true that the principal debtor, the Industrial Manufacturing Company, is wholly insolvent, and that the receiver will not be able to collect anything on this note from it, then the true debt of the defendant West to the bank is one-eighth part of the whole amount, and also his proper proportion of what his cosureties fail to pay, and cannot be made, by execution, to pay; and we hold that the receiver should be directed to adjust and settle the said true indebtedness of the defendant West by setting off the same against his aforesaid claims against the bank. It is to be assumed that the receiver, when an execution is issued in his favor, will direct the sheriff, in such cases as this one, to seize and sell the property of the principal debtor, and not direct steps to be taken against the sureties, unless necessary, and against the sureties only as is equitable and just.

In Morse on Banks and Banking (sec. 338), it is said: "Where the bank itself stops payment, and becomes insolvent, the customer may avail himself, in set-off against his indebtedness to the bank, of any indebtedness of the bank to himself, as, for example, the balance due him on his deposit account. So, also, even though the debt to him has not matured at the time of the insolvency. The maker or indorser of a note falling due after insolvency may set off his deposit, or a debt due him at the time of the assignment, but not a claim coming to him after the assignment." By the expression, "coming to him after the assignment," is meant, purchased or otherwise acquired after the assignment, the principle announced being that decided by this court in Brown v. Brittain, supra. In the settlement of the affairs of an insolvent national bank, the indorser of a note in the hands of the receiver was allowed to set off against his liability on this note his deposits in the bank. Yardley v. Clothier, 51 Fed. Rep. 506, 17 L. R. A. 462, overruling Armstrong v. Scott, 36 Fed. Rep. 63. If an indorser has this right of set-off, any one or more of several indorsers must certainly have the same right. The national banking act contains no express provision as to set-off in cases of insolvency of a bank. In Re Middle Dist. Bank, 9 Cow. 414, note, Chancellor Walworth said: "If the real debtor is unable to pay, and the receiver is compelled to resort to the indorser, who is eventually to be the loser, he has the same equitable claim to set off bills which he had at the time the bank stopped payment. But no such effect should be allowed to an indorser, where he is indemnified by the real debtor, or where the latter can be compelled to pay." The rule thus stated by the learned chancellor seems to us eminently just and equitable. It was applied by him to the settlement of the affairs of a bank of issue. The Bank of New Hanover was not a bank of issue, but of deposit and discount. But we know of no reason why it should not effect an equitable result as well where the indebtedness of the insolvent bank consists of accounts and certificates of deposit as where its liabilities were represented by bills.

If it be said that no action would lie on the deposit, which was subject to check, until after demand and refusal, it is to be replied that the same is true of an action on bills of a bank of issue. But we think that the effect of the insolvency of the bank, and its closing of its doors and stoppage of business, and attempting to assign all its property to the plaintiff, was to make all its deposit accounts and all its certificates of deposit at once due, without any demand or notice. Seymour v. Dunham, 24 Hun, 93, was an action by the assignee of an insolvent bank against the maker of a note, who asked that he be allowed to set off a certificate of deposit payable to his order "on return of the certificate properly indorsed, with interest at the rate of five per cent, if left four months." We adopt as pertinent here what was said there: "The argument of the plaintiff is that such a deposit is not due until demand; that, as no demand has been made before the assignment, the deposit was not then due, while the note was due; and, therefore, that the deposit is not a set-off. There is no doubt of the general principle that an action cannot be maintained for money thus deposited until after demand, and the reason for that is that a right of action does not arise until there has been a breach of contract, and in cases of such a deposit, a breach of contract does not take place until a refusal of payment. But the plaintiffs, as I think, err in arguing that, because a demand is necessary before an action can be brought, therefore the indebtedness is not presently payable. The depository may lawfully pay the debt at any time. He could not do this if it were a debt payable in the future. The depositor may lawfully demand the debt at any time. He could not do this if it were a debt payable in the future. A debt payable in the future is one which neither the debtor has a right to pay, nor the creditor has a right to demand, instantly. That is not the case with such a deposit. There is no future day, till which the respective rights of the parties are postponed. The creditor may demand payment at any time, and therefore the deposit is a debt payable in presenti. Let us suppose that Pratt [the banker], instead of making an assignment, had sued Dunham [the debtor] on the past-due note. Can it be doubted that Dunham might have set off in such action the deposit, producing and surrendering the certificate? Could Pratt [the banker] have objected, in opposition to such a set-off, that Dunham had not made a demand for the deposited money before the day when Pratt commenced his action? The reply to such an objection would have been that a demand was only for the depository's protection, when called upon to pay, but that no demand was needed when the deposit was to be used only as a set-off or defense." The fact that in one case the certificate of deposit was payable "after thirty days' notice," and not immediately after demand, cannot make the language above quoted inapplicable here. But, besides all this, it must be considered that when a bank of deposit closes its doors, and abdicates its functions, as the Bank of New Hanover did, all its deposits, whether evidenced by book accounts, or certificates such as the defendant West holds, became, eo instanti, due. Why demand that which it has thus emphatically declared it could not and would not pay? Why notify the insolvent bank that after thirty days a demand would be made? On whom should the demand be made? To whom should the notice be given? The law does not require the doing of "vain things." The failure to do them is not allowed to prevent the enforcement of just rights. We do not think that the principle announced in Adams v. First Nat. Bank of Winston, 118 N. C. 382, 23 L. R. A. 111, cited by plaintiff's counsel, has application here. We are not considering the lien of a bank upon the deposit of its customer, but the rights of a depositor in an insolvent bank, that has stopped business, to treat his deposit as due, and to demand that there shall be an accounting, and that the difference between all the debits and all the credits shall be considered by the receiver—the officer of a court of equity—as the true debt due from him to the bank.

It is not necessary here to discuss the legal rules which are adopted by the courts when the defendants in an action seek to enforce a claim which they, or some of them, have against the plaintiffs, or some of them, further than to say that if the Bank of New Hanover, not being insolvent and in the hands of a receiver, had itself brought this action, we can see no reason why each one of the defendant depositors should not be allowed to set up against the claim of the bank what the bank owed him either on account or by certificate. The objection of the bank to such an allowance of credit would seem most unreasonable, and to indicate a purpose not to conduct its business as solvent banks do. Such an objection would not be raised by a solvent banking institution. No objection would be likely to come from the principal debtor, or the other sureties. If it did come from either, the reply would be, "Pay all the debt, then, yourselves, if you do not wish to account with your codefendant after he has paid it by surrendering his own individual bank deposit." There would be no such multiplicity of issues raised as would make it inconvenient or impracticable to try all of them in one action. The tendency of the code practice is towards the enlargement of the number of rights that may be adjusted in one action. Swan v. McDowell, 71 N. C. 356. The court, being a court of equity as well as of law, adjusts its judgment or decrees to enforce and protect all the rights of all the parties, and each right of each party, as far as they can be declared upon the pleadings, issues, and verdict. Clark v. Williams, 70 N. C. 679; McNeill v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 52.

What is said above applies also to the deposit account and the certificates of deposit set up by the defendant Bellamy. His claim for services was due from the bank to him before its insolvency, and must be counted as a part of the set off available to him in settlement of the claim of the bank against him.

We hold, therefore, as we have heretofore stated, that, while the judgment against all the defendants for the amount of the note and costs was proper, it should have been so framed as to contain a direction to the receiver to allow the defendants West and Bellamy to avail themselves of their respective claims against the bank set out in the answer, in settlement of what each of them is required to pay to satisfy this judgment. If the principal debtor is wholly insolvent, and the receiver can get nothing by his execution against it, and all the cosureties are solvent, then, as has been said, each of these defendants will be allowed to pay one-eighth part of the judgment in that way. If any one or more of the sureties are insolvent, the proportion of the judgment to be adjusted in this way by these two depositors, West and Bellamy, will be increased. The receiver should be directed to proceed in the collection of his judgment in accordance with the principle herein announced, and to allow the set-off of the defendants West and Bellamy to the extent indicated above.

Modified and affirmed.

1. Negotiable paper held as collateral security for a pre-existing debt is open in the hands of the holder to all defenses which could have been made against it in the hands of the original owner, whether there was notice of them or not.

2. Unless payable to bearer or indorsed negotiable papers although assigned before maturity, will be subject in the hands of the assignee to all equities which accrue before notice is given of the assignment.

NOTE.—Set-off against assignee of commercial paper of claim against assignor.

There is a marked lack of uniformity in the rules which have been promulgated upon this question. Among the early cases are found decisions which apply to promissory notes the rule applicable to choses in action generally and because of the inconvenience of this proceeding various devices were resorted to to place at least certain classes of notes beyond the liability to set-off. This was accomplished in many cases by statute, but in some instances it seems to have been done by drawing distinctions between different forms of paper.

Paper indorsed before maturity.

Of course according to the principles now recognized as governing commercial paper and its transfer the general rule must be that notes indorsed before maturity are not subject in the hands of the indorsee to set-offs held against the payee. Drexler v. Smith, 30 Fed. Rep. 764; Prior v. Jacobs, 1 Johns. Cas. 129; Hendricks v. Judah, 1 Johns. 819; Smith v. Van Loan, 16 Wend. 639; Williams v. Brown, 2 Keyes, 436; Coster v. Griswold, 4 Edw. Ch. 364, 6 L. ed. 907; Savings Bank of New Haven v. Bates, 3 Conn. 505; Barbaroux v. Barker, 4 Met. (Ky.) 47; Stanbery v. Smythe, 13 Ohio St. 495.

assignment, payment to the payee of a note, assigned without indorsement, will be a complete protection against the assignee although the note was not produced or delivered up at the time of the payment.

4. The fact that a letter containing notice of the assignment of a note and placed in the mail properly stamped and directed was never returned to the sender, whose address appeared upon the envelope is not sufficient to sustain the burden of showing the receipt of notice when met by the positive denial of the sender, whose testimony is in no way discredited.

5. The purchaser of land mortgaged to secure notes the character of which is not described in the mortgage, who pays his money upon payment to, and satisfaction of the mortgage by, the one whom the record shows to be owner of the mortgage, without notice of the rights of any assignee and upon the assurance that the notes are still owned by the mortgagor, takes free from any claim of the assignee, although the notes are not produced or surrendered.

(December 4, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Jefferson County in favor of complainant in a proceeding brought to set aside the cancellation of a mortgage, and to enforce the mortgage to the extent of one of the notes which it had been given to secure, and which had been assigned to complainant prior to the cancellation. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Morris, Lane & White, for appellants:

One who takes negotiable paper as collateral

This is the rule by statute in Alabama. Manning v. Maroney, 87 Ala. 563.

If, at the time of its failure, a bank has transferred notes given to it by one of its depositors to another bank as collateral for its own debts, and when the notes are paid such bank applies the proceeds to such debt, the depositor cannot have the amount of his deposit set off against such notes, nor can he have the amount of such collateral returned by such bank to the receiver applied for his benefit as against the other creditors of the bank. Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 685.

But that rule has not always been clearly recognized nor has it been universally followed.

In Hallowell v. Howard, 13 Mass. 285, an attempt was made to set off against a note in the hands of one to whom the bank had assigned it depreciated notes of the bank, and the court held that it could not be done, even if the note was still in the hands of the bank, stating that the only way to accomplish such result would be for the holders of the notes to obtain judgment on them and set off such judgments against the judgment obtained by the bank.

Under the Vermont statute, which allows set-offs only between the actual parties to the suit, the maker of a note sued by a purchaser cannot set off another note made by the payee, although the plaintiff holds the former note merely as trustee for the payee, who had notice of the claim to set-off. Phelps v. Bulkeley, 20 Vt. 17.

In addition to the above guarded and indirect methods of denying the set-off there are many cases in which the set-off is permitted.

Under the Arkansas statute, the assignee of a note does not take subject to the right to set off a note of the assignor obtained by the maker of the former before the assignment, if neither was due at the time of the assignment. Small v. Strong, 2 Ark. 198.

But a demand against the maker existing at the time of the transfer may be set off. Oldham v. Wallace, 4 Ark. 559; Smith v. Capers, 13 Ark. 11; Robinson v. Swigart, Id. 71.

A set-off was allowed against a note which seems to have been assigned before due, in Stewart v. Anderson, 1 Cranch, C. C. 593.

Under the Vermont statute, a book account against the payee of a note may be set off against the note, in the hands of an indorsee. Martin v. Trobridge, 1 Vt. 477.

But the statute permitting the set-off was repealed. Britton v. Bishop, 11 Vt. 70.

Under the Indiana statute a note is subject to set-off in the hands of an assignee. Sample v. Lamb, 3 Ind. 180.

Set-off to a sealed note was allowed in Hart v. Woods, 7 Blackf. 563, 28 L. R. A.

In Wells v. Teall, 5 Blackf. 303, the right to set-off against a note is recognized, although there is nothing to show whether it was assigned before or after maturity.

An indorsee of a note takes subject to set-off. Harwell v. Steel, 17 Ala. 372.

A Virginia statute provided that the assignee of a note should allow all just discounts, not only against himself but also against the assignor before notice given to the debtor, and under that statute it was held that if the claim against the maker matured before his note, the fact that it had not matured at the time of the assignment or notice thereof would not prevent a set-off. Stewart v. Anderson, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 203, 3 L. ed. 193.

Even in Pennsylvania it was formerly held that an indorsee of a note takes it subject to equities. McCullough v. Houston, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 441, 1 L. ed. 214.

And that case was not overruled as late as 1824. Ridgway v. Farmers Bank of Bucks County, 12 Serg. & R. 265, 14 Am. Dec. 681, although it is said in Louden v. Tiffany, 5 Watts & S. 399, to have been overruled in 9 Serg. & R. 193, and 12 Serg. & R. 255.

In Lewis v. Reeder, 9 Serg. & R. 193, however, it is said that the authority of that case is not to be questioned.

In at least one case the question of notice of the set-off at the time of the indorsement, rather than that of the immaturity of the note, seems to have been the controlling factor.

If the indorsee of a note, who has previously taken it as collateral for advances to the payee, has notice of the true state of the accounts between maker and payee when he procures the indorsement, he takes subject to the right of set-off as far as subsequent advances are concerned, although the note was not yet due. Goodall v. Ray, 4 Dowl. P. C. 76, 1 Harr. & W. 333.

But that case is stated by Parke, B., in Olds v. Harrison, 10 Exch. 572, 24 L. J. Exch. 66, 3 C. L. Rep. 353, to have been misreported, and he also doubts its authority in Whitehead v. Walker, 10 Mees. & W. 698, 11 L. J. Exch. 163, 13 L. J. Exch. 22, 7 Jur. 330.

And in Barker v. Valentine, 10 Gray, 341, it is stated that although an indorsee of a note before maturity takes with notice that it was given to an insurance company for premiums, it is not subject in his hands to set-off of claims by the maker against the company.

Transfer after maturity.

A few cases hold that a note is not subject to set-off although it is transferred after maturity.

There can be no set-off against a note, although it is transferred after due. Chandler v. Drew, 6 N.

security for a pre-existing debt is not a purchaser for value in the usual course of trade, but the paper is open in his hands to all defenses which might have been made against it in the hands of the assignor or original holder.

Agnew v. McGill, 96 Ala. 496. . . .
Mr. W. R. Houghton also for appellants.
Messrs. Ward & John for appellee.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Many of the assignments of error are based on the objections of appellants to portions of the testimony offered by appellee. Without ruling specifically on the objections, the chancery court rendered a decree on the merits in favor of appellee. We shall consider only the substantial controversy as shown by the record, and in doing so will look alone to the legal testimony to determine whether or not it authorizes the decree from which the appeal is taken. The controversy as it comes before us in this record is mainly one of fact, and arises out of the following

H. 469, 28 Am. Dec. 704; Annan v. Houck, 4 Gill, 235, 45 Am. Dec. 183.

A promissory note indorsed when overdue for value and in good faith is not subject to set-off of debts due to the maker from the payee. Leavitt v. Peabody, 68 N. H. 185.

The indorsee of an overdue note does not take subject to the statutory set-off. Cumberland Bank v. Hann, 18 N. J. L. 223.

It was held that under the North Carolina Code, a note assigned after due is not subject to set-off, unless the claim had attached itself to the note before the assignment. Neal v. Lea, 64 N. C. 678.

But that case was overruled in Harris v. Burwell, 65 N. C. 584.

In Johnson v. Bridge, 5 Cow. 693, in which a set-off was sought against the indorsee of a note after maturity, the court states that under the statute set-off is allowable only in those cases where, if it exceeds the plaintiff's demand, the defendant may compel the plaintiff to pay the excess, which is the case of the modern counterclaim, and the right to set-off in that case is denied upon the authority of Wheeler v. Raymond, 5 Cow. 231, 9 Cow. 205, in which the action was brought by the assignor for benefit of his assignee and the set-off of a claim against the assignee was not permitted. And this case was affirmed by a divided court in 5 Wend. 342.

The question again came before the court in Driggs v. Rockwell, 11 Wend. 504, and the chancellor was inclined to follow the decision of Johnson v. Bridge on the ground of stare decisis, but Senator Beardsley went to the full extent of holding that the assignee of an overdue bill of exchange takes it subject to set-offs then existing against the assignor. The majority of the court concurred in a reversal, but it is impossible to tell whether the concurrence was on the grounds stated by Senator Beardsley, or on those stated by the chancellor, which was that the claim sought to be set off was against the real party in interest.

But the overwhelming weight of authority upholds the right of set-off and the only diversity of opinion is as to what claims may be used in set-off. One line of cases, following the lead of an early English case, hold that the indorsee of an overdue note is not liable to set-off of counterclaims arising out of collateral matters. Borough v. Moss, 10 Barn. & C. 558, 5 Mood. & R. 296; Stein v. Yglesias, 1 Cramp. M. & R. 665; Olds v. Harrison, 28 Eng. L. & Eq. 524, 10 Exch. 372; Re Overend, Gurney & Co. L. circumstances: In December, 1886, Vann sold and conveyed a tract of land near Birmingham, Ala., to Harriet Moore, in consideration of the sum of $4,000, of which $1,333.33 was paid cash, and for the balance Mrs. Moore and her husband executed and delivered their two joint notes for $1,333.33 each, both dated December 27, 1886, payable, respectively, at twelve and twenty-four months from date, and secured by a mortgage on the land. The mortgage recites an indebtedness of $2,666, one half due December 27, 1887, and the other due December 27, 1888, and was duly recorded. On the 1st day of June, 1887, Vann transferred the first of said notes to Marbury as collateral security for an antecedent debt owing by the former to the latter. It is claimed by appellee that notice of this transfer was given by his (Marbury's) attorney to Mrs. Moore at the time of the transfer, or shortly thereafter, by a letter addressed to her at Birmingham or Avondale (the witness being uncertain which), but stating that the envelope had his name printed thereon, and that the letter was never returned to him. Afterwards, to wit, October 24, 1887, Mrs. Moore, believing she would not be able to meet the notes, and before either of them had matured, sold the property to the Woodlawn Cemetery Company for $4,158. Of this sum $358 was paid to her in cash and $3,800 in stock of said company. One thousand dollars of the stock she retained, and the remaining $2,800 of stock was, contemporaneously with its payment to her, transferred by her to Vann. Vann, Mrs. Moore, Erswell, and Nash were present at the conclusion of the trade; the two latter being respectively president

In an action on a negotiable certificate of deposit transferred after due, the maker may set off any cross-demands which existed in his favor against the original payee at the time of the transfer. Rapid City First Nat. Bank v. Security Nat. Bank, 15 L. R. A. 386, 34 Neb. 71.

In Peabody v. Peters, 5 Pick. 1, although the court recognizes the doctrine that the set-off against an assignee cannot be allowed, it shows a disposition to make the defense available in some form.

In Stookbridge v. Damon, 5 Pick. 223, evidence of the set-off was allowed under the general issue.

In Sargent v. Southgate, 5 Pick. 312, 16 Am. Dec. 409, Holland v. Makepeace is distinguished, and it is held that an indorsee after maturity of a promissory note practically stands in the place of the payee, and that a claim against the payee existing at the time of the assignment may be used as a set-off.

That case was followed in Braynard v. Fisher, 6 Pick. 355.

The maker of a note cannot plead set-off against the indorsee after maturity of claim against indorser, but may, under the general issue, give evidence of any defense which grew out of the note transaction, or agreement in relation to the note. Haley v. Congdon, 56 Vt. 65, 19 Cent. L. J. 137.

Paper negotiable in bank or payable without defalcation.

Some of the courts which were not at first disposed to recognize the right to assign promissory notes free from liability to set-off found it necessary to make some exceptions and it was held that if the paper was made negotiable in bank or expressly stated that it was payable without defalcation, it might be assigned free from set-offs.

If a note is made negotiable at a bank, and the bank becomes the purchaser, no set-offs existing against the payee will be allowed against the bank. Emanuel v. Atwood, 6 Port. (Ala.) 334.

And the same rule applies in favor of any assignee. O'Hara v. Bank at Hawkinsville, 2 Ala. 397; Knapp v. McBride, 7 Ala. 19.

At least if it was acquired before maturity, and that, too, although it was not negotiated at the bank where it was made payable. McDonald v. Husted, 3 Ala. 297.

The rule is the same although the note was made in another state. Beal v. Wainwright, 6 Ala. 156.

A note not payable in bank is subject to set-off. Hoffman v. Zollinger, 39 Ind. 461; Herod v. Snyder, 43 Ind. 480.

And even under the Virginia law which generally permits the set-off, if a note is made negotiable in bank and is actually discounted by such bank, no set-off of transactions between the parties to it can be allowed. Mandeville v. Union Bank of Georgetown, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 9, 3 L. ed. 639.

The statute of set-offs is not applicable to notes payable "without defalcation." Collins v. Waddle, 4 Mo. 452; Maupin v. Smith, 7 Mo. 403.

A note payable at a bank, without defalcation or discount, transferred either before or after maturity, is not subject in the hands of the indorsee to any set-off which the maker may have had against the discounting bank, the statute of New Jersey expressly providing that no discount shall be allowed when the note expresses that the money therein mentioned shall be paid without defalcation or discount. Tillou v. Britton, 9 N. J. L. 152.

In case the note does not contain the words "without defalcation or discount," it is subject in the hands of indorsees to set-offs which accrue prior to notice of its transfer, whether the assignment was before or after maturity. Youngs v. Little, 15 N. J. L. 1.

A note payable without defalcation or discount is not subject to set-off in the hands of an assignee. Coryell v. Croxall, 5 N. J. L. 764.

But inserting the words "without defalcation" in a sealed note will not preclude a set-off. Louden v. Tiffany, 5 Watts & S. 369.

And it has been held that although a note is payable without defalcation if the assignee takes it with notice of a right of defalcation arising since the making of the note, and of strong equities, and the insolvency of the payee, the note is subject in his hands to defalcation. Lighty v. Brenner, 14 Serg. & R. 127.

What necessary to defeat right of set-off.

The courts which refuse to recognize a right of set-off against an assignee are not agreed upon the question whether the assignment itself is sufficient to defeat the right or there must be in addition notice of the assignment or some equitable ground for refusing the set-off. Perhaps the most numerous class of cases hold in some form that matters of set-off against a payee acquired after assignment of a note assigned after maturity are not available to the maker. Murtaugh v. Colligan, 23 Ill. App. 438.

Equities arising subsequently to transfer of note will not attach to it in the hands of the assignee. Campbell v. Rusch, 9 Iowa, 342; Woods v. Viosca, and secretary of said Woodlawn Cemetery Company. When the money and stock were paid, Vann agreed to go at once to the courthouse, and cancel the mortgage on the records. He also stated that the mortgage and notes were at his office, and requested Mrs. Moore to go with him from Erswell's office to his office, where he would deliver the papers to her. Mrs. Moore and Nash both went with Vann to his office, where he got the mortgage and one of the notes (the last note), and gave them up to Mrs. Moore, saying that the other note (the one in controversy) was mislaid, and that he would get it for her in a day or two. He gave Mrs. Moore a receipt against the last-mentioned note, in which receipt it is recited that the note was then in the hands of W. C. Ward; but it does not appear that this receipt was shown to Nash, or that he knew of this recital therein. Vann afterwards made various excuses for not delivering up the note. Mrs. Moore denies ever having received notice of the transfer of the note, and the Woodlawn Cemetery Company also denies notice that appellee held the note, or claimed any interest in it, and also of all facts that might put it on inquiry. Vann did not in fact cancel the mortgage on the records for some months after the payment. He, on one occasion, told Mrs. Moore that he had done so, but she, finding the statement to be false, required him to go to the records with her, and make the proper entry of satisfaction. He is not examined by either party as a witness.

The question argued by counsel as to whether or not the note transferred by Vann to Marbury is negotiable is not a material 28 La. Ann. 716; Whittaker v. Kuhn, 52 Iowa, 315; McAlpin v. Wingard, 2 Rich. L. 547; Bullock v. Dunbar, 17 Tex. 248; Thatcher v. Mills, 14 Tex. 13, 65 Am. Dec. 95; Ritchie v. Moore, 5 Munf. 383, 7 Am. Dec. 688.

But in Lawton v. Blitch, 38 Ga. 663, the court permitted the account current between maker and payee for the year in which the note became due to be introduced in set-off against an assignee after maturity without attempting to limit the set-off to what accrued prior to the assignment.

And the above rule is enforced although the claims were acquired without notice of the transfer. Davis v. Miller, 14 Gratt. 9.

Thus an indorsee of an overdue note takes it subject to all set-offs existing at the time of the transfer, but neither maker nor prior indorser can avail himself of a set-off acquired after such transfer, whether he had notice of it or not. Baxter v. Little, 6 Met. 7, 39 Am. Dec. 707.

The bearer of a note payable to a certain person, or bearer, acquired before it has been dishonored, takes it free from any set-off which the promisor may afterwards acquire against the payee. Pettes v. Prout, 3 Gray, 502, 63 Am. Dec. 773.

In Lowell v. Lane, 33 Barb. 232, a promissory note was assigned overdue, and a short time afterward the maker recovered a judgment on a note which he held against the assignor. In a suit by the assignee it was held that the claim could not be used as a set-off, since it was not a subsisting demand at the time the action on the assigned note was commenced, and the judgment could not be set off since the assignment occurred prior to its entry.

In other jurisdictions notice of the assignment seems to be the feature given most prominence in defeating the set-off.

Under the Alabama statute all notes, except such as are payable at a bank, are subject to set-offs which exist prior to notice of assignment. Russell v. Redding, 50 Ala. 443.

In Stocking v. Toulmin, 3 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 93, in which an attempt was made to set off claims against an intermediate assignor of a note, the court said: "No doubt exists under our statute as to the right of the defendant to set off any proper demand which he may hold against the payee at any time previous to notice of the assignment by him. But the set-off against the intermediate holder was denied."

The maker can purchase a set-off at any time before notice of the assignment, even although he knows the payee is dead. King v. Conn, 25 Ind. 423.

Under the Iowa statute, an assignee of an overdue note takes subject to any set-off procured before notice of assignment. Downing v. Gibson, 53 Iowa, 517.

By statute in Indiana, a set-off against the payee acquired before notice of the assignment is available against the assignee of a note. Sefton v. Hargett, 118 Ind. 502.

Under the Mississippi statute a promissory note is subject to all set-offs which existed prior to notice of the assignment. Northern Bank v. Kyle, 7 How. (Miss.) 360.

In Abshire v. Corey, 118 Ind. 484, it is held that defenses existing before notice of assignment are available as against a note not negotiable by the law-merchant, and that a note not payable in bank is not governed by the law-merchant, and they therefore allowed the set-off in that case, although the note was assigned before maturity. But there is nothing in the case to show that the assignment was by a regular indorsement.

So on the other hand there can be no set-off against the assignee of a note of a claim purchased after notice of the assignment. Lewis v. Faber, 65 Ala. 460; Small v. Browder, 11 B. Mon. 212; Goodrich v. Stanley, 23 Conn. 79; Wood v. Brush, 73 Cal. 224.

In Brashear v. West, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 608, 8 L. ed. 801, notes were assigned soon after their date as collateral security for a debt of the payee; subsequently the payee made a general assignment for creditors and judgments were obtained in the name of the payee on the notes for the benefit of the assignees. After the judgments were obtained a bill was filed to have set off against them amounts which the maker had been compelled to pay as special bail for the payee, and the court held that since the maker became special bail after notice of the assignment, he was not entitled to a set-off.

In some cases the fact of bankruptcy seems to be given prominence.

An overdue note taken after the issuance of a commission of bankruptcy against the maker is subject to all set-offs that the maker's assignees may hold against it. Humphries v. Blight, 4 U. S. 4 Dail. 170, 1 L. ed. 870.

Negotiable paper assigned after a commission in bankruptcy has issued against the maker is subject to offsets in the hands of the assignee. Humphreys v. Blight, 1 Wash. C. C. 44.

And under the Vermont laws it seems to be necessary that the maker must notify the payee of notes purchased against him before the assignment to render them available as set-offs. Parker v. Kendall 3 Vt. 540.

And this rule was recognized in a case arising in New Hampshire. Bliss v. Houghton, 13 N. H. 123.

one, for several reasons. In the first place, it was transferred to Marbury as collateral security for an antecedent debt Vann owed him. The doctrine in this state is that the holder of negotiable paper as collateral security for a pre-existing debt is not a bona fide holder for value, nor entitled to protection against equities and defenses existing between prior parties, of which he had no notice; but that such paper is open in the hands of such holder to all the defenses which could have been made against it while in the hands of the original owner. First Nat. Bank of Decatur v. Johnson, 97 Ala. 655. In the next place, it nowhere appears from the record that the note was indorsed by Vann to Marbury, so as to carry the legal title. Even negotiable paper assigned before maturity, unless payable to bearer or indorsed, will be subject in the hands of the assignee, until the debtor is notified of the assignment, to the same equities as would have affected the party from whom it was received. The rule, in such cases, applicable to both non-negotiable and negotiable paper, has been well stated as follows: "When the written evidence of indebtedness is non-negotiable or overdue, indorsement will not obviate the necessity of notice; but, when negotiable paper requiring indorsement is assigned by delivery, notice has been held necessary to perfect the assignment." Wade, Notice, §442. It is true the testimony tends to show that the transfer of the note as collateral was in consideration of indulgence granted by Marbury to Vann on the debt for the security of which the note was so transferred; but the testimony does not show such a clear, definite, and cer-

Paper not negotiable.

There is a set-off against the assignee of a non-negotiable note of a claim against the payee acquired before notice of the assignment. Moore v. Jervis, 2 Colly. Ch. Cas. 60.

Notes without words of negotiability, although held by a bona fide purchaser, are subject to the set-offs existing between the assignor and the assignee at the time of the assignment. Hamilton v. Grangers L. & H. Ins. Co. 65 Ga. 750.

If the note is not payable to order, the assignor takes it subject to equities existing at the time of the notice of transfer. Sanborn v. Little, 3 N. H. 539.

Paper irregularly transferred.

VANN v. MARBURY holds that if the paper has been irregularly assigned it is not free from equities. The weight of authority seems to be with that case.

In Hedges v. Sealy, 9 Barb. 214, in which the defense was not set-off, it is said that a note payable to order, which is assigned without indorsement, is subject in the hands of the assignee to every equitable defense which the maker would have against the payee.

Negotiable paper assigned without indorsement is subject to all equities in the hands of the assignee, whether they arise out of the note transaction or not. Simpson v. Hall, 47 Conn. 417.

An irregular assignment of a note will not cut off set-offs. Peck v. Bligh, 37 Ill. 317.

But it has been held that transfer by assignment of a negotiable note for value and without notice before maturity bars offsets equally with indorsement. Hall v. Toby, 110 Pa. 818.

And that the bona fide holder of commercial paper transferred by delivery only is protected from all set-offs which arise subsequently to such delivery. Beard v. Dedolph, 29 Wis. 136.

In Proctor v. Cole, 104 Ind. 373, it was attempted to uphold the set-off against the assignee of notes on the ground that the assignment was without indorsement until after notice of the procurement of the set-off, but it appeared that the set-off claimed by the maker was not procured for value, and consequently that the equity of the assignee was superior, and therefore the set-off was not allowed.

That the indorsement of the note was not made at the time of its transfer will not let in subsequently acquired set-offs, if the maker was present at the time of the transfer of the note. Flint v. Flint, (Allen, 34, 38 Am. Dec. 615.

An indorsement after maturity upon a note transferred for value before maturity will relate back to the time of the transfer, so as to give the transferee all the rights of an indorsee before maturity. Ranger v. Cary, 1 Met. 399.

Fraudulent transfers or transfers without value.

In Bone v. Tharp, 68 Iowa, 223, the court states that the old rule that the only equities between the original parties to a note which can be pleaded against an assignee must inhere in or grow out of the note itself, has been materially changed by statute, and that the note is subject to equities if not taken in good faith and for a valuable consideration.

A fraudulently transferred note is subject to set-off. Keightley v. Walls, 37 Ind. 384; Hillhouse v. Adams, 67 Conn. 132.

If a note is fraudulently transferred for the purpose of defeating the set-off, the set-off will be allowed against the assignee. Savage v. Davis, 7 Wend. 223; Martindale v. Hudson, 25 Mo. 426; Baker v. Brown, 10 Mo. 393.

A claim procured for a nominal consideration is not a good set-off against an equitable assignee of a promissory note. Proctor v. Cole, 115 Ind. 15.

The transfer must be bona fide and for a valuable consideration to prevent the set-off. McDuffie v. Dame, 11 N. H. 244; Odiorne v. Woodman, 39 N. H. 544.

Unless the indorsement of an overdue note is for value it is subject to set-off. Cross v. Brown, 51 N. H. 438.

If a note not due is assigned for a past consideration it is subject to equities. Furniss v. Glichrst, 1 Sandf. 53.

Contingent liability and claims not owned.

A claim merely contracted for but not delivered at the time of the assignment is not a set-off against the assignee of a note. Weader v. First Nat. Bank of Crawfordsville, 126 Ind. 113.

A note assigned after due by a solvent assignor is not subject to set-off of the amount the maker was compelled to pay as surety for the payee, which was only a contingent liability at the time of the assignment. Follett v. Buyer, 4 Ohio St. 536.

But it has been held that equity may relieve a surety on a bond who has given a note to his principal which has been assigned so as to enable him to set off his contingent liability on the bond, which has become fixed since the assignment of the note and recovery of judgment thereon. Wood v. Steele, 65 Ala. 436.

Equities which will justify set-off.

In some of the cases an attempt has been made to seize upon equities to justify a set-off which could not be allowed under the ordinary rules of law.

The insolvency of the assignor of a note at the tain agreement, either as to the terms or time of the forbearance, as to constitute an independent consideration for the transfer which would give the transferee the rights of a bona fide holder for value without notice. Whether or not, therefore, the note in controversy was or was not negotiable paper, the whole question is one of notice.

Did Mrs. Moore, before or at the time of making payment of the note to Vann, have notice of the transfer of the note to Marbury? And did the Woodlawn Cemetery Company, at the time or before making payment of the purchase money to Mrs. Moore and to Vann, have notice of such transfer, or of any fact sufficient to put it on inquiry? In the absence of notice to Mrs. Moore of the transfer of the note to Marbury, the payment made by her to Vann would be a complete protection to her against this suit, notwithstanding the note was not produced and delivered up at the time of such payment. In Hart v. Freeman, 42 Ala. 588, we said: "The maker of a promissory note, not negotiable, may pay the same to the payee after its maturity, even though the note be not produced and delivered up at the time of payment, provided the maker has had no notice of the indorsement or transfer of the note to a third person; and such payment would be a valid and competent defense against the note, should it afterward appear, and suit be brought thereon against the maker by another holder." It was further held in that case that the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff in the action, the defendant having proved the payment, to show that the defendant had notice of the transfer or indorsement before the payment was made. We cannot perceive that the fact that payment of the note in controversy was made before maturity takes the case without the influence of the decision in Hart v. Free- time of the assignment is an equitable ground for setting off against it notes against him held by the maker at the time of the assignment. Colyer v. Craig, 11 B. Mon. 73.

So in Wray v. Furness, 27 Ala. 471, it seems to be intimated that if the payee is insolvent at the time of notice of the transfer of the note, such insolvency raises a sufficient equity to permit the set-off although the set-off did not arise out of the note transaction.

Assignment will not defeat perfected right.

The right of set-off perfected to note before assignment continues as against the indorsee. Snow v. Conant, 8 Vt. 301.

If the note becomes charged with an equity of set-off in the hands of the assignee, any subsequent assignment will not defeat the right. Martin v. Richardson, 68 N. C. 255.

Claims not in the same right.

A note payable to two jointly is not subject, in the hands of an assignee, to a claim against one of the payees. Walker v. Hall, 66 Miss. 390.

In Peyton v. Planters Compress Co., 68 Miss. 410, in which it was sought to set off against an assigned note a judgment recovered on a claim against the assignor and a third person, which arose prior to the notice of the assignment, the set-off was resisted on the ground of want of mutuality in the demands; but the court allowed the set-off without discussing the question of how far a promissory note is subject to set-off in the hands of an assignee, although it is stated that the promissory note was assigned, and it does not appear whether it was indorsed or not.

Effect of agreements.

An indorsee of a note takes subject to an agreement between the original parties as to set-off. Gary v. James, 7 Ala. 640.

One taking a note past due may be compelled to set off upon it a joint debt of the payee and another, if the parties had agreed to such set-off prior to the transfer. McDonald v. Mackenzie (Or.) May 24, 1887.

But an agreement between maker and payee to set off a claim against the note is not sufficient to attach the right of set-off to it in the hands of an assignee before maturity. Cripps v. Davis, 12 Mees. & W. 159.

Effect of new note.

If an indorsed note is taken up and a new one in renewal given to the indorsee, set-offs against the payee do not attach to the new note. Dodge v. Ockerhausen, 51 N. Y. S. R. 198.

Damages for breach by the payees of a note of an agreement to apply the proceeds of a consignment of wheat to its payment cannot be set off by the makers against a new note on different consideration in the hands of an assignee, although it was assigned after maturity. Titus v. Himrod, 30 Barb. 581.

Effect of assignment without recourse.

That the assignment of a note is without recourse is not sufficient to make it subject to set-off in the hands of the assignee. Bisbing v. Graham, 14 Pa. 14.

Counter set-off.

The set-off is not available against the assignee of a note if demands still exist in the hands of the assignor sufficient to exhaust the set-off. Collins v. Allen, 12 Wend. 356, 37 Am. Dec. 130.

The maker of an overdue note cannot set off claims against the assignor, if the remaining claim of the assignor is sufficient to cancel the set-off claimed. Wharton v. Hopkins, 38 N. C. 605.

Attempt to compel set-off by statute.

An attempt to make a note given to a bank payable in the bills of the bank, even in the hands of its assignee, is invalid, so far as it relates to past contracts, as impairing the obligation of contracts. Dundas v. Bowler, 8 McLean, 397.

Special contracts.

If, for a valuable consideration, one person undertakes to pay the debts of another, including existing promissory notes, the promise inures to the benefit of existing creditors; and if an assignee of such a creditor, who holds an unmatured promissory note, seeks to avail himself of the undertaking, he must allow set-offs which the obligor had against his assignor. Barlow v. Myra, 64 N. Y. 41, 21 Am. Rep. 582.

In a case where a firm, sued for infringement of patent, dissolved by mutual consent, and one of the partners purchased the other's interest, giving his notes therefor, under the agreement that the retiring partner should bear his share of the expenses and recovery in the suit, and after the notes matured and an action was brought on them they were assigned to a bank, the court permitted the continuing partner to set off the amounts which he had paid to settle the infringement suit and his costs incurred therein, against the notes in the hands of the bank. Littlefield v. Albany County Bank, 97 N. Y. 681.

man, supra. The testimony in the record shows that both Mrs. Moore, the maker of the note, and the Woodlawn Cemetery Company, deny all notice of the transfer of the note by Vann to Marbury. On the other hand, W. C. Ward, attorney for Marbury, testifies that he notified Mrs. Moore of the transfer of the note to Marbury at the time, or shortly after, it was made, by addressing her and her husband a letter through the postoffice at Birmingham or Avondale (the latter according to the best of his recollection), and that the letter was never returned to him, although the envelope in which it was inclosed had his name and address thereon. If we may take judicial cognizance of the postal regulation or custom to return undelivered letters to sender, when there is a printed or written request to that effect, and the address of the sender on the envelope, we cannot consider this testimony as satisfactory or conclusive on the question of notice of the transfer of the note, in the face of Mrs. Moore's positive denial of notice, and the further fact that the burden of proof rests upon the complainant to establish notice. In the first place, the witness does not state that the postage was prepaid on his letter. In the second place, it appears from Mrs. Moore's testimony that she, at the time the letter was sent, received her letters from the Birmingham postoffice, instead of at Avondale, where she resided. In the third place, if it had been stated by Mr. Ward that his letter was sent postage prepaid, and to the proper office, it would simply have made out a prima facie case of notice, which is overcome by the positive and unequivocal denial of Mrs. Moore that she ever had notice of such transfer. We discover nothing in the testimony which disentitles her to full credit as a witness, and in accepting her denial of having received notice we do not in any wise discredit the testimony of Mr. Ward. The testimony of the two can be reconciled upon the theory that Mr. Ward's letter went to the postoffice at Avondale, where Mrs. Moore was not accustomed to receive her letters; or that the letter was not prepaid, or was lost in the Birmingham postoffice, or delivered to some person who failed to hand it to her. Appellee further insists, however, that both Mrs. Moore and the Woodlawn Cemetery Company were either notified of the transfer of the note or acquired knowledge of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry at the time the payment by Mrs. Moore was made, and the purchase by the Woodlawn Cemetery was concluded; that the receipt itself, given by Vann to Mrs. Moore on that occasion, recited that the note in controversy was then in the hands of W. C. Ward. A careful review of the testimony fails to satisfy us that this contention is supported by the proof. On the contrary, Mrs. Moore swears: "Vann did not say my note was out when he made the trade, but said so when he delivered my paper. When I delivered the deed to Erswell, Vann did not tell me that the note was out. The note was handed me in Vann's office. I never heard him say anything in presence of Erswell about the note being out, and nothing in that of Nash, except in his office." Nash, in his testimony, shows that the money and stock were paid to Mrs. Moore, and the deed delivered by her to Erswell in his office, before Mrs. Moore, Nash, and Vann went to the latter's office; and we think it appears this was all done on the faith of Vann's statement that the notes and mortgage were in his office. Nash says: "Mr. Erswell, Mr. Vann, Mrs. Moore, and myself were the parties present at Mr. Erswell's office when the payment was made. The notes and mortgage were at Mr. Vann's office, so he said at the time. I went up to Mr. Vann's office with Mrs. Moore, when she received one note and the mortgage, I think. She also received a receipt for the other note, which he said was then misplaced, but he would surrender it in a day or so. Later on he made various statements as to the note," etc. And again, on cross-examination, he says: "I was present when Mrs. Moore executed the deed to the W. C. Co. Mrs. Moore was paid $358 cash, and $3,800 in stock, and she paid Vann $2,800 stock. The W. C. Co. paid him nothing. After the stock had been transferred to Vann by Mrs. Moore she demanded the notes from Vann, and she went up to Vann's office to get them; but she only received one, and a receipt for the other. He said that note was then misplaced, and promised to deliver it to her in a day or so. Am quite sure he did not say it was in Ward's hands or any other person's hands at that time." Erswell is also examined, and corroborates Nash as to the conclusion of the trade at Erswell's office, and the statement then made by Vann that the notes were at his office, and the fact that Vann, Mrs. Moore, and Nash left Erswell's office to go to Vann's office. We cannot discover from the testimony that Nash read the receipt given by Vann to Mrs. Moore for the note in controversy, or that Nash there learned any fact which would have put him on inquiry, unless it was the one fact that the note here in suit was not actually produced and surrendered.

So far as the Woodlawn Cemetery Company is concerned, it not appearing that the receipt showing that the note was then in Ward's hands was shown to Nash, we think the statements made by Vann, in the hearing of Nash, both at that time and at Erswell's office, that the note was mislaid, and would be surrendered in a day or two, disarmed all suspicion on Nash's part that the note had been transferred. Indeed if inquiry had been excited, of whom would he have made it? He could not have gone out into the community generally to make such inquiry. He could have gone to no one except to the mortgagor and mortgagee and it is apparent from this record that inquiry of either of them would have been unavailing, in the light of the testimony in this record. And, so far as Mrs. Moore is concerned, it may be said that the statements of Vann to her, before and accompanying the delivery of the receipt for the note, might justly be said to have disarmed any suspicion which, without such statements, the recital in the receipt that the note was in Ward's hands ought to have excited in her mind. Brown v. Blydenburgh, 7 N. Y. 142-146, 57 Am. Dec. 506. It is to be observed this receipt does not recite that the note had been transferred to Ward, but that it was in his hands. If this recital stood alone, it may be it was sufficient to put Mrs. Moore on inquiry, and that she would be chargeable with notice of all facts inquiry from Ward would have elicited; but, in connection with Vann's statements at the time of the payment, and also accompanying the delivery of the receipt, the most natural inference Mrs. Moore could have drawn from such recital in the receipt would have been that the note was in Ward's hands, not as transferee, but as agent for Vann; and that it had been mislaid. We see no escape from the conclusion that Vann's declarations and conduct were intended, and naturally had the effect to quiet suspicion, and prevent inquiry by Mrs. Moore and the officers of the Woodlawn Cemetery Company, and sufficiently excused their failure to demand the production and surrender of the note. Brown v. Blydenburgh, supra; 1 Jones, Mortg. § 791; Van Keuren v. Corkins, 6 Thomp. & C. 355.

The question with which we have mainly to deal in this case is not whether the mortgage can be enforced as to this note against Mr. and Mrs. Moore, or whether they are liable personally to Marbury on the note, but whether the note is enforceable in this suit as a lien on the land as against the Woodlawn Cemetery Company, the purchaser of the land. Its attorney examined the title, and found no incumbrance except the mortgage from Mrs. Moore and her husband to Vann, securing the two notes. So far as the record showed, therefore, Vann was the proper party to whom payment of the mortgage debt should be made, and who had the right to cancel the mortgage. In Ogle v. Turpin, 102 Ill. 148, it is said: "There is no presumption of law that the payee of notes secured by mortgage has transferred the notes before purchasing the equity of redemption from the mortgagor, and a person taking a mortgage from the payee will not be held chargeable with notice that the notes secured in the first mortgage, although not due, have been assigned, but he may rely upon the record as showing title in his mortgagor." This we think to be the correct rule, except where the mortgage shows upon its face the negotiable character of the notes it secures, in which event it might be incumbent on a subsequent purchaser to inquire as to whether the notes have been assigned. Keohane v. Smith, 97 Ill. 156; 1 Jones, Mortg. § 814. The mortgage before us does not describe the notes, or otherwise indicate their character. In the absence of proof of notice to the Woodlawn Cemetery Company of the transfer of the note to Marbury, or of facts sufficient to put it on inquiry, the principles which govern the respective rights of Marbury and said company in this controversy may be briefly stated as follows: By the transfer of the note from Vann to Marbury under the circumstances above shown, the latter acquired an interest in the mortgage security which he was entitled to assert as against both the
